

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

A HANDBOOK OF PRACTICAL DIVINITY, AND A COMMENTARY ON HOLY SCRIPTURE.

SELECTED AND ARRANGED BY

R. ^{Hert} ^{Arthur} BERTRAM,

Compiler of "A Dictionary of Poetical Illustrations," &c.

"Great works are not in everybody's reach, and though it is better to know them thoroughly than to know them here and there, yet it is a good work to give a little to those who have neither time nor means to get more. Let every bookworm, when in any fragrant scarce old tome he discovers a sentence, a story, an illustration, that does his heart good, hasten to give it."—S. T. Coleridge.

"The aim of the teacher who would find his way to the hearts and understandings of his hearers, will never be to keep down the parabolical element in his teaching, but rather to make as much and frequent use of it as he can."—Archbishop Trench.

"An illustration is not a mere prettiness—an ornamental phrase, that might be left out without detriment to the train of thought,—it is something which really lights up that train of thought itself, and enables the reader or hearer to see the aim, as well as to feel the force, of the logic. An argument may be demonstrative,—it may thoroughly establish the position maintained,—but it may not at first, and simply as an argument, be fully appreciated; when, the understanding having done its work, passion and genius shall crown the whole with some vivid illustration, which shall make it stand out with a distinctness that shall never be forgotten! It is one great faculty of the mind holding up a lighted torch to the workmanship of another."—Thomas B. Bayly.

INTRODUCTION.

THE following facts and suggestions are given for the benefit of all whom they may concern.

1. This work is not merely another volume of Illustrations. It differs essentially from all other collections of Illustrations, except Parable ; or, Divine Poesy. Its distinctive feature is, that its arrangement is homiletical. The headings under which the extracts of which the various articles are made up, might serve as divisions and subdivisions of sermons, or of courses of sermons. This, however, is not their design, but that thereby the student may be helped to attain to a clear and logical mastery of the subject concerning which he intends to speak.

2. This work is intended rather for study than for hasty reference. It is not for the man who, when he finds his ideas running dry, and does not see how he is to finish a division of a sermon effectively, runs to some Dictionary to find something that can be tacked on to what he has written ; but for the faithful preacher, such as is depicted in Ecclesiastes xii. 9, 10, who gives diligence beforehand to find out "acceptable words" and useful ideas. It is not intended for the idler, who preaches under compulsion, but for the earnest student, to whom preaching is a delight.

3. Those who use this book are counselled to make constant use of the Indexes, especially of the Textual Index. The illustrations in this volume cast invaluable side-lights upon more than four thousand texts of Scripture. On this account, they constitute one of the most valuable Commentaries ever published. Many a brief clause referred to in the Textual Index contains material for effective and useful paragraphs. He is the useful preacher who knows how to amplify without diluting.

4. One idea that has sustained the Compiler in the immense labour involved in the preparation of this volume is, that he may thus be useful to his brethren in country districts, many of whom have no access to large libraries, and by a constant inadequacy of income are prevented from largely increasing their own. His hope has been thus to put within their reach a volume which, because of its wealth of suggestiveness, should be a little library in itself.

5. As far as was possible, care has been taken not to include in this volume anything that has already appeared in "Parable ; or, Divine Poesy," or in Bate's or Foster's Dictionaries of Illustrations.

6. Those who use this volume will find much valuable help of another kind in the Compiler's Dictionary of Poetical Illustrations, also published by Mr. Dickinson.

7. Every young minister is strongly advised to make a similar compilation for himself. Whenever he finds anything (fact, figure, verse, &c.) that seems to him fitted for effective use in a sermon, let him copy or cut it out. Let him not trust to memory : let him store up the treasure in his Note-book, and then he may reasonably hope to find it when it is wanted.

Long experience in this kind of work leads the Compiler to recommend the method he has himself followed, and which Mr. Moody was also led to adopt, that of arranging all the excerpts in large envelopes, such as lawyers use. This method has many advantages ; but it has its disadvantages also, such as that, to carry it out effectively, a large cupboard with pigeon-holes is necessary. A simple and an excellent method is, to have a large manuscript book for each letter of the alphabet, copying, e.g., into the book lettered A all that refers to topics commencing with that letter, "Affliction," "Amusements," &c.

Whichever method is adopted, let the copyist write only on one side of the page. Paper is cheap, and a neglect of this counsel will lead to many inconveniences and regrets.

Next, let the student insert in his Bible a reference against the passage of which each extract is illustrative. Thus, e.g., when he comes to preach upon John iii. 16, he may find written against that text A 97, which will remind him that in the envelope thus numbered, or on page 97 of the MS. volume lettered A, he will find something that will be helpful to him in dealing with it.

All this involves considerable labour, but the compensations for it are abundant. This is one of the methods by which the student may attain to a ministry of which the interest, the power, and the usefulness will grow to the very end.

INTRODUCTORY READINGS.

I.—ON THE IMPORTANCE OF ILLUSTRATION IN TEACHING.

(I.) THE importance of illustration for the purpose of enforcing truth is so obvious, that it seems a work of supererogation to say one word concerning it. . . . A man may often find materials to enliven a discourse which might otherwise have proved very dull, or to fasten on the conscience a truth or a warning, which otherwise would have fallen on the ear unnoticed, and glided past the mind unfelt. It is not enough that truth be pointed, like a straight smooth piece of steel ; it needs side points, as a dart, that it may not draw out, when it effects an entrance. Anecdotes and illustrations may not only illustrate a point, and make an audience see and feel the argument, but they may themselves add to the argument ; they may at once be a part of the reasoning, and an elucidation of it. Indeed, a just figure always adds power to a chain of logic, and increases the amount of truth conveyed. It is also of great use in relieving the attention, as a stopping-place where the mind is rested, and prepared to resume the reasoning without fatigue, without loss. Almost any expedient, which decorum permits, may be justified, in order to awake and fix the attention of an audience. Such attention, however, cannot be kept but by truth worth illustrating.

Dr. Abercrombie speaks of the importance of illustrations and analogies for assisting and training the memory of children. The same discipline is equally necessary for the hearers of sermons. Although they may have forgotten the text, the subject, and almost the whole design of the preacher, they will not unfrequently carry away the illustrations, and everything in the train of thoughts lying immediately in their neighbourhood. And, indeed, a single illustration will sometimes flash the meaning of a whole sermon upon the minds that otherwise would have departed scarcely knowing the application of a sentence.

Every one must have observed the effect of the introduction of such lights and illustrations upon an audience. The whole assembly may have appeared up to the point uninterested, listless, even oppressed with stupor ; but the moment the preacher says, " I will illustrate this point by a relation of what took place in the life of such or such a person," an entire change comes on the whole congregation. Every countenance is lighted up with expectation, every mind is on the alert. Even if the minister says, " We will suppose a case for the purpose of illustration," even then the attention of the hearers is at once aroused. The presentation of actual facts, or cases of interest in point, is so attractive, that if real incidents are not at hand, it were better to suppose them than leave the subject without such illustration, in instances where it admits of it.

Accordingly, in the Scriptures and in discourses of our blessed Lord, it is evident that suppositions are made, and fables are related, to illustrate and enforce truth, to give it life and action. This constituted a powerful charm in our Saviour's preaching, even for those who cared nothing for the spiritual lessons He was enforcing. The beauty and exceeding aptness of His cases and illustrations may have caught many a careless soul when the bare dry truth would have failed to touch the heart. The truth that a man is miserable who layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God, might have been stated in ever so forcible language without reaching the conscience of the hearers. But when our Lord proceeded to say, " The ground of a certain rich man brought forth plentifully," with the solemn close of the epilogue, " Thou fool ! this night thy soul shall be required of thee !" what conscience could remain unmoved ? The hearers of our blessed Lord were so deeply interested and absorbed in such narratives, that sometimes they seem to have forgotten that they were merely illustrations ; and interrupted Him, carried away by their feelings, or desiring the thread of the narrative to unwind differently, as in the case when they broke in upon one of His parables with the declaration, " Lord, he hath ten pounds already !" One can see the company, their interest, their eagerness, and the truth taking hold upon them ; we can hear their exclamations, as if a drama of real life were enacting before them. And it was life, taken out of the form of abstract, and dramatised for their life, their instruction. — Cheever.

(2.) The revealing the Word by similitudes is very useful and profitable; for it conduces much to make truth go to a man's heart before he is aware, and to impress it upon his memory. Many remember the simile, and so the truth which it conveyed. It is reported of the Marquis Galeacius, a nobleman of great estates, and near of kin to the Pope, that once coming but to hear Peter Martyr preach, by a mere simile that he used, God smote his heart, and made it the means of his conversion. The simile was thus: Peter Martyr in his discourse had occasion to say, Men may think very hardly of God and His people, but this is because they do not know Him; as suppose a man a great way off sees a company of excellent dancers, the musicians are playing, and there is exact art in all they do. At the distance he regards them as a company of madmen, but (added he) as he draws nearer and nearer to them, and hears the melodious sound, and observes the art that they use, then he is much taken and affected. So it is with you. You are a great way off, and look from a great distance upon the ways of God, and so you think His people mad; but could you come to observe what excellency is in them, it would take captive your hearts. God blessed such a similitude as this to that great man's heart, so that though his wife and children lay imploring at his feet, yet he came to Geneva, and there continued all his days. But we should take some heed here.

1. Similes should be brought from things known.

2. We must not urge similes too far, we must take heed of a luxuriant, wanton wit.

3. And they must be very natural, plain, and proper, or else man will appear in them rather than God.

—Burroughs, 1599-1648.

(3.) Nothing strikes the mind of man so powerfully as instances and examples. They make a truth not only intelligible but even palpable, sliding it into the understanding through the windows of sense, and by the most familiar as well as most unquestionable perceptions of the eye.

—South, 1633-1716.

(4.) A proverb or parable being once unfolded, by reason of its affinity with the fancy, the more sweetly insinuates itself into that, and is from thence with the greater advantage transmitted to the understanding. In this state we are not able to behold truth in its own native beauty and lustre; but while we are veiled with mortality, truth must veil itself too, that it may the more freely converse with us.

—John Smith, 1618-1652.

II.—OUR LORD'S METHOD OF TEACHING.

(5.) With matter divine and manner human, our Lord descended to the level of the humblest of the crowd, lowering Himself to their understandings, and winning His way into their hearts by borrowing His topics from familiar circumstances and the scenes around Him. Be it a boat, a plank, a rope, a beggar's rags, an imperial robe, we would seize on anything to save a drowning man; and in His anxiety to save poor sinners, to rouse their fears, their love, their interest, to make them understand and feel the truth, our Lord pressed everything—art and nature, earth and heaven—into His service. Creatures of habit, the servants if not the slaves of form, we invariably select our text from some book of the Sacred Scriptures. He took a wider, freer range; and, instead of keeping to the unvarying routine of text and sermon with formal divisions, it were well, perhaps, that we sometimes ventured to follow His example; for may it not be to the naturalness of their addresses and their striking out from the beaten path of texts and sermons, to their plain speaking and home-thrusts, to their direct appeals and home-spun arguments, that our street and lay preachers owe perhaps not a little of their power?

Illustrating the words of the great English dramatist—

"Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, Sermons in stones, and good in everything,"

our Lord found many a topic of discourse in the scenes around Him; even the humblest objects shone in His hands, as I have seen a fragment of broken glass or earthenware, as it caught the sunbeam, light up, flashing like a diamond. With the stone of Jacob's Well for a pulpit, and its water for a text, He preached salvation to the Samaritan woman. A little child, which He takes from its mother's side, and holds up blushing in His arms before the astonished audience, is His text for a sermon on humility. A husbandman on a neighbouring height between him and the sky, who strides with long and measured steps over the field he sows, supplies a text from which He discourses on the gospel and its effects on different classes of hearers. In a woman baking; in two women who sit by some cottage door grinding at the mill; in an old, strong fortalice perched on a rock, whence it looks across the brawling torrent to the ruined and roofless gable of a house swept away by mountain floods—Jesus found texts. From the birds that sung above His head, and the lilies that blossomed at His feet, He discoursed on the care of God—these His text and Providence His theme.

—Guthrie.

III.—THE FIGURES OF THE BIBLE.

(6.) The figures of the Bible are not mere graceful ornaments—arabesques to grace a border, or fairy frescoes, that give mere beauty to a chamber or saloon. They are language.

Human speech articulate is marvellous beyond all our thought; but human words are not sufficient even for human thoughts and feelings. All high and grand emotions scorn the tongue, that lies as helpless in the mouth as would be artillery to express the sound and grandeur of mountain thunders in tropical storms. All deep griefs, and for the most part, tender and exquisite affections, are voiceless.

Then it is, if any speech is attempted, that nature yields another language, and figures, word-pictures, and illustrations, if they do not express, at least vividly suggest truths far beyond the reach of words or the compass of sentences such as men frame for the common use of life.

The Bible stands far beyond all other books in this use of the language of nature. The great globe is but an alphabet, and every object upon it is a letter ; and, from beginning to end of the Bible, these sublime letters are used to set forth in hieroglyphic the truths of immortality. And there is this nobility in the use of natural objects for moral teaching, that to the end of time, and to all people, of how different soever language, the symbol used is the same. Artificial hieroglyphics differ with age and nation. The Oriental cities had their special characters—the Egyptian his—the Aztec his ; and they differ one from another, so that one could not have read the written signs of the other. But the sun, the mountain, the ocean, the storm, the rain, the snow, the winds, lions and eagles, the sparrow and the dove, the lily and the rose, grass, earth, stones, and dirt, are the same in all ages, in all latitudes, to all people. And those truths that are expressed in the figures drawn from the natural world have relationships, and they are the most universal of any in the Bible, and the most frequent.

—Beecher.

IV.—THE DELIGHT OF THE HUMAN MIND IN METAPHOR.

(7.) Deep in our nature there exists a tendency to seek amongst all interesting objects points of resemblance, and when some intuition keener than our own reveals that resemblance, we bow to its truths or acclaim to its beauty. For instance, when human life is compared to the course of a river—cradled in the moss-fringed fountain, tripping gaily through its free and babbling infancy, swelling into proud and impetuous youth, burdened with the great ships in its sober and utilitarian manhood, and then merging in the ocean of eternity—who is there that does not see the resemblance, and in seeing it find his mind richer by at least one bright thought? There may be little resemblance betwixt a clouded sky and the human countenance ; and yet when that sky opens and lets through the sunshine, we say that it is smiling, and when that dull countenance opens and lets out the soul, we say that it is shining ; and in the metaphor we feel that we have given a new animation to the sun, a new glory to "the human face divine."

This tendency to metaphor, and the universal delight in parables, comparisons, and figures of speech, are no mere freaks of man's fancy. They have their foundation in the mind and method of Deity, whose thoughts are all in harmony, and whose works and ways are all connected with one another ; so that what we call the imagination of the poet, if his reading be correct, is really the logic of Omniscience.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

V.—HOMELY ILLUSTRATIONS ARE NOT TO BE SHRUNK FROM OR DESPISED.

(8.) God's ministers must use plain and familiar expressions for the better convincing of their people both of their sin and misery. The prophet here (Hosea xiii.) uses similitudes from a travelling woman, from the east wind ; and the Lord, by way of aggravation of their sins, tells them that He had spoken to them by His prophets, and had "multiplied visions," and given them much preaching, yea, and the better to convince them, He had "used similitudes by the ministry of His prophets" (Hosea xii. 10). This is an excellent way of preaching and prevailing ; it both notably illustrates the truth, and insinuates itself into men's affections. Galeacius Caraciolus, an Italian marquis, and nephew to a pope, was converted by an apt similitude which he heard from Peter Martyr. Nathan caught David with a parable, and out of his own mouth condemned him. Christ, who spake as never man spake, whose words were full of power and authority, yet, the better to work upon His hearers, frequently used parables, from the sower, from leaven, from mustard seed, flowers, feasts, from a treasure, &c. ; and the Apostle Paul fetches similitudes from runners and wrestlers.

Plain preaching is the best teaching ; it is the best way to convince and convert men ; and if plain, familiar preaching will not work, certainly by dark, mysterious preaching it will never be effected. This made Paul, that he had rather speak five words in a known tongue to edify others, than ten thousand in an unknown tongue. That is the best preaching which sets forth things to the life, and makes them as plain as if they were written with a sunbeam.

(9.) Let ministers wisely and soberly use this their liberty in teaching, for the edification of their hearers, whom, if they be of the weaker sort, let them not trouble with profound matters which they are not able to understand, but let us be content to use plain similitudes and homebred comparisons, fetched from heaven, from the meal-tub, or other domestical business ; knowing therein we do no other than Jesus Christ, our great Doctor and Master, Himself did.

—Nehemiah Rogers, 1594-1660.

(10.) About three years before the death of Rowland Hill, two gentlemen entered Surrey Chapel. They had long been friends, and one of them was shortly to leave this country for India. He was living "without hope and without God in the world." His companion was a decided and consistent Christian, and earnestly desired his friend's salvation. This pious friend, as the time drew near for the young man's departure, begged of him to grant him one especial favour, namely, to spend with him his four last Sabbath evenings, and to accompany him to the sanctuary. The request was complied with, and many prayers ascended to God that the sermons might lead the wanderer to the Saviour. The first, second, and third sermons were heard, but no impressions were produced. When the last Sabbath arrived, the Christian felt increased anxiety for his friend's soul. He took him to Surrey Chapel to hear good Rowland Hill, and secretly prayed that the preacher might be in a solemn state of mind, and not be permitted to indulge in eccentric remarks.

The venerable preacher gave out his text : "We are not ignorant of his devices ;" and immediately told the following tale :—"Many years since I met a drove of pigs in one of the streets of a large town, and, to my surprise, they were not driven, but quietly followed their leader. This singular fact excited my curiosity, and I pursued the swine, until they all quietly entered the butchery. I then asked the man how he succeeded in getting the poor, stupid, stubborn pigs so willingly to follow him, when he told me the secret; he had a basket of beans under his arm, and kept dropping them as he proceeded, and so secured his object. Ah! my dear hearers, the devil has got his basket of beans, and he knows how to suit his temptations to every sinner. He drops them by the way; the poor sinner is thus led captive by the devil at his own will, and if the grace of God prevent not, he will get him at last into his butchery, and there he will keep him for ever. Oh, it is because 'we are not ignorant of his devices' that we are anxious this evening to guard you against them!"

The Christian friend deeply mourned over this tale about the pigs, and feared it would excite a smile but not produce conviction in the mind of his unbelieving companion. After the service was over they left the chapel, and all was silence for a season. "What a singular statement we had to-night about the pigs, and yet how striking and convincing it was!" remarked the young man. His mind was impressed, and he could not forget the basket of beans, the butchery, and the final loss of the sinner's soul. He left this country, but has since corresponded with his friend, and continues to refer to this sermon as having produced a beneficial, and it is hoped an abiding, impression on his mind.

—Memoir of Rowland Hill.

VI.—WHENCE THEY ARE TO BE OBTAINED.

(11.) "Where shall I gather illustrations for my class?" On the source from which they are drawn depends, in a great measure, their value. Good bank-notes come from the banker, not from the counterfeiter. No one has any right to have counterfeits, so no teacher has a right to use spurious illustrations. Convey the truth by the simplest illustrations possible, and with the least circumlocution. Instead of relying on encyclopedias, &c., go into the streets with open eyes; pick up the dead, broken branch which lies at your feet, and convert it into an illustration of a blameless Christian life. Be wide awake, be discriminating; or, if the expression may be allowed, possess sanctified gumption. No teacher has a right to go to his class without an illustration to enforce the truth. The Saviour preached the gospel in the trees, in the fields, in the roads. Why not we? An illustration is to be used to gain attention, and to carry home the truth. Employ such as are within the comprehension of the child. Let Greek mythology alone. Take God's illustrations, scattered on every hand, in the fields, the gardens, the lanes. Look at the flowers, the grass, all nature, and pray God to open your eyes. An excellent help is to have a Bible with a wide margin, in which to note down, as you find them, such illustrations as bear upon any particular passage. After a while you will have a book which money cannot buy. Use always the best material you can find, and, if possible, that drawn from your own experience. Do not labour to find great things. Take the little things. Be plain, consistent, concise. If your lesson is about Zaccheus, climbing into the sycamore tree, do not picture the scyamore of the Mississippi Valley, with its smooth trunk, but remember the Palestine sycamore. Never use an illustration simply for its own sake; ever keep in mind the great object, and let the truth follow the way into the mind and heart which the illustration has opened.

VII.—MISTAKES AGAINST WHICH WE NEED TO BE ON OUR GUARD.

(12.) Illustrations have been compared to the barbs that fix the arrow in the target. But it is to be remembered that barbs alone are useless. An archer would be poorly off if he had nothing in his quiver but arrow-heads or feathers. For an illustration to be useful or successful, there must be something to be illustrated. A sermon made up of anecdotes and flowers is quite as deficient as a sermon of the driest abstractions.

—Cheever.

(13.) Illustrations, however beautiful, are dangerous if not employed with care. They may gratify without conveying instruction. When in excess, they become a mere diorama of illustration, leaving gratified curiosity and weariness behind. Superior elocution can do much, but a heavy weight of adornment will enfeeble the strongest. A multiplication of beauties neither helps the beautiful nor the useful. The choicest tulip-bed in richest bloom loses its attractions if strewed over with buttercups and daisies, and occasionally the tree covered with blossom fails to produce the richest fruit.—Anon.

(14.) As I was once endeavouring to explain to a class of children the nature of faith, I told the familiar story of a child on shipboard, from whom a pet monkey snatches his cap and darts with it up into the rigging. The little fellow makes after him, climbing higher and higher, till at last the sailors, to their horror, see him far up at a point where he is growing dizzy. He is just about to pitch headlong to the deck. His father, called up from the cabin, shouts to him to leap out into the water as his only hope. The child hesitates, but finally, trusting his father's wisdom, makes the tremendous leap, and is brought up by the sailors safely. One little hearer in the class, as I was rendering the story as vividly as possible, seemed much impressed, and sat deeply thinking while I tried to make the application. The truth seemed to have taken hold of him. "A hopeful case," I thought. At last, when he could hold down the ferment in him no longer, and I turned to hear his question, he asked, breathlessly, "Well—but—what became of the monkey?" It was, in his teacher, the old blunder repeated, of making the illustration more impressive than the illustrated truth.

—G. B. Willcox.

(15.) I think the question in every instance should be, Does it help? Does that mode of putting it help? Would it help me? And a canon of our speech for all times should be the canon of the old poet: not too much of anything—to over-colour is to destroy all effect; not too much detail—to know when to stop; not too many words—to overlay the ornament is to destroy all the beauty, the harmony, the impressiveness, by destroying proportion. Perhaps, in the preacher's order of teaching, we must often use more than strict good taste does allow, because we have to stimulate spiritual, and even intellectual, appetites. The severe style tells on educated and refined minds in a state of preparation; but just as pictures are for children, so also pictorial words and emotions, which embody, and even startle, must be used in dealing with the multitudes. Still the mind, as it prepares itself, should come back to the question, Will that help? Is that too much? This will compel the speaker to feel his own images—his own language; that which is real to him will usually be felt to be real to the audience he addresses; not in mere copiousness, but in selectness, is power; not in the crowd of illustrations, but in the distinctness of one, is power—even as we are lost in a gallery of paintings, until we take refuge in one, and permit it to exercise its impression.

But you have to manage your text by illustration, and on this I must dwell a little longer. You need good skill here: good taste is only the unison of sound knowledge and correct feeling; but you will greatly need good taste here, as a rule. If an illustration adds at all to the light in your own mind, it will probably add to the light upon the text in the minds of your audience. And first, let me caution you against the improper use of allegory. Do you ever feel any tendencies to the use of it? It needs superlative genius to be tolerable. A bold, strong, Bunyan-like, Christmas Evans-like mind, may recite an allegory like some lofty poem; but be you very cautious how you yield to the seduction.

—E. P. Hood.

THE GREATER TOPICS IN THEOLOGY AND MORALS.

ADVERSITY.

1. Should be expected by all men.

(16.) As a wise pilot and governor of a ship will, in calm and fair weather, look for a storm: even so every wise man, in time of peace and prosperity, will prepare his mind for adversity.

—Crowdray, 1609.

(17.) God "hath set the day of prosperity and the day of adversity, the one over against the other," as the clouds are gathered for rain by the shining of the sun.

—Caird, 1743-1810.

2. Is not necessarily an evil.

(18.) To be thrown upon one's own resources is to be cast in the very lap of fortune; for our faculties then undergo a development, and display an energy, of which they were previously unsusceptible.

—B. Franklin.

3. It is a means of self-knowledge.

(19.) If God should refuse to interrupt the course of men, they would scarcely know the strength of their resistance to Him. It is not when the cable lies coiled up on the deck that you know how strong or how weak it is; it is when it is put to the test, when it is made to sing like the chord of a harp, in times when the ship is imperilled, and the waves are beating fiercely against it. And it is only when men are brought to the test that they can tell what their real nature is, or how strong their instincts and passions are.

A house built on sand is, in fair weather, just as good as if builded on a rock. A cobweb is as good as the mightiest chain cable when there is no strain on it. It is trial that proves one thing weak and another strong.

—Becher.

4. It shows other men what we are.

(20.) Sorrow often reveals and develops the noblest qualities. What prosperity had concealed, adversity brings to light. Nobleness that we never suspected, with powers that would have remained uncultured and unfruitful, have been manifested. They are like some grand mansion surrounded and hidden, in summer-time, by large, full-foliaged trees; the passer-by cannot discern the fine proportions and ornamental sculpture that make it "a thing of beauty;" but when winter tears away, with ruthless hand, every leaf, until the trees stand clear and bare, then, behold! the magnificent handiwork appears in all its glory and perfection. The best natures show best when most tried, and they are lovelier in poverty than in wealth.

—Bradford.

5. It is essential to the development and perfecting of nobility of character.

(21.) If you were to hear some men's experience, you would think that they grow as the white pine grows, with straight grain, and easily split; for I notice that all that grow easy split easy. But there are some that grow as the mahogany grows, with veneering knots, and all quirks and contortions of grain: that is the best timber of the forest which has the most knots. Everybody seeks it, because being hard to grow, it is hard to wear out; and when knots have been sawn and polished, how beautiful they are!

There are many who are content to grow straight, like weeds on a dunghill; but there are many others who want to be stalwart and strong like the monarchs of the forest, and yet, when God sends winds of adversity to sing a lullaby in their branches, they do not like to grow in that way. They dread the culture that is really giving toughness to their soul and strength to its fibre.

—Becher.

(22.) The gem cannot be polished without friction, nor man perfected without adversity.

—Eliza Cook.

6. It enables us to discover our real friends.

(23.) On hearing a swallow in the chimney.

Here is music, such as it is; but how long will it hold? When but a cold morning comes in, my guest is gone, without either warning or thanks. This pleasant season has the least need of cheerful notes; the dead of winter shall want and wish them in vain.

Thus doth an ungrateful parasite; no man is more ready to applaud and enjoy our prosperity; but when with the times our condition begins to alter, he is a stranger at least. Give me that bird which will sing in winter, and seek to my window in the hardest frost. There is no trial of friendship but adversity.

He that is not ashamed of my bonds, not daunted with my checks, not aliened with my disgrace, is a friend for me; one drachm of that man's love is worth a world of false and inconsistent formality.

—Hail, 1656-1754.

(24.) Faith and friendship are seldom truly tried but in extremes. To find friends when we have no need of them, and to want them when we have, are both alike easy and common. In prosperity, who will not profess to love a man? In adversity, how few will show that they do it indeed! When we are happy, in the spring-tide of abundance, and the rising flood of plenty, then the world will be our servant; then all men flock about us with bared heads, with bended bodies, and protesting tongues. But when these pleasing waters fall to ebbing, when wealth but shifts to another stand,—then men look upon us at a distance, and stiffen themselves as if they were in armour, lest (if they should comply with us) they should get a wound in the close. Adversity is like Penelope's night,—which undoes all that ever the day did weave.

—Feltham, 1668.

7. Moreover, it is a test of our religious experience.

(25.) A religion which cheers you in prosperity is certainly better than no religion; and faith in God while the sky is blue is better than no faith; but, after all, taking men as they are, the religion which they need is a religion which is brought into play more in the day of trial than in the day of prosperity. What matters it what is the texture of your raiment in August? It is January that needs thick raiment. What matters it what your experiences are in prosperity? It is adversity that is to test the nature of your experiences. An anchor is not bad when it lies upon the deck; it is convenient when we use it in a tranquil harbour; but when the stars are hidden, and the storm is on the deep, and you are driving in upon the coast—then it is salvation. We need a hope, a faith, which, while it will be a convenience in fair weather, will be our mainstay on foul and stormy days.

—Becher.

8. On all these accounts, and on others, it is spiritually less perilous than prosperity.

(26.) For my own part, I bless God that hath kept me from greatness in the world; and I take it as the principal act of friendship that ever you did for me, that you provoked me to this sweet though flesh-denying life of the ministry, in which I have chosen to abide. I had rather lie in health on the hardest bed than be sick upon the softest; and I see that a feather bed maketh not a sick man well. The sleep of the labouring man is sweet. The ploughman's brown bread and cheese is more savoury to him, and breedeth fewer sicknesses, than the fulness and variety of the rich. This country diet doth not cherish voluptuousness, arrogance, vainglory, earthly-mindedness, uncharitableness, and other selfish diseases, as much worldly greatness doth.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(27.) Some ships behave best in a gale; in light winds they rock themselves to pieces. To a Christian man adversity is not the most dangerous condition; fine weather tries him more. When we are least visibly strained, we are often most sharply tested.

—Birrell.

9. Things to be avoided in adversity.

(28.) One of the worst features of adversity is that it has a tendency to concentrate one's thoughts on one's self. One of the best features of prosperity is that it permits a person to forget himself and help others. If it takes all your strength to stem the tide of trouble, what have you to spare to help a brother afloat? But if you are gliding smoothly down the tide, with sails full spread and favouring breezes, you can have eye, and ear, and helping hand for all endangered and overlaiden craft.

(β.) Despair.

(29.) In the hour of adversity be not without hope; for crystal rain falls from black clouds.

—Nassauwee.

10. Our supreme duty in adversity: trust in God.

(30.) A dark cloud hung over the interests of the African race in our land. There seemed no way of deliverance. Frederick Douglass, at a crowded meeting, depicted the terrible condition. Everything was against his people. One political party had gone down on its knees to slavery. The other proposed not to abolish it anywhere, but only to restrict it. The supreme court had given judgment against black men as such. He drew a picture of his race writhing under the lash of the overseer, and trampled upon by brutal and lascivious men. As he went on with his despairing words, a great horror of darkness seemed to settle down upon the audience. The orator even uttered the cry for blood. There was no other relief. And then he showed that there was no relief even in that. Everything, every influence, every event was gathering, not for good, but for evil about the doomed race. It seemed as if they were fated to destruction. Just at the instant when the cloud was most heavy over the audience, there slowly rose, in the front seat, an old black woman, her name "Sojourner Truth." She had given it to herself. Far and wide she was known as an African prophetess. Every eye was on her. The orator paused. Reaching out towards him her long bony finger, as every eye followed her pointing, she cried out, "Frederick, is God dead?" It was a lightning-flash upon that darkness. The cloud began to break, and faith and hope and patience returned with the idea of a personal and ever-living God.

AFFECTIONS, THE

1. They are irrepressible in their activity.

(31.) Love is the great instrument and engine of nature, the bond and cement of society, the spring and spirit of the universe. It is of that active, restless nature, that it must of necessity exert itself; and like the fire, to which it is so often compared, it is not a free agent to choose whether it will heat or no, but it streams forth by natural results and unavoidable emanations. So that it will fasten upon an inferior, unsuitable object rather than none at all. The soul may sooner leave off to subsist than to love; and, like the vine, it withers and dies if it has nothing to embrace. Now this affection, in the state of innocence, was happily pitched upon its right object; it flamed up in direct fervours of devotion to God, and in collateral emissions of charity to its neighbour.

2. Religion calls us, not to destroy, but to control them.

(32.) It is not the business of virtue to extirpate the affections, but to regulate them.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

3. There is constant need for watchfulness in regard to them.

(33.) Affections are, as it were, the wind of the soul, and then the soul is as it should be, when it is neither so becalmed that it moves not when it should, nor yet tossed with tempests to move disorderly—when it is so well-balanced that it is neither lift up nor cast down too much.

Our affections must not rise to become unruly passions, for then, as a river that overflows the banks, they carry much slime and soil with them.

Though affections be the wind of the soul, yet unruly passions are the storms of the soul, and will overturn all, if they be not suppressed. The best, as we see in the case of David, if they do not steer their hearts aright, are in danger of sudden gusts. A Christian must neither be a dead sea nor a raging sea.

4. A comprehensive rule for their exercise.

(34.) Do not be over-fond of anything, or consider that for your interest which makes you break your word, quit your modesty, or inclines you to any practice which will not bear the light, or look the world in the face.

—Antoninus.

5. The folly and the baseness of setting them on earthly things.

(35.) Mercies are love's messengers, sent from heaven to win our hearts to love again, and entice us thither. Our mercies therefore should be used to this end. That mercy that doth not increase, or excite and help our love, is abused and lost, as seed that is buried when it is sowed, and never more appeareth. Earthly mercies point to heaven, and tell us whence they come, and for what. Like the flowers of the spring, they tell us of the reviving approaches of the sun : but, like foolish children, because they are near us, we love the flowers better than the sun ; forgetting that the winter is drawing on.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(36.) Build your nest upon no tree here ; for you see God has sold the forest to Death ; and every tree whereupon we would rest is ready to be cut down, to the end we may flee and mount up, and build upon the rock, and dwell in the holes of the rock.

—Rutherford, 1661.

(37.) How many thousands exercise their affections and feelings without recognising God in them all. They much resemble a person who, being put into possession of a fine garden, should experience no other gratification than that of devouring greedily the fruits, regardless of the magnitude of the gift or the bounty of the giver.

—Salter.

(38.) Suppose a man builds a temple, with one seat in it very high and much ornamented, and another very far below it. You ask him for whom are those seats designed, and he replies, " Why, the most elevated one is for me, and the one below is for God." Now, in this case you can see the horrible absurdity and impiety of such conduct, and yet each one of you who continues impenitent is doing this. You have given yourselves the first place in your affections ; you have thought more of yourselves than of God, and have done more to please yourselves than to please God. In short, you have in everything preferred yourselves before Him.

—Payson.

6. They find rest only in God.

(39.) Every man must go out of himself for enjoyment. Something in this universe besides himself there must be to bind the affections of every man. There is that within us which compels us to attach ourselves to something outward. The choice is not this : love, or be without love. You cannot give the pent-up steam its choice of moving or not moving. It must move, one way or the other—the right way or the wrong way. Direct it right, and its energies roll the engine wheels smoothly on your track. Block up its passage, and it bounds away, a thing of madness and ruin. Stop it you cannot, it will rather burst. So it is with our hearts. There is a pent-up energy of love, gigantic for good or evil. Its right way is in the direction of our eternal Father, and then, let it boil and pant as it will, the course of the man is smooth. Expel the love of God from the bosom, what then ? Will the passion that is within cease to burn ? Nay, tie the man down, let there be no outlet for his affections, let him attach himself to nothing, and become a loveless spirit in the universe, and then there is what we call a broken heart—the steam bursts the machinery that contains it. Or else, let him take his course, unfettered and free, and then we have the riot of worldliness—a man of strong affections thrown off the line, tearing himself to pieces, and carrying desolation along with him.

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

7. It should be the chief endeavour of preachers to win the affections for God.

(40.) Come to the sensual and voluptuous person, and convince him that there is a necessity for his bidding farewell to all inordinate pleasure in order to his future happiness. Perhaps you gain his reason, and in some measure insinuate into his will ; but then his sensual desire interposes, and out-votes and ravel's all his convictions. As when, by much ado, a vessel is forced and rowed some pretty way contrary to the tide, presently a gust of wind comes and beats it farther back than it was before.

If Christ ever wins the fort of the soul, the conquest must begin here ; for the understanding and will seem to be like a castle or fortified place ; there is strength indeed in them, but the affections are the soldiers who manage those holds. The opposition is from these ; and if the soldiers surrender, the place itself, though never so strong, cannot resist.

—South, 1633-1716.

8. How they are to be won.

(41.) You cannot attempt to dislodge one object of earthly affection or pursuit without having some other and better to substitute in its room. It was a dictum of the old philosophy that nature abhors a vacuum, and this is as true regarding the moral as the material world. The dove of old, with weary wing, would have retained its unstable perch on the restless billow had it not known of an ark of safety. You cannot tempt the shivering child of want to desert his garret or rude shielding until you can promise him some kindlier and more substantial shelter. You cannot induce the prodigal to leave off the husks of his miserable desert exile before you can tell him of a father's house and welcome ; you cannot ask him to part with his squalid rags and tinsel ornaments until you can assure him of robe, and ring, and sandals. The husks and the tatters, wretched as they are, are better than nothing. In one of the islands on our northern coast a daring adventurer clambered down one of the steep cliffs, which rose perpendicular from the ocean, in search of eggs of some sea-fowl. The precarious parapet or ledge of rock on which he stood suddenly gave way, and with one giant bound plunged into the boiling surge beneath. In a moment the instinctive love of life made him spring from the yielding footing and lay hold on a branch of ivy which clung with uncertain tenacity to the precipice that rose sheer above him. Who would have had the madness or cruelty to shout to that wrestler for dear life to let go the treacherous ivy branch ? Worthless as it was, it was his only chance of safety ; and those on the summit of the cliff, the spectators of his imminent peril, were wise not by word or sign to disturb his grasp of what they anxiously felt might prove a brittle thread in these moments of suspense. But when a fleet foot had returned with the rope, and let it down by the side of the exhausted man, then, with no hesitating accents did they call upon him to let go the fragile support and lay hold of what brought him up safe to their feet. In the same way do we find the inspired writers dealing with the human soul. They never exhort to abhor that which is evil without telling of some objective "good" to which the heart can cleave instead. "Charge them that are rich in the world that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, BUT in the living God." "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world . . . The world passeth away, and the lust thereof; BUT he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever."

—Guthrie.

(42.) In the spangled sky, the rainbow, the woodland hung with diamonds, the sward sown with pearly dew, the rosy dawn, the golden clouds of even, the purple mountains, the hoary rock, the blue boundless main, Nature's simplest flower, or some fair form of laughing child or lovely maiden, we cannot see the beautiful without admiring it. That is one law of our nature. Another is, that so far as earthly objects are concerned, and apart from the beauty of holiness, we cannot help loving what is lovely, and regarding it with affection. Our affections are drawn to an attractive object as naturally as iron is charmed by a loadstone. God made us to love; and when brought near to such an object our feelings entwine themselves around it, as the soft and pliant tendrils of the vine do around the support it clothes with leaves, and hangs with purple clusters. Such analogy is there between the laws of mind and matter.

—Guthrie.

9. How they are to be controlled.

(43.) Draw off thy observation from deluding vanities, as if there were no such things before thee. When thou rememberest that there is a God, kings and nobles, riches and honours, and all the world should be forgotten in comparison of Him; and thou shouldst live as if there were no such things, if God appear not to thee in them. See them as if thou didst not see them, as thou seest a candle before the sun; or a pile of grass, or single dust in comparison with the earth. Hear them as if thou didst not hear them; as thou hearest not the leaves of the shaken tree at the same time with a clap of thunder. As greatest things obscure the least, so let the Being of the Infinite God so take up all the powers of thy soul, as if there were nothing else but He, when anything would draw thee from Him.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(44.) On board iron vessels it is a common thing to see a compass placed aloft, to be as much away from the cause of aberration as possible: a wise hint to us to elevate our affections and desires; the nearer to God, the less swayed by worldly influences.

—Spurgeon.

(45.) Seek for God in everything, and for everything in God. Only thus will you be able to bridle those cravings which else tear the heart. The presence of the King awes the crowd into silence. When the full moon is in the nightly sky, it makes the heavens bare of flying cloud-rack, and all the twinkling stars are lost in the peaceful, solitary splendour. So let delight in God rise in our souls, and lesser lights pale before it—do not cease to be, but add their feebleness, unnoticed, to its radiance. The more we have our affections set on God, the more we shall enjoy, because we subordinate His gifts. The less, too, shall we dread their loss, the less be at the mercy of their fluctuations. The capitalist does not think so much of the year's gains as the needy adventurer, to whom they make the difference between bankruptcy and competence. If you have God for your "enduring substance," you can face all varieties of condition, and be calm, saying:

"Give what Thou canst, without Thee I am poor,
And with Thee rich, take what Thou wilt away."

—MacLaren.

10. Their free exercise is necessary to give beauty to the religious life.

(46.) Christians, however exact and regular in the detail of duties, where the religious affections do not hold dominion, give an impression similar to that of leafless trees observed in winter, admirable for the distinct exhibition of their boughs so clearly defined, left destitute of all the soft, green, luxuriant foliage which is requisite to make a perfect tree. The affections which exist in such minds seem to have a bleak abode, somewhat like those deserted nests which you often see in such trees.

—Salter.

AFFLICTION.

I. OUR PRESENT PORTION.

(47.) When man prospereth, so that all things go well with him, yet it fareth with him as with a flower in the field, which flourisheth for a while, and is pleasant to look upon: within a little while after it drieth up and fadeth away.

As long as we are upon earth we are, as it were, in a camp or siege, where we must ever be skirmishing and fighting, and know neither who shall break out and give the onset against us, nor how, nor when.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(48.) The present state of life is subject to afflictions, as a seaman's life is subject to storms. "Man is born to trouble," he is heir-apparent to it; he comes into the world with a cry, and goes out with a groan.

—Watson, 1696.

(49.) The present life is an incurable disease, and sometimes attended with that sharp sense, that death is desired as a remedy, and accepted as a benefit. And though the saints have reviving cordials, yet their joys are mixed with many sorrows, nay, caused by sorrows. The tears of repentance are their sweetest refreshment. Here the living stones are cut and wounded, and made fit by sufferings for a temple unto God in the New Jerusalem. But as in the building of Solomon's temple, the noise of a hammer was not heard, for all the parts were framed before with that exact design and correspondence, that they firmly combined together; they were hewn in another place, and nothing remained but the putting them one upon another in the temple, and then, as sacred, they were inviolable: so God, the wise Architect, having prepared the saints here by many cutting afflictions, places them in the Eternal Building, where no voice of sorrow is heard.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

(50.) The Christian lives in the midst of crosses, as the fish lives in the sea.—Vianney.

(51.) When God built this world, He did not build a palace complete with appointments. This is a drill world. Men were not dropped down upon it like manna, fit to be gathered and used as it fell; but like seeds, to whom the plough is father, the furrow mother, and on which iron and stone, sickle, flail and mill, must act before they come to the loaf.

—Beecher.

II. ITS GRIEVOUSNESS.

(52.) Our imagination makes every day of our sorrow appear like Joshua's day, when the sun stood still in Gibeon. The summer of our delight is too short; but, oh, the winter of our affliction goes slowly off.

—Adams, 1654.

(53.) Sorrow commonly comes on horseback, but goes away on foot.

—Adams, 1654.

(54.) Every man feels, and not strangely, that there never were such experiences of life as his own. No joy was ever like our joy, no sorrow ever like our sorrow. Indeed, there is a kind of indignation excited in us when one likens our grief to his own. The soul is jealous of its experiences, and does not like pride to be humbled by the thought that they are common. For, though we know that the world groans and travails in pain, and has done so for ages, yet a groan heard by our ear is a very different thing from a groan uttered by our mouth. The sorrows of other men seem to us like clouds of rain that empty themselves in the distance, and whose long-travelling thunder comes to us mellowed and subdued; but our own troubles are like a storm bursting right overhead, and sending down its bolts upon us with direct plunge.

—Beecher.

(55.) We can recommend so persuasively the cheerful drinking of the cup of sorrow when in the hand of others, but what wry faces we make when put into our own!

—A. J. Morris.

III. ITS DESIGN.

1. To produce repentance and lead to amendment of life.

(56.) When Almighty God, for the merits of His son, not of any ireful mind, but of a loving heart towards us, doth correct us, He may be likened unto a father; as the natural father first teacheth his beloved child, and afterwards giveth him warning, and then correcteth him at last, even so the eternal God assayeth all manner of ways with us. First, He teacheth us His will through the preaching of His Word, and giveth us warning. Now, if so be that we will not follow Him, then He beateth us a little with a rod, with poverty, sickness, or with other afflictions, which should be esteemed as nothing else but children's rods or the wands of correction. If such a rod will not do any good, and his son waxeth stubborn, then taketh the father a whip or a stick, and beateth him till his bones crack; even so, when we wax obstinate and care neither for words nor stripes, then sendeth God unto us more heavy and universal plagues. All this He doth to drive us unto repentance and amendment of our lives. Now truth it is, that it is against the father's will to strike his child; he would much rather do him all the good that ever he could. Even so certainly, when God sendeth affliction upon our necks, there lieth hidden under that rod a fatherly affection. For the peculiar and natural property of God is to be loving and friendly, to heal, to help, and to do good to His children, mankind.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(57.) When the oil of spiritual grace will not mollify our iron hearts, then God makes them soft in the fiery furnace of tribulation. When they are such stiff grounds, that they are not fit for the seed of the Word, then He breaks up, ploughs, and harrows them with afflictions, that so they may become fruitful. And whereas, naturally, we are so blinded with self-love that we do not see our sins, and so puffed up with pride, that we will not confess them, when our eyes are anointed with this sharp eye salve of afflictions, we easily discern all our former wicked courses; and when our lofty hearts are pressed down with the weight of tribulations, then we humble ourselves before God, and acknowledge our sins.

—Downham, 1644.

(58.) What does God send forth His arrows for, and shoot this man with sickness, another with poverty, and a third with shame, but to reclaim and to recover them? to embitter the sweet morsels of sensuality to them, and to knock off their affections from sinful pleasure? For God makes not the miseries of men His recreation. It can be no diversion to the surgeon to hear the shrieks of him whom he is cutting for the stone; yet he goes on with his work, for he designs nothing but cure to the person whom he afflicts.

—South, 1633-1716.

(59.) By repentance is meant, in Scripture, change of life, alteration of habits, renewal of heart. This is the aim of all sorrow. The consequences of sin are meant to wean from sin. The penalty annexed to it is, in the first instance, corrective, not penal. Fire burns the child, to teach it one of the truths of this universe—the property of fire to burn. The fever in the veins and the headache which succeed intoxication, are meant to warn against excess. On the first occasion they are simply corrective; in every succeeding one they assume more and more a penal character, in proportion as the conscience carries with them the sense of ill desert. Sorrow, then, has done its work when it deters from evil; in other words, when it works repentance.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

2. To prevent us from going astray.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(61.) We are furthered by our afflictions in attaining to heavenly happiness, as they are used by God to keep us in the way of righteousness which leads to it. For, whereas by our natural corruption we are ready to wander into the bye-paths of sin, being allured by the enticing baits of worldly vanities, the Lord makes afflictions to serve us as a thorny hedge and strong fence to keep us in our right course.

And when, sailing in the sea of this miserable world towards the haven of everlasting rest, we are ready to listen to the sweet syren tunes of carnal pleasures, and leaping out of our ship of safety, the true and invisible Church, to perish, by adhering to them in the gulf of destruction, God in love to us uses our afflictions, as wax to stop our ears, that we may not hearken to these bewitching songs, but may without distraction hold on our course, which will bring us at the last to the port of blessedness.

—Downname, 1644.

(62.) The Lord takes away from His children worldly honours, when He sees that they would by them be puffed up with pride. Thus He deprives them of riches, when they would be unto them thorns to choke and hinder the growth of His heavenly grace, or provocations and incitements to sin, or the means and instruments to further them in wicked actions, or, like camels' hunches, hinder them from entering into the strait gate which leads to happiness. Thus, He takes from us parents, children, and dear friends, when, if we should still enjoy them, we would make them our idols, setting our hearts upon, loving, or trusting in them more than in God Himself. So He deprives us of our earthly pleasures when He sees that we would prefer them before heavenly joys; and causes us to find many crosses in the world, because He knows that if it should smile and fawn upon us, we would make a paradise of the place of our pilgrimage, set our affections upon these transitory trifles, and never care to travel in the way of holiness which leads to our heavenly country.

As, therefore, the skilful physician does not only apply medicines for the curing of diseases when men are fallen into them, but also in time of infection, and when they see some distemper in them through the abounding of humours, give wholesome preservatives to maintain health; so our Heavenly Physician uses these portions of affliction, not only to cure us of the diseases of sin, when we are fallen into them, but also to purge away our inward corruptions, and so to prevent these deadly sicknesses of the soul, before they have seized upon us, and to free us from all causes and other sins which would otherwise bring us into this dangerous condition.

—Downname, 1644.

(63.) We who were wild branches barren of all good fruit of holiness, are through God's infinite mercy ingrafted into the true Vine, Jesus Christ, from whom receiving all our grace and sap, we are enabled to bring forth the pleasant grapes of new obedience. Yet, if we were left alone, and suffered to run out with uncontrolled liberty, we would, like the vine which is never pruned, return to our old natural wildness, and bring forth no other fruit than those sour grapes of iniquity and sin; therefore our heavenly Vintager, for His own glory and our good, cuts away the superfluities of our licentious liberty, and prunes us with this knife of affliction, that being kept short in our carnal desires, we may become more fruitful in all holy duties (John xv. 1, 2).

—Downname, 1644.

(64.) It may be that thy outward comforts are taken from thee that God may be all in all to thee. It may be while thou hadst these things they did share with God in thy affections; a great part of the stream of thy affection ran that way. Now the Lord would not have the affections of His children to run waste; He does not care for other men's affections, but thine, they are precious, and God would not have them run waste. Therefore He cuts off thy other pipes, that thy heart may run wholly upon Him. If you perceive that one of your servants, because she feeds and tends them, steals away the hearts of your children, you will hardly be able to bear it; you would be ready to turn away such a servant. And when the servant is gone, the child is at a great loss, it has not the nurse. But the mother intends by her putting away that the affections of the child might run the more strongly towards herself; and what loss has the child, that the affections that ran in a rough channel before towards the servant run towards the mother? So those affections that run towards the creature God would have them run toward Himself, that so He may be all in all to thee here in this world. And a gracious heart can indeed tell how to enjoy God so as that God shall be all in all to it: that is the happiness of heaven to have God to be all in all. —Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(65.) The best ground untilld soonest runs out rank weeds. Such are God's children, overgrown with security ere they are aware, unless they be well exercised, both with God's plough of affliction and their own industry of meditation.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

3. To recall us to duty and true happiness.

(66.) There is never a schoolmaster taketh any scholar, but he will make these conditions with him expressly: that the lad shall not be self-willed, but with all possible diligence shall take heed unto that which the master teacheth him; and if he will be negligent, or play the truant, if he, being his master, should punish him therefore, that he be content to take it patiently. The master doth not punish his scholar for any malice towards him, but only that he should learn better afterward. Even so Christ receiveth no disciple but He maketh conditions with him most necessary for every Christian man, which are expressed in Matthew xvi. 24. The Word of God ought to be the only rule whereby we should be ordered; but we had rather to follow our own head, by the means whereof oftentimes we go away; and therefore the Heavenly Schoolmaster knappeth us on the fingers till we apprehend and learn His will more perfectly.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(67.) When a horse-breaker giveth unto a lusty young horse too much of the bridle, he is wild and wanton, and goeth not well, and in a slippery place might fall headlong: even so, if our Creator should give us too large liberty, we should soon wax wild; and it might happen that we should destroy ourselves; therefore He giveth us a sharp bit in our mouths, and helpeth us to bridle our flesh, that the noble and precious soul perish not.

Again, as the carter jerketh his horses with the whip, and striketh them sharply when they will not go forward, and yet spareth them also, that he may enjoy them the longer; even so God striketh us when we do not right, and yet spareth us, and will not make utterly an end of us.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(68.) If a sheep stray from his fellows, the shepherd sets his dog after it, not to devour it, but to bring it in again; even so our Heavenly Shepherd, if any of us, His sheep, disobey Him, sets His dog of affliction after us, not to hurt us, but to bring us home to consideration of our duty towards Him. Now, His dogs be poverty, &c.

—Caudray, 1598-1644.

(69.) Afflictions make us most frequent and fervent in pouring forth our supplications unto God. In our prosperity we either utterly neglect this duty, or perform it carelessly and slothfully; but when we are brought into calamities we flee to Him by earnest prayer, craving His aid and help. And as the child fearing nothing is so fond of his play, that he strays and wanders from his mother ; not so much as thinking of her ; but if he be scared or frightened with the sight or apprehension of some apparent or approaching danger, presently runs to her, casts himself into her arms and cries out to be saved and shielded by her : so we, securely enjoying the childish sports of worldly prosperity, do so fondly dote on them that we scarce think of our Heavenly Father ; but when perils approach, and are ready to seize upon us, then we flee to Him and cast ourselves into the arms of His protection, crying to Him by earnest prayer for help in our extremity.

—Downname, 1644.

(70.) Like the passengers through the tunnelled Alp, from the dark, and the cold, and the stifling air, emerging on the broad light-flooded plains of Lombardy, it is often by a way which they know not, gloomy and underground, that the convoy is carried which God's Spirit is bringing to the wealthy place ; and your present grief you will have no reason to regret, if it introduce you to God's friendship, and to joys which do not perish in the using. It may not have struck you, but you have been trying to create your own Eden, and it was an Eden with the living God left out. For a time the experiment seemed to prosper, but if it is blighted you have no right to complain ; and though it should never blossom again, even the howling wilderness does you a service, if it makes you a pilgrim and turns your face to the better land. Affliction is God's message. This mighty famine is no accident : it is God's voice sounding through the bare country, and saying to you, Come Home.

—Hamilton, 1814-1861.

4. To restore us to spiritual health.

(71.) The surgeon must cut away the rotten and dead flesh, that the whole body be not poisoned, and so perish ; even so doth God sometimes plague our bodies grievously, that our souls may be preserved and healed. How deep soever God thrusteth His iron into our flesh, He doth it only to heal us ; and if it be so that He kill us, then will He bring us to the right life. The physician employeth poison to drive out another : even so God, in correcting us, useth the devil and wicked people, but yet all to do us good.

As long as the physician hath any hope of the recovery of his patient, he assayeth all manner of means and medicines with him, as well sour and sharp as sweet and pleasant ; but as soon as ever he beginneth to doubt of his recovery, he suffereth him to have whatsoever himself desireth. Even so the Heavenly Physician, as long as He hath any hope to recover us, will not always suffer us to have what we most desire ; but as soon as He hath no more hope of us, then He suffereth us for a time to enjoy all our own pleasure (Isa. i. 5).

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(72.) Such is our natural corruption, that we are easily made wanton with the fruition of God's blessings. Therefore the Lord is after a sort enforced to correct us, that by sorrow and smart He may bring us to know ourselves, and to remember Him. As the wise and faithful physician is constrained, upon the necessity of recovering his patient's health, to prescribe to him abstinence after surfeiting, and bitter potions, when he finds his body distempered with corrupt humours : so upon the like necessity of recovering our spiritual health, the Lord is fain, when we surfeit upon His blessings, to withdraw them from us, and to appoint us a shorter diet ; and when He sees our souls full of corruptions, to give us these bitter potions of afflictions that the poison of sin may be expelled, and we freed from the danger of everlasting death.

And as in these regards there is necessity of sending these afflictions in respect of every particular faithful man, so also in regard of the whole Church in general. For as it is never more spiritually poor and lean, than when it is pampered in worldly pomp and prosperity ; so it is never richer, or in better liking, than when it is outwardly pinched with misery and affliction. And as by too much fulness, it falls into consumption, and by being too rank is easier laid with every storm of temptation, so it grows fatter by fasting, prospers better when it is bitten and snipped.

—Downname, 1644.

(73.) Sickness is God's lance to let out the imposthume of sin (Isa. xxvii. 9). —Watson, 1696.

(74.) It is a sword which pierces the heart, and makes the corrupted matter flow from it.

—Massillon.

5. To test our character and Christian profession.

(75.) By trouble will God prove and assay how deep thy heart hath entered with God, how much thy faith is able to bear, whether thou canst forsake both thyself and all other creatures in the world for His sake. He will try how thou wilt behave thyself, when He taketh utterly from thee that where-in thou most delightest. God knoweth well enough before, how thou wilt take it and behave thyself ; but He will show and declare to thyself and to others also, what is in thee. A man cannot learn to know a stout man of war in the time of peace, but best of all in the time of war. When a great tempest ariseth in the sea, then doth it appear whether the shipmaster be cunning in ruling the stern or no.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(76.) The Lord tries us with afflictions, to make it known whether we be sound Christians, or whether we deceive both ourselves and others with shadows only. Our Saviour has taught us in the parable, that there are some hearers like unto the stony ground, who receive the seed of the Word with joy, and bring forth a fair green blade of an outward profession, but yet, having no root in themselves, when the hot sun of affliction shines upon them, wither and fall away. That these time-serving hypocrites may be discerned from true professors, He causes this sun of tribulation to arise.

We profess to be gold fit for God's treasury, and corn meet for the garners of eternal blessedness ; and yet there is among us more dross than gold, and more chaff than wheat. Therefore the Lord casts us into the furnace of affliction, that the pure metal may be tried, and in trial purified ; and that the drossy substance may be severed, and in the separation consumed : and fans and winnows us with the strong wind of tribulation, that the chaff may be blown away, and the pure corn remain for His own use.

We profess ourselves trees planted by God's own hand in His garden of grace, and houses fit for His own dwelling, which have a good ground and sure foundation, even the rock Jesus Christ : whereas in truth there are many plants of the devil's setting, which have no other hold but the weak and short roots of carnal ends and worldly respects, which are there planted by Satan to hinder the growth, to suck away the nourishment, and to shade and annoy, disorder and disgrace those fruitful and choice trees of God's own grafting; and many houses which are not built upon the rock Christ, but upon the sands of human inventions and traditions, upon the examples of their superiors or their own good meaning and ungrounded superstition. Therefore the Lord causes the winds to blow, and the tempestuous storms of troubles to arise, that His own trees may take the more deep rooting; that those plants of Satan's setting may be overturned and rooted up; that the temples of His own erecting for the habitation of His Holy Spirit may by their standing in all these storms, approve the skill of the workmaster; and that these chapels of the devil, which, being gilt by hypocrisy, make no less a show, may be overturned and utterly ruined.

Finally, we profess to be soldiers of the Church militant, fighting under the standard of the Lord of Hosts. Therefore the Lord suffers Satan and the world to assault us with afflictions and persecutions to try whether we be traitors, who upon the first encounter will join with the enemy, or true-hearted soldiers, who will live and die in our Lord's quarrel; whether we be such cowards and dastards as will presently yield at the first onset, though before we have made many brags of our strength and valour, or such courageous and magnanimous spirits as will not fly back one foot to save our lives. And thus our Saviour tried the young man in the Gospel, who though he seemed at the first sight a great worthy of undaunted courage, yet when our Saviour did but speak of those two enemies, poverty and the cross, at the very naming of them he was discomfited, and ran away (Matt. xix. 16-22). —Downname, 1644.

(77.) Gold is both the fairest and most solid of all metals, yet is the soonest melted with the fire: others, as they are coarser, so more churlish and hard to be wrought on by a dissolution. Thus a sound and a good heart is easily melted into fear and sorrow for sin by the sense of God's judgments, whereas the carnal mind is stubborn and remorseless.

(78.) A sanctified person, like a silver bell, the harder he is smitten, the better he sounds.

—Sumnock, 1673.

(79.) The design of God in all the afflictions that befall His people is only to try them; it is not to wrong them nor to ruin them, as ignorant souls are apt to think. "He knoweth the way that I take; when He hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold," says patient Job. So in Deut. viii. 2, "Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee and to prove thee, to know what was in thy heart, whether thou wouldest keep His commandments or no." God afflicted them thus, that He might make known to themselves and others what was in their hearts. When fire is put to green wood, there comes out abundance of watery stuff that before appeared not; when the pond is empty, the mud, filth, and toads come to light. The snow covers many a dunghill, so does prosperity many a rotten heart. It is easy to wade in a warm bath, and every bird can sing on a sunny day. Hard weather tries what health we have; afflictions try what sap we have, what grace we have. Withered leaves soon fall off in windy weather; rotten boughs quickly break with heavy weights. Afflictions are like pinching frosts that will search us: where we are most unsound we shall the soonest complain; and where most corruptions lie we shall the soonest shrink.

—Brooks, 1680.

(80.) Sharp afflictions are to the soul as a soaking rain to the house; we know not that there are such holes in the house, till the shower comes, and then we see it drop down here and there; so we before did not know that there were such unmortified lusts in the soul, till the storm of affliction comes, then we spy unbelief, impatience, carnal fear, we see it drop down in many places.

—Watson, 1696.

(81.) Every man will have his own criterion in forming his judgment of others. I depend very much on the effect of affliction. I consider how a man comes out of the furnace: gold will lie for a month in the furnace without losing a grain. And, while under trial, a child has a habit of turning to his father: he is not like a penitent who has been whipped into this state; it is natural to him. It is dark, and the child has no whither to run but to his father.

—Cecil, 1743-1810.

(82.) A man who swims upon bladders is apt to conceive that he could easily dispense with the support and still keep his head above the waters; nor is it easy to ascertain what resources he had in himself for swimming until the artificial support is withdrawn. Let me say that, by way of making trial of His children, or ascertaining, or rather of certifying to themselves (for He must know without being certified) how far they have their treasure in heaven, and set their affections on things above, God sometimes removes our earthly treasures, and withdraws one or more of the swimming bladders. He strikes perhaps with His dart some friend or relation who was dear to us as our own soul, and to whom our affections were beginning to cleave idolatrously.

—Goulburn.

6. To measure the progress we have made in the Divine Life.

(83.) As we are tried with afflictions, whether we be true Christians or no; so also thereby God shows unto what measure of grace we have attained. For, as when we are winnowed with the wind of affliction every small blast is sufficient to drive away the chaff, so when a stronger gale blows, there is a second division made; for howsoever the weaker and stronger Christians remain together, as it were in the same heap, yet when any strong blast of temptation blows, those that are weaker in grace, like the light corn, fly back, whereas the stronger keep their place, like the purer wheat and weightier grain, with undaunted courage.

—Downname.

(84.) By afflictions the Lord discovers how much we are weaned in our affections from the world. For as the grain of corn, which is full and ripe, is no sooner touched with the flail, but presently flies from the straw; while if it be small and light it is beaten out with much more difficulty; but if it be altogether empty and unripe it remains in the straw, and is cast out with it: so those who adhere to worldly delights, like the corn to the ear, if they be full of grace and ripe in godliness, are with the least touch of this flail of afflictions severed from the world; whereas if they have made as yet small progress in holiness, they are not weaned from these worldly vanities, except they be much beaten with many crosses; but if they be quite empty of grace, then they in their affections stick so fast to the things of this life, that though they be never so much beaten with tribulations, they cannot be disjoined, and so are rejected of God, perishing together with these transitory evils, because they will not be divided from them. —Downname, 1644.

7. To purify the people of God.

(85.) Whilst we lie at ease, we become, like standing waters, corrupt and noisome, and are fit to bring forth nothing but those toads and venomous serpents of sin; but when we are stirred and troubled, or have a passage and current over the sands and stones of affliction, then are we purified from the slime of corruption, and attain to crystalline purity. —Downname, 1644.

(86.) God says by His prophet to His sinful people, "I will turn My hand upon thee, and purely purge away thy dross, and take away all thy tin," Isa. i. 25. With which consideration Augustine comforts himself, because his tribulation was but his purgation, whereby he was freed from the dross of sin. For which purpose the Lord, like a skilful goldsmith, uses the world for His furnace, the devil and wicked men as straw and fuel to maintain this fire of affliction, who do but consume themselves whilst they purify God's elect, like gold, from the dross of their corruptions. —Downname, 1644.

(87.) Sharp afflictions are a fire to purge out our dross, and to make our graces shine; they are a potion to carry away ill-humours; they are cold frosts, to destroy the vermin; they are like the north wind, that dries up the vapours, that purges the blood, and quickens the spirits; they are a sharp corrosive, to eat out the dead flesh. Afflictions are compared to baptizing and washing, that take away the filth of the soul, as water does the filth of the body (Matt. x. 38, 39.) God would not rub so hard, were it not to fetch out the dirt and spots that be in His people's hearts. —Brooks, 1680.

(88.) Affliction is God's flail to thresh off our husks; it is a means God useth to purge out sloth, luxury, pride, and love of the world. "God's furnace is in Zion," Isa. xxxi. 9. This is not to consume, but to refine: what if we have more affliction, if by this means we have less sin. —Watson, 1696.

(89.) Human nature is very much like some elements of vegetation. In tapioca, one of the most harmless of all articles of food, there is one of the most deadly of all poisons; but the poison is of such a volatile nature, that when it is subjected to heat it escapes, and leaves only the nutriment of the starch. I think that the heart of man originally is full of poison, but that when it is tried by affliction, little by little the poison, the rancour, the virus exhales, and leaves all the rest wholesome indeed. —Beecher.

(90.) Upon a glowing fire rested a crucible, at the bottom of which lay a piece of gold. More and more intense became the flame; hotter, and still more heated, grew the vessel—and then the precious metal melted, till it trickled like water.

"Unfortunate creature that I am, to have been cast into this place!" it cried.

"No; not unfortunate," replied the Furnace. "Is it not my misfortune to be such a sufferer?" said the Gold.

"Not your misfortune," answered the Furnace. "I shall certainly be consumed!" exclaimed the Gold.

"No; not consumed," said the Furnace.

"Alas! you have no consideration for me, surely!" observed the tried Gold.

"I am truly concerned for your best welfare," replied the Furnace.

"Then why must I suffer this agony?" asked the glittering Gold.

"It is to purge away your dross, that you may be purer, and therefore more valuable," answered the Furnace.

"Oh! when will it be ended?" said the Gold, stirred at the bottom of the crucible.

"As soon as possible; but not a moment before the good purpose is accomplished," kindly remarked the Furnace.

"How may it be known?" inquired the Gold, which increased in brightness.

"Immediately that the watchful Refiner, who is sitting by, shall see His face reflected in you," replied the Furnace, "at which instant the process will end, and you come forth the better and richer for the fire." —Bowden.

8. To develop and display the graces of God's people.

(91.) If, as Chrysostom affirms, Satan had not pierced, and, as it were, bored holes through the body of Job, with all those plagues and punishments which he inflicted upon him, the bright beams of his graces would have been hidden within him, and would not have shined unto us. If he had not sat down in ashes, we had never come to the knowledge of his spiritual riches. —Downname, 1644.

(92.) If, like spices, we be pounded in the mortar of affliction, the odoriferous smell of our spiritual graces, which before were scarcely discerned, now spreads abroad, to the comfort and refreshing of all that stand about us. And whereas if, like roses, we grow untouched, we do but for the present send forth some sweet smell to those who are next to us; contrariwise, if we be distilled with the fire of affliction, we shall yield sweet waters of durable comfort even to those who are far distant, and to such as live in after ages, when by report this sweet odour of our fame shall come to them (Phil. i. 13, 14). —Downname, 1641.

We beat back the flame, not with a purpose to suppress it, but to raise it higher, and to diffuse it more.

Those afflictions and repulses which seem to be discouragements are indeed the merciful incitements of grace. If God did mean judgment to my soul, He would either withdraw the fuel or pour water upon the fire, or suffer it to languish for want of new motion; but now that He continues to me the means and opportunities and desires of good, I shall misconstrue the intentions of my God, if I shall think His crosses sent rather to damp than to quicken His Spirit in me.

O God, if Thy bellows did not sometimes thus breathe upon me in spiritual repercussions, I should have just cause to suspect my estate. Those few weak gleeds of grace that are in me might soon go out if they were not thus refreshed. Still blow upon them till they kindle, still kindle them till they flame up to Thee.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(94.) A youth who had a lighted link in his hand being offended thereat because it burnt so dark and dim, the better to improve the light thereof he beat, bruised, and battered it against the wall, that the wick therein might be spread out, and the pitch, with other combustible matter, which before stifled the light with its over-stiffness, might be loosened, which presently caused the link to blaze forth in a brighter flame. Thus God deals with our souls: that they may shine the brighter before men, He buffets and afflicts us with several temptations, to give us occasion to exercise those graces which otherwise would lie dormant within us; and such corrections will, in fine, greatly add to our spiritual life and lustre.
—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(95.) Grace in the saints is often as fire hid in the embers, affliction is the bellows to blow it up into a flame. The Lord makes the house of bondage a friend to our grace: now faith and patience act their part; the darkness of the night cannot hinder the brightness of a star: so, the more the diamond is cut, the more it sparkles; and the more God afflicts us, the more our graces cast a sparkling lustre.
—Watson, 1696.

(96.) God delights to see grace in us at all times; but He loves not to see it latent. He desires it to be in exercise. And in order to bring it into exercise He uses the instrumentality of suffering. The leaves of the aromatic plant shed but a faint odour, as they wave in the air. The gold shines scarcely at all as it lies hid in the ore. The rugged crust of the pebble conceals from the eye its interior beauty. But let the aromatic leaf be crushed; let the ore be submitted to the furnace; let the pebble be cut and polished; and the fragrance, the splendour, the fair colours are then brought out:—

"This leaf? This stone? It is thy heart:
It must be crushed by pain and smart,
It must be cleansed by sorrow's art—
Ere it will yield a fragrance sweet,
Ere it will shine, a jewel meet
To lay before thy dear Lord's feet."
—Goulburn.

(97.) Who is there that does not know that there is a joy higher and more stately than is known to our ordinary experience? There are some natures that only tempest can bring out. I recollect being strongly impressed on reading the account of an old castle in Germany with two towers that stood upright and far apart, between which an old baron stretched large wires, thus making a huge Æolian harp. There were the wires suspended, and the summer breezes played through them, but there was no vibration. Common winds, not having power enough to move them, split, and went through them without a whistle. But when there came along great tempest-winds, and the heaven was black, and the air resounded, then these winds, with giant touch, swept through the wires, which began to ring and roar, and pour out sublime melodies.

So God stretches the chords in the human soul which ordinary influence do not vibrate; but now and then great tempests sweep them through, and men are conscious that tones are produced in them which could not have been produced except by some such storm-handling.
—Becher.

(98.) The harp holds in its wires the possibilities of noblest chords; yet, if they be not struck, they must hang dull and useless. So the mind is vested with a hundred powers, that must be smitten by a heavy hand to prove themselves the offspring of Divinity.

9. To prepare our hearts for the reception of Divine truth.

(99.) As it is not only the property of the plough to root up all briars and weeds out of the arable land, but also to prepare the same to receive the seed when it shall be sown upon it: so likewise it is the quality of affliction, not only to root out of the earthly heart of man all the weeds of concupiscence and worldly delights, but also to make ready his heart and soul to receive the wholesome seed of Christ's doctrine, when it is by His faithful ministers preached.
—Cawdray, 1598-1664.

(100.) "Unaccountable this!" said the Wax, as from the flame, it dropped melting upon the paper beneath.

"Do not grieve," said the Taper, "I am sure it is all right."

"I was never in such agony!" exclaimed the Wax, still dropping.

"It is not without a good design, and will end well," replied the Taper.

The Wax was unable to reply at the moment owing to a strong pressure; and when it again looked up, it wore a beautiful impression, the counterpart of the seal which had been applied unto it.

"Ah! I comprehend now," said the Wax, no longer in suffering; "I was softened in order to receive this lovely durable impress. Yes, I see now it was all right, because it has given to me the beautiful likeness which I could not otherwise have obtained."

Afflictions are in the hand of the Holy Spirit, to effect the softening of the heart in order to receive heavenly impression. Job said: "God maketh my heart soft" (23, 16).

As the wax in its naturally hard state cannot take the impress of the signet, and needs to be melted to render it susceptible, so the believer is by sanctified trials prepared to receive, and made to bear, the Divine likeness. "In whom also after that ye believed (says the apostle), ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise" (Eph. i. 13). "Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts" (2 Cor. i. 22).
—Bowden.

10. To prepare us for greater usefulness and fruitfulness.

(101.) If the gardener cut off the knobs and the crooked boughs from the trees in his garden, and loppeth them a little, yet as long as the roots remain, the trees are never the worse, but wax nevertheless, and bring forth fruit: even so doth God lop and hew the crabby old Adam with the cross, not to the intent to harm us, but to keep us in awe, and to teach us godly manners. And surely, as long as the root of faith remaineth with us, though we be spoiled of all riches, and of all manner of worldly comfort, yet shall we bring forth good fruits to the high honour of God's holy name.
—Wermullerus, 1551.

(102.) God's ploughing of us by affliction is to kill the weeds of sin; His harrowing of us is to break the hard clods of impenitency, that the heart may be the fitter to receive the seeds of grace; and if this be all, why should we be discontented?

—Watson, 1696.

(103.) God's stretching the strings of His viol, is to make the music better.

—Watson, 1696.

(104.) It is possible that the most generous of plants, fixed in the richest soil, and visited with the most benign influence of sun and weather, may yet not fructify till they are pruned, and rid of those superfluous branches and suckers which steal and intercept that sap, which, according to the prime intention of nature, should pass into fruit. And therefore the great Husbandman of souls takes this course with His spiritual vines, to add the pruning-hook of His judgments to the more gentle manuring of His mercy.

—South, 1633-1716.

(105.) Creature comforts are often to the soul what suckers are to a tree, and God takes off those that this may thrive.

—Ryland.

(106.) Earthly suffering seems to weaken men, to discourage them, and to destroy them; but the fact is that it does not really destroy or weaken them. That part in us which suffering weakens is usually that very part which ought to be weakened.

The great trouble in turning flax into thread or cloth is caused by that which gives the green plant its very power; for when the flax is growing it needs two things: one is its ligneous or woody structure, and the other is its gluten. But when it has grown enough, and man wants it to make garments, to furnish the queen in the palace and the peasant in the cottage, he must get rid of these two things. And how is the flax separated from them? It is plucked and thrown into the field, that under the influence of repeated rains and dews, the wood may rot; then the flax is taken and put through the brakes until every particle of the stiffness and strength that it had is destroyed, and all but the stringy fibres can be shaken to the winds; then it is subjected to certain chemical processes by which the gluten is taken away; and not till then is it in a proper condition to be carried to the spinning-wheel and the loom, and manufactured into materials for use.

So it is with men. There are a great many qualities which they need up to a certain point, but which beyond that are a disadvantage to them. We need a given amount of self-will and independence; but after these qualities have been carried to a certain point, the necessity for them measurably ceases, and there must be superinduced on them opposite qualities. For man is made up of contraries. He is to be as firm as iron, and as yielding as silk; he is to be persevering, and yet the most ready to give up; he is to be as steadfast as a mountain, and yet easy to be entreated; he is to abhor evil, and yet to love with an ineffable love; he is to be courageous, and yet to have that fear of the Lord which is the beginning of wisdom. Certain qualities, when they have served their purpose, must give place to opposite qualities. Afflictions, under the supervision of Divine Providence, are working out in those that are exercised thereby beneficial results; so that suffering, while it seems frequently to be wasting and destroying men, is only wasting and destroying that part of them which they are better without than with.

—Becher.

(107.) An inexperienced young miser, we will suppose, inherits the Almaden mine. Great heaps of ore are thrown out, and he goes and looks at it, and says, "I am a mountain rich." He gives directions to have this ore prepared for market. The labourers take it and throw it into the furnace; and he watches the process with greedy eye, saying, "What! putting my precious silver in the fire?" And it begins to melt, and flow out, and grow less and less; he is appalled to see how it is wasting away. But the men that smelt it laugh, and say, "You have lost nothing; you have gained by as much as it has shrunk; for it was nothing but ore, and nine-tenths of it was good for nothing, and that which was good was so tied up that it could not serve you at all. It was necessary that you should lose nine-tenths of it in order that you might have the benefit of the other tenth."

In this life, that which seems to men to be wasted and destroyed, is frequently that which they can better afford to lose than to keep.

—Becher.

(108.) What can differ more than the aspect of the on-coming and the whole phenomenon of a summer's rain, and its actual after results? The sun goes out. Birds cease their singing. Low and terrific sounds and voices, vengeful thunders, are in the air. Great winds come as avant-couriers, sweeping onward, and causing the trees to groan and writhe as if in pain. Weakly leaves are shredded off and hurled hither and thither. All beasts hide themselves. Everything looks dark as the judgment day. Then comes, with mighty roar, the outpouring and beating rain, that still further shreds off the leaves, and tears the trees, and beats down the grass, and overwhelms the grain, and dishelves the flowers. In the midst of this storm let a man look out, and he will sceptically say, "Is this the refreshment of Nature? Is this the cup that is put to the lips of flowers that they may drink and be revived?" And yet let the hour go by; let all its gloomy works and seemings be swept away with it; let the sun re-appear; let the birds begin to sing again; let the trees shake themselves of drops of rain; let the grass lift itself up once more, and then man will instinctively praise God for that which before seemed to be only a process of destruction. The storm seems to have gone; but it has not gone. Those things which at first appeared—all the external signs of fury—these have passed away; and now the storm is at work on the root, and every blade of grass is drawing, and every tree is pumping, and every flower is drinking. Who could have cleansed the air as that breathing wind has? Who could have swept the vapours out of the heavens as that tornado has? Who, by any appliance of human skill, could have watered the acres as that rain has? Who could have given new life to the wasting herbage as that thunder-storm has, which went tramping through the valley and the wilderness apparently a messenger of evil? One hour after it is gone all things silently thank God that one hour before shuddered and trembled, and said, "Hast Thou forgotten to be gracious?"

So it is with the ministrations of suffering and sorrow. While the storm pelts, men shrink. While the thunder sounds, they slink down. While the tempest rages, it is as if they were ruined. But when the violence abates a little, they begin to lift up their head, and to perceive that it was not all dark, that it was not all thunder, that it was not all beating, that there was an element of good in it; and gradually they learn the sweet bounty and benefit that God meant to bestow upon them by afflictions.

(109.) When trees grow so that their branches are mostly on one side, we never restore branches to the deficient side by cutting the opposite side. We cut the most barren side, and there Nature, in seeking to restore what we cut, drives out new buds and branches. The gardener knows that where he puts the knife, there will follow the fruit of the tree. And blessed are they whom the Heavenly Husbandman prunes, that they may bring forth more fruit, if, when He cuts, there is a bud behind the knife; but, woe to them who, being cut, have no bud to grow, and are more disbranched and barren for being pruned.

—Becher.

11. To wean us from the world.

(110.) Two lessons principally God would teach you by affliction:—

First, That your affections be taken off from earthly possessions. When Israel doted on Egypt as a place, God made it an iron furnace to make them weary of it. The creature is our idol by nature, but infinite wisdom makes it our grief, that it may not be our God. When children fare well abroad, they are mindless of home; but when abused by strangers, they hasten to their parents. The world is therefore a purgatory, that it might not be our paradise. As soon as Laban frowned on Jacob, he talks of returning to his father's house. Every rout the world puts us to sounds a retreat to our affections, and calls off our heart from the eager pursuit of these withering vanities.

Secondly, That you choose the good part that shall never be taken from you. Man's heart will be fixed on somewhat as its hope and happiness. God therefore puts out our candles, that we may look up to the sun. When we are delving in the earth to find content, He sends damp, purposely to make us call to be drawn upward. Till the prodigal met with a famine, he regarded not his father. If the waters be abated, the dove is apt to wander and defile herself; but when they cover the face of the earth and allow her no rest, then she returns to the ark.

(111.) We are the children of the Great King, but we were sold unto slavery before we were born, and we know not the estate of the first-born. As if the children of her Majesty should sell themselves into slavery, without knowing what slavery is, in the hope of improving their condition: so it was with God's first-born of mankind. By their birth-right they had dominion over all powers and elements; but by the powers, which they should have held captive, they were taken captive.

Bitterly as her Majesty's children would feel the change, the next generation would have a very different sense of it. On hearing what their original condition was, it might kindle a wish in them that their parents had been wise enough to keep their first estate. To the later generations of the royal children the state of slavery would be quite natural. They would hardly be able to conceive that their normal, or original natural condition was so widely different from that into which they were born. This is the case with mankind. They are a late generation, and they have not an idea of what their original condition was. It is so long since the glory departed from them, that they know not is what their royalty consisted. The unnatural is become so natural to them, that they have a far stronger inclination to remain as they are, than to undergo a re-birth in order to be restored to their first estate.

It is fortunate that this strange country behaves so ill to them, or they would never inquire for the royal home-lands. It is a good thing that in their new and fallen condition they sicken and suffer. It is a good thing that the elements of nature, which have got the mastery over them, often oppress and scourge them, and in the end deprive them of all the goods which they have lusted after. It is a good thing that, in this cruel house of bondage, the final recompense which the powers that be confer on their devoted slaves, is to turn them into dead clay. Were it not for hard usage the foolish slaves would never be weaned in heart from the land of Egypt.

—Pulsford.

12. To prepare us for eternal glory.

(112.) The vessels of mercy are seasoned with affliction, and then the wine of glory is poured in.

—Watson, 1696.

(113.) "Oh dear! don't;" said the Stone to the Chisel, which was cutting and modelling it into certain forms and proportions. "These heavy blows are very terrible to bear; besides, I am at a loss to imagine where the necessity is for my being subjected to such coarse and severe treatment. Oh dear! pray, do desist!"

"You are intended to fill a place in yonder building, which, when finished, will be a splendid mansion," answered the Chisel with another sharp stroke.

"Oh dear! worse and worse!" cried the Stone shuddering under the blow which struck off a further rough part. "But, if so designed, why not put me into my place at once, without this suffering?"

"You are not fit for it," replied the Chisel, still going on with its work. "Don't you see that all the stones in the building have undergone a shaping process?"

"How long must I suffer it?" asked the Stone sorrowfully.

"Only till all that is unsuitable and improper shall be removed," replied the Chisel, "and when made meet for the high situation you are to occupy, you will be added unto the others, and be as beautiful as they."

"To insert the stones in their roughness, as taken from the quarry, would be an incongruity and moral impossibility. None are built up in their natural condition and without preparation. The plan of the house has been drawn by the 'Wise Master Builder;' unto which design every part must be brought, by working the materials into their several forms and dimensions, which are then added to the structure. And when all is finished, the topstone will be brought forth, with shoutings, crying, Grace, grace unto it!" (Zech. iv. 7).

How many "lively stones" now fitting for the heavenly temple, unable to discover the design and necessity of their afflictions, are crying out under the hand of the great Artificer, "Oh, pray spare me these trials!—Remove Thy stroke away from me: I am consumed by the blow of Thine hand." And to how many need the Divine assurance be given, "What I do thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter."

—Bowden.

(114.) There seems to each individual consciousness a strange adjustment of the events that are happening in our lives; and every day we see things that we cannot account for; and men will never be done asking about mysteries and "mysterious providences." There is no reconciliation apparently from the human stand-point for conflicting events. There never yet was found, and I think will never be, a key that shall solve these mysteries. But if you teach men the truth that is in Christ Jesus, that the Spirit of God is fashioning, not our outward life (except as it stands related to the more glorious result), but the inward and spiritual life; that Christ is not working for the results which appear in this life alone, but for results which shall appear in the life hereafter—that reconciles them; or, if it does not reconcile, it settles. I do not care what befalls you; you do not yourself care what befalls you, so long as you have the certainty that the end of it shall be right. Your ship goes to sea, a storm follows it, you get no tidings of it, yet if you have confidence in her crew and in her commander, if you are sure that she will make the port, it matters very little to you whether she has more or less of stormy voyage. Storms may even be an impetus and a help. So in human life. Once give me to believe that I am a child of God, that my Father's Spirit has inhabited my soul, that all that is happening to me, whether seemingly good or evil, is the working out of a higher nature from my lower one—once let me believe that this life is one from which there is to come a spiritual being, and that the oppression, the raspings, the piercings, the sorrows, the anguish, the disappointment, the ten thousand inequalities, the rude buffetings, the down-throws, and all the events which are happening to me here, are but the preparation for that higher life, and its development in me, and I am content.

Once on a summer's day, I went with my brother to extract a crystal from the rock. With a mighty sledge-hammer he vigorously dealt blow after blow upon the rock, and chipped piece after piece. At last the top of the crystal appeared. Then one might see what he was after, for it had not shown upon the outer surface of the rock. When the crystal appeared, then the whole strife became how so to break the rock away from it, and how so to strike the rock as to extract the crystal. The rock was good for nothing, the crystal was everything. The soul is man's crystal, and the body is but the incasing rock that holds it. God's providences are smiting upon the rock, and breaking and cutting it away, and extracting the precious crystal, which is worth incomparably more than its setting in the rock.

—Becher.

(115.) When I see God especially busy in troubling and trying a Christian, I know that out of that Christian's character there is to come some especial good. A quarryman goes down into the excavation, and with strong-handed machinery bores into the rock. The rock says, "What do you do that for?" He puts powder in. He lights a fuse. There is a thundering crash. The rock says, "Why, the whole mountain is going to pieces." The crowbar is plunged. The rock is dragged out. After awhile it is taken into the artist's studio. It says, "Well, now I have got to a good, warm, comfortable place at last." But the sculptor takes the chisel and mallet, and he digs for the eyes, and he cuts for the mouth, and he bores for the ears, and he rubs it with sandpaper, until the rock says, "When will this torture be ended?" A sheet is thrown over it. It stands in darkness. After awhile it is taken out. The covering is removed. It stands in the sunlight, in the presence of ten thousand applauding people, as they greet the statue of the poet, or the prince, or the conqueror. "Ah!" says the stone, "now I understand it. I am a great deal better off now, standing as the statue of a conqueror, than I would have been down in the quarry." So God finds a man down in the quarry of ignorance and sin. How to get him up? He must be bored, and blasted, and chiselled, and scoured, and stand sometime in the darkness. But after awhile the mantle of affliction will fall off, and his soul will be greeted by the one hundred and forty-four thousand, and the thousands of thousands, as more than conqueror.

—Talmage.

IV. WHY IT IS "GOOD" FOR THE LORD'S PEOPLE TO BE AFFLICTED.

1. Because it cleanses them from sin.

(116.) There are some troubles that beat us right down; and there are some troubles that afford a stimulus to the whole mind, and lift it up to a higher plane.

Have you not, in the great hours of sorrow—not in the despairing hours of sorrow; not in the degrading hours of sorrow; not in the sordid hours in which sorrow drags you in its own slime; but in those hours in which you feel that you are a son of God under affliction, that this world is not your abiding place, and that your home is the eternity of God—have you never, in those hours, felt that the world to come was opened as it had never been before, and that God's glory shone as it had never shone before? Have you never, in those hours, felt that those doubts and scepticisms which had pestered your mind had been swept away?

In the sultry insect-breeding days of summer, how insects abound! Every tree is a harbour for stinging pests. Wherever you sit they swarm around, and annoy you, and destroy your peace and comfort. By and by there come those vast floods of clouds that bring tornadoes, and that are thunder-voiced and up through the valleys and over the hills and mountains sweep drenching and cleansing rains. And when the storm has ceased, and the clouds are gone, and you sit under the dripping tree, not a fly, not a gnat, not a pestilent insect is to be seen. The winds and rains have driven them all away.

Has it never been so with those ten thousand little pests of pride, and vanity, and envying, and jealousy, and unlawful desire, that for days have teased and fretted you, and kept you busy with conscience, and taste, and affection, and all the higher faculties, until God sent upon you some great searching sorrow, some overwhelming trouble? There was that babe that lived in your heart; and He laid heart and babe together in the grave. He subverted your household. He brought on you such torrents of suffering, that it seemed as though the foundations of the great deep were broken up. And in those hours He graciously sustained you, and lifted you up toward Himself, so that, although you suffered unutterable affliction, you felt that it had cleansed you from jealousies, envies, vanity, pride, the whole swarm of venomous and stinging insects that had beset you.

—Becher.

2. Because in it God reveals Himself most fully to them.

(117.) Afflictions are so far from being ground of discomforts, that they are rather cordials in the issue, because they advance us more degrees in that knowledge of God, which is the means of eternal life. We often learn more of God under the rod that strikes us, than under the staff that comforts us (Ps. cxix. 71, 72). If the sun should perpetually shine in our hemisphere, how could we understand God's workmanship in those little spangles of the heavens? Though the night hide from us the beauty of the sun, yet it discovers the brightness and motions of the stars. —Charnock, 1628-1680.

(118.) God chooseth this season, to make the omnipotency of His love the more conspicuous. As Elijah, to add to the miracle, first causeth water in abundance to be poured on the wood and sacrifice, and then brings fire from heaven by his prayer to lick it up; thus God pours out the flood of affliction upon His children, and then kindles that inward joy in their bosoms which licks up all their sorrow. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(119.) God afflicts us for our profit, that we might be partakers of His holiness. The flowers smell sweetest after a shower; vines bear the better for bleeding; the walnut-tree is most fruitful when most beaten; saints spring and thrive most internally, when they are most externally afflicted. Afflictions are the mother of virtue. Manasseh's chain was more profitable to him than his crown. Luther could not understand some scriptures till he was in affliction. The Christ-cross is no letter, and yet that taught him more than all the letters in a row. God's house of correction is His school of instruction. All the stones that came about Stephen's ears did but knock him closer to Christ, the corner-stone. The waves did but lift Noah's ark nearer to heaven; and the higher the waters grew, the more the ark was lifted up to heaven. Afflictions lift up the soul to more rich, clear, and full enjoyments of God. "Behold, I will lead her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably unto her" (Hos. ii. 14), or rather, as the Hebrew has it, "I will earnestly or vehemently speak to her heart." God makes afflictions to be but inlets to the soul's more sweet and full enjoyment of His blessed self. When was it that Stephen saw the heavens open, and Christ standing at the right hand of God, but when the stones were about his ears, and there was but a short step betwixt him and eternity? And when did God appear in glory to Jacob, but in the day of his troubles, when the stones were his pillows, and the ground his bed, and the hedges his curtains, and the heavens his canopy? Then he saw the angels of God ascending and descending in their glittering robes. —Brooks, 1608-1680.

(120.) The presence of Christ can turn a dark night into a night much to be remembered. Perhaps it is time to be sleeping; but the November wind is out; and as it riots over the misty hills, and dashes the rain-drift on the rattling casement, and howls like a spirit distracted in the fireless chimney, it has awakened the young sleeper in the upper room; and when his mother enters, she finds him sobbing out his infant fears, or with beating heart hiding from the noisy danger in the depths of his downy pillow. But she puts the candle on the table, and sits down beside the bed; and as he hears her assuring voice, and espies the gay comfort in her smiling face, and as she puts her hand over his, the tear stands still upon his cheek, till it gets time to dry; and the smoothing down of the panic furrows on his brow, and the brightening of his eye, announce that he is ready for whatever a mother has got to tell. And as she goes on to explain the mysterious sources of his terror—"That horse, loud roaring is the brook tumbling over the stones; for the long pouring rains have filled it to the very brim. It is up on the green to-night, and had the cowslips been in blossom they would all have been drowned. Yes; and that thump on the window. It is the old cedar at the corner of the house, and as the wind tosses his stiff branches, they bounce and scratch on the panes of glass; and if they were not very small, they would be broken in pieces." And then she goes on to tell how this very night there are people out in the pelting blast, while her little boy lies warm in his crib, inside of his curtains; and how ships may be upset on the deep sea, or dashed to pieces on rocks so steep that the drowning sailors cannot climb them. And then, perhaps, she ends it all with breathing a mother's prayer, or he drops asleep beneath the cradle-hymn.

And why describe all this? Because there is so much practical divinity in it. In the history of a child, a night like this is an important night, for it has done three things. It has explained some things which, unexplained, would have been a source of constant alarm—perhaps the germ of superstition or insanity. It has taught some precious lessons—sympathy for sufferers, gratitude for mercies, and perhaps some pleasant thought of Him who is the hiding-place from the storm, and the covert from the tempest. And then it has deepened in that tender bosom the foundations of filial piety, and helped to give that parent such hold and purchase on a filial heart as few wise mothers have ever failed to win, and no manly son has ever blushed to own.

Then for the parallel. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so the Lord comforteth His people." It is in the dark and boisterous night of sorrow or apprehension that the Saviour reveals Himself nigh. And one of the first things He does is to explain the subject-matter of the grief—to show its real nature and amount. "It is but a light affliction. It lasts but for a moment. It is a false alarm. It is only the rain-drift on the window—wait till the day dawns and shadows flee away. Wait till morning, and you will see the whole extent of it." And then the next thing that He does is to teach some useful lesson. And during those quiet hours, when the heart is soft, the Saviour's lessons sink deep. And last of all, besides consolation under the trial and peaceful fruits that follow it, by this comforting visit, the Saviour unspeakably endears Himself to that soul. Paul and Silas never knew Christ so well, nor loved Him so much, as after that night which He and they passed together in the Macedonian prison. And the souls on which the Lord Jesus has taken the deepest hold, are those whose great tribulations have thrown them most frequently and most entirely into His own society. —Hamilton.

(121.) Affliction brings its own precious compensations with it. Rich issues unfold from its seeming poverty; the tearful cloud is painted with a rainbow; the waste lonesome night is made cheerful with songs and radiant with stars; amid the darkness and emptiness of earthly scenes the glories of the New Jerusalem shine forth with a new and surpassing lustre. The outside of a stained glass window looks dingy and unsightly; it has no beauty or attraction. And so the coloured windows of pain, sickness, bereavement, to those who look at them from without, from the busy street of the world's pursuits and pleasures, may appear gloomy and uninviting. But within, to God's true children, worshipping in that most solemn of temples—the temple of sorrow—where all earthly clamours are hushed, and all hearts are awed into earnestness and devotion, what a grand and radiant sight is disclosed by these windows! The blue sky is concealed, but a golden glory floats around: the sunshine is dim, but dimmed into the radiance of ruby and sapphire, of emerald and topaz; the common familiar sights of earth are obscured, but painted in hues of living light on these windows,—hues that bathe the soul with their splendour,—are the sublime scenes of the life and death of the Redeemer—scenes well fitted to hide the world by their overpowering glory.

—Macmillan.

3. It strengthens their faith in God.

(122.) The Christian through trouble is made more bold and hearty, and concludeth with himself, more than ever he did before, that God hath a special consideration of those that are in trouble, and will graciously help and deliver them.

Like as one that hath sailed oft upon the sea, and hath been sore tossed with the fearful waves, is afterwards the more bold to go unto the sea, forasmuch as he hath ever escaped well; even so a Christian man, whom the cross hath oft assaulted and exercised, forasmuch as he hath always found comfort, aid, and help of God, afterward he trusteth God, the longer the more, though the same affliction come again unto him that he had before.

David, when he prepared himself to fight against the valiant giant Goliath, said these words: "The Lord, which hath delivered me from a lion and from a bear, shall deliver me also from this Philistine" (1 Sam. xvii). And again, Paul saith: "God hath delivered us from so great a death, and delivereth us daily, and we hope that He will deliver us from henceforth also" (2 Cor. i).

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(123.) Our faith receives much strength in our afflictions, because in them we have experience of God's truth, both in His threatenings, in that for our sins He has inflicted those judgments which in His Word He has denounced, and also in His promises, seeing He performs all that He has undertaken, not only in assisting us in our afflictions, but also in delivering us in due time: in both showing His infinite wisdom, omnipotent power, and all-governing providence, whereby He has disposed of all things to the best. When by experience we find that the Lord has showed us great mercy in crossing our most earnest desires, has brought to us much comfort out of our greatest calamities, turned our fears and dangers into security and joyful triumph, and has made the whole, which in swallowing seemed to devour us, to be a means of our deliverance, then is our faith marvellously increased, and we thereby are enabled to endure the next afflictions with much more patience and contentment. As the pilot having escaped out of many storms, and the soldier out of many dangerous conflicts, are so heartened thereby that they are marvellously courageous when tossed with tempests and assaulted by enemies, whilst inexperienced passengers and fresh water soldiers tremble at the least danger; so those who have been exercised in afflictions, and have had manifold experience of God's mercy, power, and love, both in assisting them in their troubles and in delivering them out of their greatest dangers, have their faith in God hereby so strengthened that they are much more patient in afflictions and more courageous in perils than those who were never exercised with these trials.

(124.) The purpose of suffering is never to be found out by a comparison of merits among neighbours, but by considering how it draws the soul in more childlike dependence towards the Father. By this principle, the right-minded and well-meaning must be tried quite as much as the faithless. Trials are signs of celestial favour, seals on their forehead, badges of favourites, crowns of honour. We forget that it is just as important that the good should be made better, as that the bad should be reformed. Vessels that are to be made meet for the Master's highest uses are to be refined in the furnace seven times heated. We must learn that it is a far richer blessing to be taught what the feeling of the Comforter is, and what peace comes from self-renunciation, than to go through life in any holiday dance. Just as the wise and affectionate mother shows her true maternal love more manifestly when she causes her child to cry with disappointment by snatching him back from the candle he grasps at as a flaming toy, than when she gives him the costliest plaything; so God often shows a tenderer concern when He denies us health and riches than when He grants them—when He enfeebles us with disease or poverty than when He covers us with flesh or fortune.

—Huntington.

4. Because it makes them fruitful.

(125.) Sharp frosts nourish the corn, so do sharp afflictions grace.

—Watson, 1696.

(126.) "What beautiful fruit you bear!" said a little Flower to the Vine with purple grapes in the same conservatory.

"I am very truly thankful for it," answered the Vine modestly.

"It is so ornamental; and besides makes you so much more profitable," observed the little Flower.

"And yet, notwithstanding, I rebelled against the only means which could render me really fruitful," replied the Vine.

"Then, is it not natural to vines to yield fruits?" asked the little Flower with some wonder.

"I confess for myself," said the Vine humbly, "that though I produced abundance of green leaves, there was found very little fruit of any good quality. —Vines are apt to degenerate."

"What is necessary, then?" inquired the Flower.

"With proper training, careful pruning," said the Vine.

"What is pruning?" asked the little Flower.

"Shortening the branches, cutting off, and taking away all that would only run to waste," replied the Vine. "Ah! it was against that use of the sharp knife that my nature shrank and rebelled! It greatly humbled me too; I looked so shorn and so short afterwards."

"And what then?" asked the little Flower deeply interested.

"Then, after awhile, new shoots appeared, which are those branches now bearing; but still the knife is often required, in order to keep down a running disposition, and to strengthen the formed fruit."

"Very wonderful!" said the little Flower in admiration. "But who would have thought that such severe wounding could have such results, and become such a blessing!"
—Bowden.

5. Because it brings out their graces and excellencies into view, to the glory of God.

(127.) What place should we then have for patience, submission, meekness, forbearance, and a readiness to forgive, if we had nothing to try us either from the hand of the Lord or from the hand of men. A Christian without trials would be like a mill without wind or water. The contrivance and design of the wheel-work within would be unnoticed and unknown without something to put it in motion from without. —Newton, 1725-1807.

6. Because it establishes them in grace.

(128.) We cannot be established except by suffering. It is no use our hoping that we shall be well-rooted if no March winds have passed over us. The young oak cannot be expected to strike its roots as deep as the old one. Those old gnarlings on the roots, and those strange twistings of the branches, all tell of many storms that have swept over the aged tree. But they are also indicators of the depths into which the roots have dived; and they tell the woodman that he might as soon expect to rend up a mountain as to tear up that oak by the roots. We must suffer awhile, then shall we be established.
—Spurgeon.

7. Because it makes them grow in grace.

(129.) Nor would our graces grow, unless they were called out to exercise: the difficulties we meet with not only prove but strengthen the graces of the Spirit. If a person were always to sit still, he would probably wholly lose the power of moving his limbs; but by walking and working he becomes strong and active. So, in a long course of ease, the powers of the new man would certainly languish: the soul would grow soft, indolent, cowardly, and faint; and therefore the Lord appoints His children such dispensations as make them strive, and struggle, and pant. They must press through a crowd, swim against a stream, endure hardships, run, wrestle, and fight; and thus their strength grows in the using. —Newton, 1725-1807.

(130.) Many of our graces cannot thrive without trials, such as resignation, patience, meekness, long-suffering. Some of the London porters do not appear to be very strong men, yet they will trudge along under a burden which some stouter people could not carry so well; the reason is, they are accustomed to carry burdens, and by continual exercise their shoulders acquire a strength suited to their work. It is so in the Christian life; activity and strength of grace is not ordinarily acquired by those who sit still and live at ease, but by those who frequently meet with something which requires a full exertion of what power the Lord has given them.
—Newton, 1725-1807.

8. Because it keeps them humble.

(131.) Poverty and affliction take away the fuel that feeds pride. Now, when the fuel is taken away, the fire goes out. When the fodder is taken away, wanton steeds that grew fierce with pampering grow more tractable. So it is with man. Take away that that feeds his carnal disposition, and he grows tractable and gentle. Thus, then, affliction and poverty, outward in our condition, help to inward poverty of spirit.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(132.) Afflictions do us good likewise, as they make us more acquainted with what is in our own hearts, and thereby promote self-abasement. There are abominations which, like nests of vipers, lie so quietly within, that we hardly suspect they are there, till the rod of affliction rouses them: then they kiss and show their venom. This discovery is, indeed, very distressing; yet, till it is made, we are prone to think ourselves much less vile than we really are, and cannot so heartily abhor ourselves, and repent in dust and ashes.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

9. Because it teaches them true wisdom.

(133.) As prosperity blindeth the eyes of men, even so doth adversity open them.

Like as the salve that remedieth the disease of the eyes doth first bite and grieve the eyes, and maketh them to water, but yet afterward the eyesight is clearer than it was; even so trouble doth vex men wonderfully at the first, but afterward it lighteneth the eyes of the mind, that it is afterward more reasonable, wise, and circumspect. For trouble bringeth experience, and experience bringeth wisdom.
—Wermullerus, 1551.

(134.) The tears of sorrow are like spiritual lenses, showing us the world in its true character as a poor, empty, unsatisfying inheritance.

—Macmillan.

10. Because it teaches them to sympathise with the suffering.

(135.) By these afflictions we are made more compassionate unto others who endure the like crosses. Those that have been sick are apt to pity those most whom they see pained with the like diseases. Those who have been imprisoned more readily compassionate, and accordingly help and relieve those who are restrained. They who have been pinched with penury and pined with hunger do above others pity them who, being poor, want food to feed them and clothes to cover them. And this was one end why God laid upon our Saviour Himself so many afflictions, that He might be able sufficiently to have compassion on them that are ignorant, because He was compassed with infirmity. —Downham, 1644.

(136.) The story goes that Harry the Eighth, wandering one night in the streets of London in disguise, was met at the bridge-foot by some of the watch, and not giving a good account of himself was carried off to the Poultry Compter, and shut up for the night without fire or candle. On his liberation he made a grant of thirty chaldrons of coals and a quantity of bread for the solace of night prisoners in the Compter. Experience brings sympathy. Those who have felt sharp afflictions, terrible convictions, racking doubts, and violent temptations, will be zealous in consoling those in a similar condition. It were well if the great Head of the Church would put unsympathising pastors into the Compter of trouble for a season, until they weep with those that weep.
—W. M. Taylor.

11. Because it endears the promises to them.

(137.) (On hearing of music by night.)

How sweetly doth this music sound in this dead season! In the daytime it would not, it could not, so much affect the ear. All harmonious sounds are advanced by a silent darkness.

Thus it is with the glad tidings of salvation. The gospel never sounds so sweet as in the night of persecution, or of our own private affliction. It is ever the same; the difference is in our disposition to receive it.

O God, whose praise it is to give songs in the night, make my prosperity consoling, and my crosses cheerful.
—Hall, 1574-1656.

(138.) We never prize the precious words of promise till we are placed in conditions in which their suitability and sweetness are manifested. We all of us value those golden words, "When thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee," but few if any of us have read them with the delight of the martyr Bilney, to whom this passage was a stay, while he was in prison awaiting his execution at the stake. His Bible, still preserved in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, has the passage marked with a pen in the margin. Perhaps, if all were known, every promise in the Bible has borne a special message to some one saint, and so the whole volume might be scored in the margin with mementoes of Christian experience, every one appropriate to the very letter.

—Spurgeon.

12. Because it teaches them to prize their mercies.

(139.) Afflictions when sanctified make us grateful for mercies which aforesaid we treated with indifference. We sat for half an hour in a calf's shed the other day, quite grateful for the shelter from the driving rain, yet at no other time would we have entered such a hovel. Discontented persons need a course of the bread of adversity and the water of affliction, to cure them of the wretched habit of murmuring. Even things which we loathed before we shall learn to prize when in troublous circumstances. We are no lovers of lizards, and yet at Pont St. Martin, in the Val D'Aosta, where the mosquitoes, flies, and insects of all sorts drove us nearly to distraction, we prized the little green fellows, and felt quite an attachment to them as they darted out their tongues and devoured our worrying enemies. Sweet are the uses of adversity, and this among them—that it brings into proper estimation mercies aforesaid lightly esteemed. —Spurgeon.

13. Because it makes them long for heaven.

(140.) By these things, likewise, they are made more willing to leave the present world, to which we are prone to cleave too closely, when our path is smooth. Had Israel enjoyed their former peace and prosperity in Egypt, when Moses came to invite them to Canaan, I think they would hardly have listened to him. But the Lord suffered them to be brought into great trouble and bondage, and then the news of deliverance was more welcome; yet still they were but half willing, and they carried a love to the flesh pots of Egypt with them into the wilderness. We are like them; though we say this world is vain and sinful, we are too fond of it; and though we hope for true happiness only in heaven, we are often well content to stay longer here. But the Lord sends afflictions one after another to quicken our desires, and to convince us that this cannot be our rest. Sometimes, if you drive a bird from one branch of a tree, he will hop to another a little higher, and from thence to a third; but if you continue to disturb him, he will at last take wing and fly quite away. Thus we, when forced from one creature-comfort, perch upon another, and so on; but the Lord mercifully follows us with trials, and will not let us rest upon any. By degrees our desires take a nobler flight, and can be satisfied with nothing short of Himself; and we say, To depart and be with Jesus is best of all.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(141.) We had traversed the Great Aletsch Glacier, and were very hungry when we reached the mountain tarn half-way between the Bel Alp and the hotel at the foot of the Eggischorn; there a peasant undertook to descend the mountain, and bring us bread and milk. It was a very Marah to us when he brought us back milk too sour for us to drink, and bread black as a coal, too hard to bite, and sour as the curds. What, then? Why, we longed the more eagerly to reach the hotel towards which we were travelling. We mounted our horses, and made no more halts till we reached the hospitable table where our hunger was abundantly satisfied. Thus our disappointments on the road to heaven whet our appetites for the better country, and quicken the pace of our pilgrimage to the celestial city.
—Spurgeon.

14. Because it will sweeten heaven to them.

(142.) There is no exceeding joy or triumph, but some sorrow or heaviness goeth before it. The spring-time, following immediately upon the rough and hard winter, is the more welcome unto us.

In battle, the sorer our enemies do assault against us, the greater is the joy and triumph at the overthrow of them.

He that hath kept his bed a long time, and lain sick a great season, afterward when he is recovered, health is a more precious treasure unto him than ever it was before that he felt what sickness was; and also such as mourned for his sickness, do receive an exceeding rejoicing at his restoring unto health again.

Even so doth God deprive us for a time of riches, wealth, prosperity, our natural country, bodily health, and such other transitory benefits, for this purpose, that when He giveth them again unto us, we may the more rejoice and be the gladder of them.
—Wernullerus.

V. DUTIES OF THE AFFLICTED.

1. Recognition of the hand of God.

(143.) Xerxes, having received a loss by the rage of Hellespontus, himself more mad than the sea, caused fetters and manacles to be cast into the waters thereof, as if he would make it his prisoner, and bind it with links of iron at his pleasure. Darius did the like upon the river Gyndes, who, because it had drowned him a white horse, threatened the river to divide it into so many streams, and so to weaken the strength of it, that a woman great with child should go over it dry shod. And there were people in Africa that went out to fight with the north wind, because it drove heaps of and upon their fields and habitations. Such is the madness of our days. If we be crossed with fair or foul weather, we fall a-cursing and banning, repining and murmuring at the creatures, like a dog that biteth the stone, and never looketh after the hand that threw it. We cast our eye, not upon the agent, God, but upon the instruments, His creatures, which cannot do us the least harm till they have a commission from Him so to do.

—King, 1591-1669.

2. Self-Examination.

(144.) Lay a book open before a child, or one who cannot read : he may gaze upon it, but he can make no use of it, because he understandeth nothing in it ; yet bring it to one who can read, and understandeth the language that is written in it, he will read you many stories and instructions out of it. It is dumb to the one, but speaketh to the other. In like manner it is with God's judgments. As St. Augustine well applies it : all sorts of men see them, but few are able to understand them. Every judgment of God is a real sermon of reformation and repentance : every judgment hath a voice, but every one understands not this voice—as St. Paul's companions, when Christ spake to him, they heard a voice, and no more. But it is the duty of every good Christian to listen to the rod and Him who sent it, and to spell out the meaning of God's anger ; to inquire and find out the cause of the cross and the ground of God's hiding His face—why it is that He dealeth so harshly with them, and carrieth Himself so austere towards them.

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

3. Penitence and Humility.

(145.) It is God's main end in correcting us, to bring us by His chastisements to unfeigned repentance ; and therefore if impenitently we continue in our sins, we cannot wait upon God for help and deliverance, seeing so He should be frustrate of His principal end, but may justly expect that He will double and redouble our afflictions until, according to His purpose, He has brought us to repentance, unless we be in the number of those whom He gives over as a desperate cure, reserving them for everlasting condemnation. So Chrysostom says, that God can this present day deliver us out of all our afflictions ; but He will not do it till He sees us purged from our sins, and our repentance not only begun, but thoroughly confirmed in us. And as the goldsmith will not take his gold out of the furnace until he sees that it is well purified from the dross, because this was the end why he cast it in ; so the Lord will not deliver us out of this furnace of affliction until the dross of sin be by our repentance purged away, because this was the end that moved Him to cast us into it.

—Downe, 1644.

(146.) If in our affliction we would pour forth to God such acceptable prayers as may obtain comfort in our crosses and deliverance from our calamities, we must confess our sins, and humbly acknowledge that we have not deserved God's smallest benefits, but are worthy to be overwhelmed with much more heavy plagues and punishments. And so the Lord will excuse us, when we accuse ourselves ; and absolve us from punishment, when in all humility we acknowledge that we have justly deserved the fearfulest of His plagues. For if we, who have but a little milk of mercy, are moved with compassion, when either our sons or our servants humble themselves, acknowledge their faults, and of their own accord offer themselves to suffer that punishment which they have deserved, then how can we doubt that God will be pitiful and ready to forgive us when He sees us thus humbled, whose love and mercy towards us is infinite and incomprehensible ?

As, therefore, a man skilful in the art of swimming, being, through casualty, cast into the sea, and labouring to recover the shore, does not, when he sees a billow approaching, oppose against it, because it would cast him further into the main ; his weaker force being far too feeble to withstand the violence of the mighty wave ; but stoops and dives under it, and so suffers it to pass over him without receiving any hurt. So when we see the huge billows of troubles and afflictions raised by the stormy blasts of God's anger, near approaching and coming against us, it is both vain and dangerous to oppose against them by pride and impatience, or to imagine that we can withstand them by our struggling, murmuring, and repining ; seeing this will rather hinder us from arriving in the haven of safety, and cast us back into the depth of misery ; but like these cunning swimmers, we must dive under these waves, which it is impossible to withstand, bearing our burden with patience, meekness, and humility, and acknowledging that far greater punishments are due unto us. And of both this confession and humiliation we have notable precedents in those excellent prayers of Ezra (ix.), Nehemiah (ix.), and Daniel (ix.) ; as also in the speech of the prodigal son after his conversion and returning to his father.

(147.) Labour to grow better under all your afflictions, lest your afflictions grow worse, lest God mingle them with more darkness, bitterness, and terror. As Joab said to David, if he ceased not his scandalous lamentation on the death of Absalom, all the people would leave him, and then he should find himself in a far worse condition than that which he bemoaned, or anything that befell him from his youth. The same may be said to persons under their afflictions. If they are not improved in a due manner, that which is worse may—nay, in all probability will—befall them. Whenever God takes this way, and engages in afflicting, He commonly pursues His work until He has prevailed, and His design on the afflicted party be accomplished. He will not cease to thresh and break the bread-corn until it be meet for His use. Lay down, then, the weapons of warfare against Him ; give up yourselves to His will ; let go everything about which He contends with you ; follow after that which he calls you unto ; and you will find light arising unto you in the midst of darkness. Has He a cup of affliction in one hand ?—lift up your eyes, and you will see a cup of consolation in the other. And if all stars withdraw their light whilst you are in the way of God, assure yourselves that the sun is ready to rise.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

4. Patience.

(148.) Whosoever a man doth give a light punishment unto him that hath deserved much greater, it is reason that he take it patiently. Wherefore, if thou suffer adversity, consider with thyself after this manner : Well, thy manifold sins have deserved a thousand, thousand times more grievous punishment.

—Wernullerus, 1551.

(149.) The way to be eased is not struggling with it, but meekly to bear it, as for a prisoner to be free from his fetters is not, in the jailor's sight, to seek to break them; that is the way to procure more, or the longer lying in them. So to be eased of a burden is not to wrestle with it when one is under it, but to go softly; there is more ease while it is on his back, and sooner comes he to be released of it. A man may with impatience wrestle and use unlawful means to ease himself, and God haply will let him prosper for awhile; but after He will bring a more heavy and inevitable burden on him.

There is a fable, but it has its moral for this purpose. A certain ass, laded with salt, fell into a river, and after he had risen, found his burden lighter, for the moisture had made it melt away; whereupon he would ever after lie down in the water as he travelled with his burden, and so ease himself. His owner perceiving his craft, after laded him as heavy with wool. The ass purposing to ease himself, as before, laid himself down in the next water, and thinking to have ease, rising again to feel his weight, found it heavier as it continued with him all the day. The moral is, that they who impatiently seek means contrary to the will of God, to ease themselves of their burden, shall have it more and more increase upon them.

(150.) Afflictions occasion experience of God and trial of grace, and are a part of God's discipline for the mortifying of sin, happy opportunities to discover more of God to us; yea, there is more reason of submission to Him in these, because God takes us into His own hands. A man that storms when a bucket of water is cast upon him, is patient when wet to the skin with the rain that comes from heaven.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(151.) This patient submission to God's will in affliction shows a great deal of wisdom and piety. The skill of a pilot is most discerned in a storm, and a Christian's grace in the storm of affliction; and indeed this submission to God's will is most requisite for us while we live here in this lower region. In heaven there will be no need of patience more than there is need of the starlight when the sun shines. In heaven there will be all joy, and what need of patience then? It requires no patience to wear a crown of gold; but while we live here in a valley of tears, there needs patient submission to God's will, "Ye have need of patience."

—Watson, 1696.

(152.) If the ground of your heart be harrowed by the good husbandman, expect in patience the abundant harvest.

—St. Marthe.

(153.) A consideration of the benefit of afflictions should teach us to bear them patiently when they fall to our lot, and to be thankful to heaven for having planted such barriers around us, to restrain the exuberance of our follies and our crimes.

Let these sacred fences be removed; exempt the ambitious from disappointment and the guilty from remorse; let luxury go unattended with disease, and indiscretion lead into no embarrassments or distresses; our vices would range without control, and the impetuosity of our passions have no bounds; every family would be filled with strife, every nation with carnage, and a deluge of calamities would break in upon us which would produce more misery in a year than is inflicted by the hand of Providence in a lapse of ages. —Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

(154.) Did you ever watch to see a stone-cutter carve the figures that were to decorate a temple? I stood once, in Paris, where the stone is soft, and where the building blocks are cut, not on the ground, but in their places on the tops of the doors, and about the windows; and I saw the chiselling done. I saw the work going forward on some of the public buildings, where lions, and eagles, and wreaths of flowers were being carved. Men stood with little chisels and mallets, cutting, and cutting, and cutting the stone, here and there. Suppose one of these blocks of stone, when it first mounts into its place, is told that it is to be a royal lion, and it is to decorate a magnificent structure. The workman commences, and after working one day the head is rudely shaped, but you can barely tell what it is. The next day he brings out one ear. The third day he opens one eye. And so, day after day, some new part is added. The stone complains, and asks if the operation is to be an everlasting one; but the work goes on. And you cannot get anything out of stone except by myriads of blows continued until the work is done. I hear people say, "Why am I afflicted?" For your good. "How long shall I be afflicted?" Until you cease to ask how long. Until God's work is done in you. God will go on chiselling as long as it is necessary, in order to elaborate first one feature and then another, and then another. The work ought to go on until it is completed. And every true heart ought to say, "Lord, do not stay Thy hand; cut away until I am brought out into the fair lines and lineaments of the image of God." Troubles and afflictions and blows that are sent are useless unless they make you patient to your fellows, and submissive to your lot. But rest assured that if you love God all things will work together for your good. And now join and work with them. Help God to work for you.

—Beecher.

5. Faith in the Divine goodness.

(155.) The hour of affliction is an hour of temptation. Satan loves to fish when the waters are troubled. He would bring us to hard thoughts of God, by the hard things we suffer from God, "Touch him, and he will curse Thee to Thy face." In such stormy weather some vessels are cast away. Faith is a special antidote against the poison of the wicked one. It can read love in the blackest character of Divine dispensation, as by a rainbow we see the beautiful image of the sun's light in the midst of a dark and waterish cloud. —Swinmock, 1673.

(156.) We see God's judgments pursuing and overtaking a man in his righteousness. Let us not now murmur and say, how can God justly afflict the upright? But let us acquiesce in the rational acknowledgment of this, that God's wisdom may outreach ours. We see the dispensation, but we do not see the design of it; and therefore let us suspend our censure.

If we should see a goldsmith cutting, breaking, or filing a piece of gold, and come and say to him, "Friend, what! do you mean to spoil your gold? Do you not know the value of what you thus cut and file away?" What a ridiculous question would this be to him, who knows that in what we call spoil he pursues the rational purposes of his own art, that to the excellence of the metal he may also add the curiousness of the figure. But now is it not, think you, much more ridiculous for such blind, silly worms as we to call God's works to an account, and to censure whatsoever thwarts our humour or transcends our apprehensions? —South, 1633-1716.

6. Resignation and self-committal to God.

(157.) As learned and faithful physicians do not promise their patients, who are full of corrupt humours, or endangered with old and festered sores, that they will not distaste their appetite or any way molest and trouble them, but only that they will effect the cure, and to this purpose use both the best and easiest means and medicines which they can; and as the wise patient is well satisfied with this promise, being contented rather to suffer for the present a little smart and pain than to hazard his life by neglect of the means, or to have his sore turn to a fistula or incurable cancer. So the Lord does not promise that we shall feel no smart or pain, but that He will cure and save us by the best means which will stand with His own glory and our good.

If we would have our prayers heard in our afflictions we must pray for that which God has promised; not absolutely that crosses may not befall us, or being inflicted we may be delivered out of them; but conditionally, if this our suit will stand with God's glory; not that they may not happen, but that they may not hurt us; not that we may be quite exempted from sense of pain, for this perhaps would hinder the cure, and cause us to rot in our corruptions, but that like a wise, faithful, and pitiful physician, He will handle us as gently as possibly He may, so as in the meantime the medicines used may be effectual for the purging of our corruptions and recovery of our health.

(158.) While we fret and repine at God's will, do we not say in effect that it is better for us to have our own? that is, in other words, that we are wiser than God, and could contrive things much more to our own advantage, if we had the disposal of them. Do we not as good as complain that we are not taken in as sharers with God in the government of the world? that our advice is not taken, and our consent had, in all the great changes which He is pleased to bring over us? These indeed are things that no man utters in words; but whosoever refuses to submit himself to the hand of God speaks them aloud by his behaviour: which by all the intelligent part of the world is looked upon as a surer indication of man's mind than any verbal declaration of it whatsoever. God, perhaps, is pleased to visit us with some heavy affliction, and shall we now, out of a due reverence of His all-governing wisdom, patiently endure it? or out of a blind presumption of our own, endeavour by some sinister way or other to rid ourselves from it? Passengers in a ship always submit to their pilot's discretion, but especially in a storm; and shall we, whose passage lies through a greater and more dangerous deep, pay a less deference to that great pilot, who not only understands, but also commands the seas? —South, 1633-1716.

7. Courage.

(159.) Howsoever this enemy adversity, and those innumerable troops of afflictions, are in show more terrible than prosperity and those glorious forces led under his conduct, yet they are much weaker, in truth, and less dangerous when we come to buckle with them. For these indeed are grim in their outward appearance, but not so fearful when, having experience of their strength, they become familiar to us; like those barbarians who, when they were to fight with their enemies, painted themselves that they might appear more terrible, whereas in truth they were weak and naked, unable to endure the first onset. For so these afflictions have in them a painted shadow of fierceness, and do but put on them an ugly vizard to make them full of terror at their first appearing; whereas if the vizard be done away, and we, ceasing to look upon them through the false glass of fear and astonishment, do behold them with a true judgment, we shall find them so easy to be endured, through the assistance of God's Spirit, that there will be no cause of terror and amazement. But on the other side, those enemies, prosperity and worldly allurements, hiding hostility under pretence of friendship, and being much stronger, bring us into a pernicious security, and without show of assault get the victory.

Afflictions, like bills and pikes, make a terrible show when they cannot reach us; but the temptations of prosperity, like unseen bullets, wound and kill us before they are discerned. They, like the fiery serpents, sting us, but with sense of pain make us seek for remedy, looking up to the true Brazen Serpent that we may be cured. These, like the viper, putting us to no pain, bring us into a sweet slumber of security, which ends in that deep sleep of death and condemnation. They wound with pain, and enforce us with torment to seek recovery; these, with delight, making us to love still the weapons that hurt us, and to abhor the means whereby we may be healed, because even our wounds and sores are pleasing to us. The one, like the wind boisterously blowing upon us, makes us more careful to hold fast the garments of God's graces, that they be not taken from us; the other, like the sun, warming us with delight, causes us of our own accord to cast it from us. —Downame, 1644.

(160.) How sick soever a man be with physic, he is not afraid of dying, because he considers the physician in wisdom gave him what now occasioneth his present sickness. No more should we be dismayed at the bitterness of our cup, if, with Christ, we did but take notice it is the cup that our Heavenly Father hath mingled, and hath given us only for our correction, not confusion.

(161.) Let us make a right judgment of afflictions. Let us not think God intends to destroy when He begins to strike. We are often in the same error the apostles were in. When they saw Christ, walking upon the waves in the dead of the night and terror of a tempest, coming to succour them, they imagined He was a spirit coming to mischief them. The flesh makes us think God often to be our enemy when He is our friend. —Charnock, 1628-1680.

8. Gratitude.

(162.) If the child be bound to his father in all love and duty, not only because he feeds and clothes him, but also because he governs and corrects him; not for the blows and smarts which he sustains, for these his nature abhors, but for his care in reclaiming him from his faults, which, being nourished, would in time justly disable him from receiving his inheritance.

And if, being grievously sick, we are content to requite the physician and surgeon for their distasteful potions, their sharp corrosives, cutting, lancing, searing, with thanks and deserved praise; not because of the things themselves, which for the present increase our pain; but because out of their skill they use them as means for the recovery of our bodily health.

Then, how much more are we to be thankful to our Heavenly Father chastising us? seeing in His love and care He hereby reforms us of our sins, and so makes us fit to be heirs of that everlasting patrimony of His glorious kingdom? How much should we magnify this Spiritual Physician of our souls? Not for the bitter potions which He makes us drink, but because He intends, and accordingly effects, our recovery to health, and that not the health of our corruptible bodies, which only deprives them to the next assizes of sickness, but of our precious and immortal souls; not such as is momentary and temporary, but perpetual and everlasting. It is not therefore enough that we take these great benefits, which God's chastising hand reaches out to us, with patience; but we must also receive them with praise and thanksgiving (1. Pet. iv. 16; Col. i. 11, 12).

—Downname, 1644.

(163.) How profitable and beneficial a thing is affliction; especially to some dispositions! I see some trees that will not thrive unless their roots be laid bare; unless, besides pruning, their bodies be gashed and sliced. Others that are too luxuriant, except divers of their blossoms be seasonably pulled off, yield nothing. I see too rank corn, if it be not timely eaten down, may yield something to the barn, but little to the granary. I see some full bodies that can enjoy no health without blood-lettings. Such is the condition of our spiritual part: it is a rare soul that can be kept in any constant order, without these smarting remedies: I confess mine cannot. How wild had I run, if the rod had not been over me! Every man can say he thanks God for ease: for me, I bless God for my troubles.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(164.) Before the corn be ripened, it needs all kinds of weathers, and therefore the husbandman is as glad of showers as sunshine, because they both conduce to fruitfulness. We need all kinds of dispensations.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(165.) There are bitter mercies and sweet mercies; some mercies God gives in wine, some in wormwood. Now we must praise God for the bitter mercies as well as the sweet: thus Job, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord." Too many are prone to think, nothing is a mercy that is not sweet in the going down, and leaves not a pleasant farewell on their palate; but this is the childishness of our spirits, which, as grace grows more manly, and the Christian more judicious, will wear off. Who, that understands himself, will value a book by the gilt on the cover? Truly, none of our temporals (whether crosses or enjoyments) considered in themselves abstractly, are either a curse or mercy. They are only as the covering to the book; it is what is writ in them that must resolve us whether they be a mercy or not. Is it an affliction that lies on thee? If thou canst find it comes from love, and ends in grace and holiness, it is a mercy though it be bitter to thy taste. Is it an enjoyment? If love doth not send it, and grace end it (which appears when thou growest worse by it), it is a curse though sweet to thy sense. There are sweet poisons as well as bitter cordials. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

9. It is the duty of the afflicted to look at life as a whole.

(166.) Our hours of misery become such, because we feel them singly, and apart from the rest of life. But we know not what those shades will be, when the whole, with its reliefs and lights, is seen together. The minute insect which moves upon the face of a pictured landscape, as upon a wide and boundless plain, may feel itself at times buried in the deepest gloom of midnight; while the eye that takes it all at once, sees in those dark lines the contrast which gives effect and brilliancy to the general design.

—Woodward.

(167.) Though it be not in our power to make affliction no affliction, yet it is in our power to take off the edge of it, by a steady view of those Divine joys prepared for us in another state.

—Atterbury, 1663-1732.

(168.) There are many scenes in life which are either sad or beautiful, cheerless or refreshing, according to the direction from which we approach them. If, on a morning in spring, we behold the ridges of a fresh-turned ploughed field from their northern side, our eyes, catching only the shadowed slopes of the successive furrows, see an expanse of white, the unmelted remains of the night's hail-storm, or the hoar-frost of the dawn. We make a circuit, or we cross over, and look behind us, and on the very same ground there is nothing to be seen but the rich brown soil, swelling in the sunshine, warm with promise, and chequered perhaps, here and there, with a green blade bursting through the surface.

—Froude.

10. To seek deliverance by the use of all appointed means.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(170.) Ordinary means are not to be contemned. Like as a shipmaster being upon the water, and foreseeing a tempest, calleth upon God's help; and yet hath also a sure eye to the stern, to rule that as handsomely and cunningly as he can (Acts xxvii). Even so in all manner of necessities and perils, it is lawful to use all manner of honest and convenient means; as medicines in sickness; labour in poverty; the power and authority of the magistrate in wrong; battle array against the enemies of our country, and such like: so that no man build nor trust in any manner of thing, saving in the very living God only, who can help, deliver, and remedy all things, without any middle or mean, if there were none at hand.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

11. But they are not to seek comfort in worldly things.

(171.) Whosoever followeth but man's reason to teach comfort to the troubled mind can give but a counterfeit medicine; as the surgeon doth, which colourably healeth, or the physician which giveth medicines that do but astonish the sore place, and so deceive the patient. But the true healing of sorrow they had not, for they lacked the ground; they lacked that that should heal the sore at the bone first, that is, true faith in Christ and His holy Word. All medicines of the soul, which be laid on the sores thereof, not having that cleanser with them, be but over-healers: they do not take away the rankling within; and many times, under colour of hasty healing, they bring forth proud flesh in the sore, as evil or worse than that which was first corrupt.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

13. Nor unduly to depend on human aid.

(172.) As a passenger in a storm that, for shelter against the weather, betaketh him to a fair spread oak, standeth under the boughs, and findeth good relief thereby for the space of some time, till at length cometh a sudden gust of wind, that teareth down a main arm of it, which, falling upon the poor passenger, maimeth him that resorted to it for succour; thus falleth it out not with a few, meeting in the world with many troubles, they step aside out of their own way, and too often out of God's, to get under the wing of some great one, and gain, it may be, some aid and shelter thereby for a season, but after awhile that great one himself, falling from his former height of favour or honour, they are also called in question, and so fall together with him, that might otherwise have stood long enough on their own legs, if they had not trusted to such an arm of flesh, such a broken staff, that deceived them.

14. Nor to seek relief by sinful methods.

(173.) Turn a four-cornered stone how thou wilt, and it will always stand right up; even so, howsoever a right Christian be tempted and assaulted, he will ever notwithstanding remain upright.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(174.) A man that is unskilful in swimming, having ventured past his depth, hastily and inconsiderately catcheth at what comes next to hand to save himself; but often layeth hold on sedge weeds, that do but entangle him and draw him deeper under water, and there keep him down from ever getting up again, till he be (by that whereby he thought to save himself) drowned indeed. Thus it is that, whilst many, through weakness of faith and want of patience, are loth to wait God's good pleasure, and, being desirous to be rid in all haste of the present affliction, they put their hand oft to such courses as procure fearful effects, and use such sorry shifts for the relieving of themselves as do but plunge them further and deeper into such a labyrinth of evils, out of which they seldom or never get again.

(175.) I have often seen young and unskilful persons sitting in a little boat, when every little wave sporting about the sides of the vessel, and every motion and dancing of the barge, seemed a danger, and made them cling fast upon their fellows; and yet all the while they were as safe as if they sat under a tree, while a gentle wind shook the breeze into a refreshment and a cooling shade. And the unskilful, inexperienced Christian shrieks out whenever his vessel shakes, thinking it always a danger that the watery pavement is not stable and resident as a rock; and yet all his danger is in himself, none at all from without; for he is indeed moving upon the waters, but fastened to a rock; faith is his foundation, and hope is his anchor, and death is his harbour, and Christ his pilot, and heaven his country; and all the evils of poverty, or affronts of tribunals and evil judges, of fears and sudden apprehensions, are but like the loud wind blowing from the right point; they make a noise, and drive faster to the harbour; and if we do not leave the ship, and leap into the sea, quit the interest of religion, and run to the securities of the world, cut our cables, and dissolve our hopes; grow impatient and hug a wave, which dies in its embraces, we are as safe at sea, safer in the storm that God sends us than in a calm when befriended by the world.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

15. But to look up to God.

(176.) 2 Cor. iv. 18.—Mr. Astor, once fording the Susquehanna on horseback, became so dizzy as to be near losing his seat. Suddenly he received a blow on his chin from a hunter who was his companion, with the words "Look up." He did so, and recovered his balance. It was looking on the turbulent waters that endangered his life, and looking up saved it.

16. And to seek relief and strength in prayer.

(177.) We must also pray either that God will help and deliver us, not after the device of our own brains, but after such wise as shall seem unto His godly wisdom, or else that He will mitigate our pain, that our weakness may not utterly faint. Like as a sick person, although he doubt nothing of the faithfulness and tenderness of his physician, yet for all that desireth him to handle his wound as tenderly as possible; even so may we call upon God, that, if it be not against His honour and glory, He will vouchsafe to give some mitigation of the pain.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(178.) That grace which will carry us through prosperity will not carry us through sufferings: the ship needs stronger tackling to carry it through a storm than a calm.

—Watson, 1696.

VI. CONSOLATIONS FOR THE AFFLICTED.

1. Affliction is apportioned and limited by God.

(179.) We are not equally afflicted with the same diseases, or all in need of an equally severe method of cure. Hence we see different persons exercised with different kinds of crosses. But whilst the Heavenly Physician, consulting the health of all His patients, practises a milder treatment towards some, and cures others with rougher remedies, yet He leaves no one completely exempted, because He knows we are all diseased, without the exception of a single individual.

—Calvin, 1509-1564.

(180.) The Lord does not measure out our afflictions according to our faults, but according to our strength, and looks not what we have deserved, but what we are able to bear; for, as the prophet says, in wrath He remembers mercy (Hab. iii. 2), which makes Him in all our chastisements to intend our profit, and not our punishment. Neither does He give to all His servants a cup of like size, or a burden to bear of the same weight; but either fits their afflictions to the measure of their strength, or their strength to the measure of their afflictions. He does not observe in sharing of afflictions an arithmetical proportion, giving to all indifferently the same number and measure, but like a wise geometer, He proportionates them to the strength of the bearers, allotting a greater burden to the strongest, and a less to the weakest. In the Word of God we have an express promise, that the Lord will not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able, but will with the temptation also make a way of escape, that we may be able to bear it (1 Cor. x. 13).

—Downname, 1644.

(181.) Afflictions proceed from God our heavenly Father, whose wisdom is infinite, and whose love is incomprehensible. And therefore, if earthly parents—out of their small model of love and little pittance of affection, guided by their shallow discretion—do not give to all their children the like measure of chastisement, though they be alike guilty of the same fault, but have respect to their age and bigness, giving less to the youngest and weakest, and more to those who are older and of greater strength; because if they should receive these greater stripes, they would (exceeding their strength) make them dull and desperate, and if these should have the lighter chastisements they would hereby grow careless and negligent; how much more then will the Lord, so far exceeding them in love and wisdom, thus proportionate His chastisements to the strength of His children, seeing He does not in His chastisements aim at the satisfying of His justice by punishing the fault, but does all out of mere love for the reformation of the offender. —Downname, 1644.

(182.) If we see all who are wise and just to have regard not to oppress their inferiors with labours, but fit their employments according to their abilities; if no good schoolmaster will appoint his scholars longer or harder lessons than they can learn, nor correct them with more or greater stripes than is fit for their age; if no good master will give his servants a greater burden than they can carry, but allot the heaviest to the strongest, and the lightest to the weakest; yea, if a good man will be merciful to his beast, fitting its load to its strength, and not oppressing it with more than it can bear; how much more may we be assured that the Lord will be more careful over His own children, in proportioning their burden to their strength, that they may not sink under the weight of their afflictions, especially considering that He perfectly knows their power and ability, and can as easily add to their strength as detract from their burden! —Downname, 1644.

(183.) As no man is so loaded with benefits, as that he is in all respects happy; so there is none so oppressed with afflictions, that he is in every way miserable. And this mixture the wise Judge of heaven and earth has made, to keep us in a mean, who are too prone to run into extremes. And because we would be too much exalted with continual prosperity, and too much dejected if we should feel nothing but affliction, the Lord never suffers us to abound with worldly happiness, but that we have something to humble us; nor so to be plunged in misery, but that we have some cause of present comfort or future hope. And like a wise father, He does not too much dandle us, which would make us wantons, nor always beat us, which would make us desperate; but He judiciously mingles the one with the other, not letting us have our wills in all things, lest we should neglect Him; nor yet always crossing us in them, lest we should hate and rebel against Him; not always cockering us, lest we should grow proud and insolent, nor always correcting us, lest we should become base and servile; but He gives gifts that we may love Him, and stripes that we may fear Him. Yea, oftentimes He mixes frowns with His favours, when they make us malapert, and kind speeches with His rebukes and chastisements, to show in the hatred of our faults His love to our persons, when He sees us humble and penitent; that so He may make us in all things to reverence Him, and no less to fear Him in His favours, than to love Him in His chastisements.

—Downname, 1644.

(184.) As the wise commander does not always wear out his servants with long marches, wearisome watchings, and fierce skirmishes and assaults; but after their tedious labour brings them into garrisons, that, taking their rest, and refreshing themselves with some wholesome diet, good lodging and pleasant recreations, they may renew their strength and courage, and afterwards be more fit for service: so deals our great Commander with us, in this spiritual warfare, giving to us a breathing time after our fight, rest after our labours, recreation after sorrows, and after troubles and afflictions, comforts and refreshings; that so having recovered our strength, and taken new courage unto us, we may the better be enabled to do Him further service. Yea, He does not only interchangeably let one of these succeed the other, but like a prudent general, He intermixes them, giving to them in the time of their greatest labours some rest, and in their sharpest encounters with afflictions some breathing and refreshing; even as contrariwise He does not, when they are in the garrison of prosperity, suffer them to languish in idleness, and to spend their whole time in pleasure, which would make them unfit for service, but sometimes inures them to labour, watching, and warlike exercises, for the preserving of their strength and manlike courage.

—Downname, 1644.

(185.) Not to be afflicted is a sign of weakness; for, therefore God imposeth no more on me, because He sees I can bear no more. God will not make choice of a weak champion. When I am stronger I will look for more; and when I sustain more it shall more comfort me that God finds me strong, than it shall grieve me to be pressed with a heavy affliction.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

—Bridges, 1600-1670.

(187.) God doth moderate His stroke (Jer. xxx. 11), "I will correct thee in measure." God will in the day of His east wind stay His rough wind (Isa. xxvii. 8). The physician that understands the crasis and temper of the patient will not give too strong physic for the body, nor will he give one drachm or scruple too much. God knows our frame, He will not over-afflict. He will not stretch the strings of His viol too hard, lest they break. — Watson, 1696.

(188.) "I had," said Latimer, describing the way in which his father trained him as a yeoman's son, "my bows bought me according to my age and strength; as I increased in them so my bows were made bigger and bigger." Thus boys grew into cross-bowmen, and by a similar increase in the force of their trials, Christians become veterans in the Lord's host. The affliction which is suitable for a babe in grace would little serve the young man, and even the well-developed man needs severer trials as his strength increases. God, like a wise father, trains us wisely, and as we are able to bear it He makes our service and our suffering more arduous. As boys rejoice to be treated like men, so will we rejoice in our greater tribulations, for here is man's work for us, and by God's help we will not flinch from doing it. — Spurgeon.

2. Afflictions do not necessarily prove that God is angry with us.

(189.) Every severe dispensation is not an effect of God's anger. The same effect may proceed from very different causes. Love is sometimes put upon the rigour of those courses, which at the first aspect seem to carry in them the inscriptions of enmity.

God may sweep away a man's estate, snatch away a friend, stain his reputation; and yet the design of all this is not to be revenge, but remedy; not destruction, but discipline.

He sees, perhaps, something evil in us to be cured, and something worse to be prevented; some luxuries to be abated, and some malignant humours to be evacuated; all which cannot be effected but by sharp and displeasing applications. And in all the hard passages of Providence when God strips a man of all his externals, God's intent may be, not to make him miserable, but to make him humble; not to ruin, but to reduce him.

If you look only upon the outside of an affliction, you cannot distinguish from what principle it may proceed. Gehazi's leprosy and Lazarus's sores may seem to be inflicted by the same displeasure, and yet one was a curse for hypocrisy, and the other a trial of humility.

David's and Saul's afflictions were dispensed with a very different hand. Saul could not pursue him so fast, but mercy followed him as close. Stephen was stoned as well as Achan; but certainly God did not with the same arm fling the stone at the one with which He did at the other.

Consider the saints (Heb. xi. 37), "Afflicted, tormented, naked, destitute, sawn asunder." And what could anger itself do more against them? And yet the God who did all this was not angry. That very love which makes God to be our friend, makes Him sometimes to appear our enemy: to chastise our confidence, to raise our vigilance, and to give us safety instead of security.

Persons who are truly holy, are yet very apt to look upon God's dealings on the wrong side, and to make hard conclusions concerning their own condition. David is an example of this; through the transports, sometimes of diffidence. sometimes of impatience, he is high in his expostulations with God (Ps. lxxiv. 1, lxxvii. 9); not considering (as he does elsewhere) that when God deals with His chosen ones, with "the sheep of His pasture," His rod is still attended with His staff; and as with one He strikes, so with the other He supports.

So, on the other side, men of a morose, uncharitable temper, from such instances of outward miseries, are as ready to denounce God's anger against others. If such dogs meet with a Lazarus, instead of licking his sores they will bite his person, bark at his name, and worry his reputation. Nothing can befall any man, besides themselves, but presently it is "a judgment."

Let us rest assured of this, that the roughest of God's proceedings do not always issue from an angry intention: it is very possible, because very usual, that they may proceed from the clean contrary. The same clouds which God made use of heretofore to drown the earth, He employs now to refresh it. He may use the same means to correct and to better some that He does to plague and to punish others. The same hand and hatchet that cuts some trees for the fire may cut others into growth, verdure, and fertility. — South, 1633-1716.

3. On the contrary, they may be an evidence of our acceptance with God.

(190.) Furthermore, be it in case, that the father hath two sons, whereof the one becometh himself wickedly, and yet his father correcteth him nothing at all; the other for the least fault that he doth is corrected by and by. What thing else is the cause of this, but that the father hath no hope of amendment at all of the one, and therefore mindeth to put him clearly from his heritage, and to give him no part thereof? For the heritage pertaineth wholly unto that son that is chastened.

And yet the same poor son that is thus chastened thinketh in his mind that his brother is much more happy than he, forasmuch as he is never beaten; and therefore he mourneth by himself, "Well, my brother doth what he will against my father's will, and yet my father giveth him not one foul word; and towards me he sheweth not so much as a good look, but is ever in my top, if I do but look away," &c.

Here now mayest thou mark the foolishness of the child, which hath respect only unto the present grief, and never considereth what is reserved for him. Even such imaginations have Christian men also, when they suffer much tribulation, and see on the other side how prosperously it goeth with the wicked; whereas they ought rather to comfort themselves with the remembrance of the heritage that is reserved for them in heaven, which appertaineth unto them, as good and virtuous children.

As for the other, that hop and spring, make merry, and take their pleasure now for a while, they shall be deprived of the heritage everlastingly, as strangers, and shall have no part thereof (Heb. xii. 6-8). — Wermullerus, 1551.

(191.) The herdman will suffer such calves as are appointed shortly to the slaughter to run about in the pasture of pleasure; and again, such as are reserved to labour are kept under the yoke. Even so Almighty God doth permit unto those ungodly persons, whose destruction is at hand, to accomplish their pleasures and desires; but the godly whom He will use to His honour and glory, those keepeth He under the yoke, and restraineth them from the pleasant lusts of the world. — Wermullerus, 1551.

(192.) We are trees of righteousness which God's right hand has planted. Let us not, therefore, fear to be pruned with afflictions, seeing God thus pares away our superfluous branches that we may bring forth more fruit, as our Saviour teaches us (John xv. 2).

Yea, rather, we had great cause of fear, if we were exempted from these calamities. For as that is a fruitless tree which is suffered to grow wild and untouched, and is therefore daily in danger to be cut down and cast into the fire, because it does no good by standing and growing: so it is a sign that we are fruitless trees still growing in the wild wood of the world, which must one day be cut down and cast into everlasting fire if our Heavenly Husbandman takes no care to prune us with crosses and afflictions.

We are vines of God's own setting, whose glory and excellency consists not in the broadness and beauty of our leaves, nor in the handsomeness and straightness of our body and branches, but only in our fruitfulness, whereby we bring forth great plenty of the ripe and sweet grapes of holiness and righteousness. And, therefore, when we have the beauty and bravery of our outward estate taken from us, and have these leaves of earthly vanities blown away with the winds of adversity, and our superfluous stems of worldly substance pruned and plucked from us in the winter of affliction, there is no cause for grief or mourning, seeing our chiefest excellency is not hereby impaired; yea, rather, because it is much advanced, in that we are made more fruitful, how much the more we are by these afflictions pruned from our superfluities, this may justly increase our joy and comfort. —Downham, 1644.

(193.) Our afflictions are notable signs of our effectual calling, whereby we are severed from the world, and admitted into God's church and family. For they are God's livery and cognisance which He gives to all to wear who will be His disciples; for "as many as will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution."

As when the masons and carpenters polish their stones and square their timber with their tools and axes, it is a sign that they have chosen them for the use of building; whereas that which is untouched is left as refuse, fit for nothing, to be cast into the highway, and to be burned in the fire. So when the Lord doth polish, square, and plane us with troubles and afflictions from the knots and knobs of sin and corruption, it appears hereby that He has made choice of us to be stones in the building of His spiritual temple; whereas those who are left alone, and not hammered and squared by this Heavenly Workman, are rejected as refuse stuff, which is altogether unfit for this holy building.

(194.) "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth" (Heb. xii. 6, 11). Misunderstand not, then, the prognostics of your present sorrows. Think how they will work, as well as how they taste. They bode good, though they are unpleasant. If you were bastards and reprobates, you might feel less of the rod. When the ploughers make furrows on you, it prepareth you for the seed; and the showers that water it prognosticate a plentiful harvest. Think it not strange if He thresh and grind you, if you would be bread for your Master's use. He is not drowning His sheep when He washeth them, nor killing them when He is shearing them.

But by this He sheweth that they are His own; and the new-shorn sheep do most visibly bear His name or mark, when it is almost worn out, and scarce discernible, on them that have the longest fleece.

(195.) When sickness and disease attack the saint, or when death enters the saint's home and darkens it by his overshadowing presence, when poverty like an armed man attacks him, or when the wicked revile and persecute him, or when heart and flesh fail, it appears as though God did not care. But these very circumstances are signs of His care. The plough, with its broad and sharp blade or furrow-slice driven into the land, is a sign of culture and of ownership. The harrow, with its long prongs drawn over the field, is a proof of concern for its fertility. The sharp threshing instrument having teeth, is a sign of something being thought worthy of the garner. —Samuel Martin.

(196.) Lawns which we would keep in the best condition are very frequently mown; the grass has scarcely any respite from the scythe. Out in the meadows there is no such repeated cutting, they are mown but once or twice in the year. Even thus the nearer we are to God, and the more regard He has for us, the more frequent will be our adversities. To be very dear to God, involves no small degree of chastisement.

4. Afflictions assure us that we are in the heavenward way.

(197.) Passengers that have been told that their way to such a place lieth over a steep hill, or down a craggy rock, or through a moorish fen, or dirty vale, if they suddenly fall into some pleasant meadow, enamelled with beautiful flowers, or a goodly corn field, or a fair champaign country, look about them, and bethinking themselves where they are, say, "Surely we are come out of the way; we see no hills, nor rocks, nor moors, nor fens: this is too good to be the right way." So in the course of our life, which is but a pilgrimage on earth: when we pass through fields of corn or gardens of flowers, and enjoy all worldly pleasures and contentments; when the wind sets in such a corner as blows riches, honours, and preferments upon us;—let us then cast with ourselves, "Surely this is not the way the Scripture directeth us unto; here are not the temptations nor the tribulations that we must pass through: we see little or no footing of the saints of God in this road, but only the print of Devils' feet: somewhere we have missed our way; let us search and find where we went out of it." It is very true that God hath the blessings of this life and that which is to come in store for His children; when He seeth it good for them, they may go to heaven this way; but, certainly, afflictions and troubles are surer arguments of God's love, and a readier way to heaven than the other.

5. God is present with His people in all their afflictions.

(198.) The Lord does not only behold our tribulation as it were afar off, He being included in heaven, as we are in the earth; but as He fills all places with His essence, so after a more especial manner He is present with the faithful in all their afflictions. As the careful physician watches over his patient, that he may apply to him fit medicine, which may so purge away the corrupt humours as that in the meantime nature itself be not too much weakened; and as the goldsmith, when he has cast his gold into the furnace, does not carelessly leave it, but watches by it, that he may moderate the fire, and so order it, in respect both of the heat and the time of enduring it, that it may be purified from the dross, and not consumed in the purest substance; so the Lord stands by us, that when we are according to His own mind purged and purified, He may withdraw his bitter potions, and pull us like pure metal out of the fire, that we may not in our spiritual parts receive any hurt.

—Downname, 1644.

6. God sympathises with His people in all their sorrows.

(199.) Canst thou not read God's gracious indulgence in thine own disposition? Thou art a parent of children: perhaps thou findest cause to affect one more than another, though all be dear enough; but if any one of them be cast down with a feverish distemper, now thou art more carefully busy about him than all the rest. How thou pitiest him; how thou pliest him with offers and recipes; with what silent anxiety dost thou watch by his couch; listening for every one of his breathings; jealous of every whispering that might break off his slumber; answering every of his groans, with so many sighs; and, in short, so making of him for the time, that thy greatest darling seems the while neglected in comparison of this more needful charge. How much more shall the Father of Mercies be compassionately intent upon the sufferings of His dear children, according to the proportion of their afflictions!

—Hall, 1514-1566.

7. God succours and sustains His people according to their need.

(200.) Although in winter the trees appear not only unfruitful, but utterly dead, yet the sun, when the winter hath taken her leave, doth so warm both the earth and the trees that they bud out again, wax green, and bring forth fruit: even so when the faithful seem as though they were utterly forsaken, yet doth the heavenly Spirit in due time lighten, warm, and strengthen their hearts to all goodness.

As the young infant is not able to go of himself for very tenderness and lack of strength, but must be holden up, and led with the hand of the nurse; and like as a woman, weakened with sickness, is not able to go one step, but some strong woman must take her under the arm, and lead her, even so are we not able to go of ourselves, but God with His mighty hand and present power sustaineth us. The Spirit helpeth our infirmities (Rom. viii.)

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(201.) As the tender mother teaching her young child to go oftentimes seems to leave him to his own strength, when in truth he goes by her help supporting him; and to let him alone to his own care, when in the meantime she has a watchful eye to him, so that he is no sooner ready to fall but with nimble speed she catches hold of him, and prevents his danger. So the Lord deals with us His children, whilst in our nonage and greatest weakness He teaches us to go in this rough path of afflictions which leads to His kingdom. For when He seems to neglect us He watches over us; and when, in our sense and feeling, He leaves us to ourselves, even then He stays us by His strength; and when we are in greatest danger of sinking and falling, He stretches out with speed His powerful hand, and preserves us from receiving any harm.

—Downname, 1644.

(202.) We see in the body if any member be hurt, thither presently runs the blood to comfort the wounded part. The man himself, eye, tongue, and hand is altogether employed about that part and wounded member, as if he were forgetful of all the rest. So we see in the family, if one of the children be sick, all the care and kindness of the mother is about that sick child, so that all the rest do as it were envy his sickness. If nature does thus, will not God, who is the author of nature, do much more? For if an earthly mother do thus to a sickly and suffering child, will not our Heavenly Father, who has an infinite, incredible, and tender love to His people? This is the difference between God and the world, the world runs after those that rejoice in prosperity, as the rivers run to the sea when there is water enough already. But God comforts us all in our tribulations. His name and style is, "He comforts those that are cast down." The world forsakes those that are in poverty, disgrace, and want; but God vouchsafes most of His presence to them that holily, meekly, and patiently bear the afflictions which He lays upon them, and one drop of this honey is enough to sweeten the bitterest cup that ever they drank of. If God be with us, if the power of Christ will rest upon us, then we may even "glory in infirmities," as Paul did.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(203.) It is a very true saying, the sharper the lye is the cleaner taketh it away all manner of filth. Even so our corrupt and poisoned nature had need of a biting medicine. The sharper the trouble the more filth it biteth away. For a weak stomach, which is of a naughty digestion, bitter wormwood is very good and wholesome; even so for the weak and feeble soul is bitter affliction.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

8. Afflictions minister to our true wellbeing.

(204.) A water that is continually standing, how clear soever it seem, is corrupt; but that water which hath his continual course, the more it rusheth and struggeth over the stones and sands the better it is; even so a godly man, in the absence of the cross, is sluggish and dull; but through the cross and affliction he is quickened, and increased in all goodness. Rusty iron through the file is made bright and smooth; even so the old rusty Adam hath need of trouble to purge him from the cankered rust of sin.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(205.) The soldier when he first enters into the field fears when he hears but a false alarm, and is ready to duck at every shot, whereas after he has passed desperate dangers, and has been long exercised in many conflicts and skirmishes, he becomes so courageous that he dares to enter upon the push of the pike, and to fight at the cannon's mouth; now less fearing the cruel enemy and killing bullet, than when he was first trained, the paper shot and the seeming encounter of his friends and fellows.

There is no combatant that contends against his adversary with that spirit and courage when he first comes into the theatre, as he does who has been accustomed to these exercises; and is not only heartened with easy victories, but also after many foils and falls, dangerous wounds and much bloodshed, has in the end prevailed, and by many perils has made his way to a glorious triumph.

There is no mariner so bold and cheerfully confident in the least show of a seafaring danger, when he first enters the ship, and in his moving house becomes an inhabitant of this new appearing world of dreadful waters, as he who, after innumerable storms and dangerous tempests, has oftentimes arrived safely at the wished-for haven.

And thus it also fares with us in these spiritual combats with troubles and calamities. For howsoever in the first conflict we are marvellously cowardly and impatient in suffering the least pain, yet when we have been long exercised in these skirmishes, and after many foils and falls, have in the end, through God's gracious assistance, obtained a joyful victory, we exceedingly increase in Christian valour.

(206.) Experience teaches us that as other creatures, so also men, are made much more tender by gentle usage, and much disabled to bear the brunt of any outward violence, and contrariwise that they are much strengthened to endure any hardness, when they are inured into it by continual custom. Severe training makes the best soldiers, and, by continual custom, causes want and watching, pains and toilsome labour, scant diet and hard lodging to become familiar and easy to be endured. Mariners who have been accustomed to storms and tempests find small alterations in their bodies in the roughest seas and foulest weather, whereas fresh-water soldiers and tender passengers cannot brook the smell of the ship, nor sight of the water, and are extremely sea-sick when they are but a little tossed with some ordinary winds. The daily traveller goes longer journeys with little weariness, whereas they that keep at home are soon tired and surbaited with going a few miles. The tender gentleman takes cold being in a warm house and well clothed, whereas the poor husbandman dares the cold winds and nipping frosts with his bare head and naked breast; and is strong to endure the whole day any toilsome labour, when the other pants and faints with weariness if he work but one hour.

And as it thus fares with the body inured to pains and labour, so with the mind exercised with troubles, and accustomed to bear the burden of the cross.

(207.) Afflictions are a notable means to crown us, even in this life, with a good name, which is better than all riches, and sweeter than the most odoriferous perfume. For, whereas, whilst we live in ease and prosperity, the spiritual gifts and graces which God has bestowed on us, lie hid and undiscerned. When they come to the trial of tribulation, they are plainly discovered to all men. And as the stars cannot be seen in the sunshiny day, but when the darkest night comes, they appear in all their beauty; so these shining virtues and graces of God have their light much obscured in the day of prosperity, but when the dark night of affliction comes, then they shine gloriously. The precious ointments send forth their most odoriferous smell, when our earthen vessels and these brittle glasses of our bodies, wherein they are contained, are cracked and broken, by being smitten with calamities. This sweet incense of grace and virtue yields the most fragrant scent when it is cast into this fire of afflictions. Then does this spiritual gold appear true and good when it is tried in this burning furnace. Then is the strength of our faith manifested to God's glory and our praise, not when we sit idly still, but when we wrestle and contend with strong temptations. Then our Christian valour and fortitude most plainly appears, not whilst we lie at ease in the safe garrison, but when we are assailed with these mighty enemies, and after many conflicts get the victory.

(208.) Look upon a painted post or sign whose colour is laid in oil, how the rain beats upon it in stormy weather, that one would think all the colour would be washed off; yet how the water glides away, and leaves it rather more beautiful than before. And thus it is with every child of God: being well varnished and garnished with the graces of the Spirit, let the wind of persecution blow, and the floods of persecution lift up their voice, they shall never disfigure, nor deface, but rather add unto their beauty. Such is the condition of grace, that it shines the brighter for scouring, and is most glorious when it is most clouded.

—Jenkin, 1612-1685.

(209.) Afflictions do increase grace, as the wind serves to increase and blow up the flame. Grace spends not in the furnace, but it is like the widow's oil in the cruse, which did increase by pouring out. The torch, when it is beaten, burns brightest: so doth grace when it is exercised by sufferings. Sharp frosts nourish the good corn; so do sharp afflictions grace. Some plants grow better in the shade than in the sun, as the bay and the cypress. The shade of adversity is better for some than the sunshine of prosperity.

—Watson, 1696.

(210.) Christians all want to have graces, but they are not so willing to take what is necessary in order to obtain them. The pale think it a fine thing to be painted—all the lovely flowers and gay colours so skillfully laid on by the cunning hand of the artist; but when it comes to being daubed all over with some dark substance, when the very gold that is upon them becomes as black as ink, when they are thrust into the heated furnace, how then?—how then?

Christians are like vases, they must pass through the fire ere they can shine. And often the very furnace and the flame which they call destruction is only burning in the graces which are to be their everlasting beauty and glory.

—Beecher.

(211.) Our afflictions are not for naught. They are the fruitful seed of future glories. They are blessings in disguise. They are meant for good, and are productive of good. They are like the early processes of the garden, when the soil is broken up and weeded, in order that fair flowers may at length adorn it. They are the quarrying and the chiselling of the marble before the living statue can stand out in symmetrical proportions. They are the tuning of the instruments, without which no harmony can be secured in the ultimate concert. They are the medicine of our convalescence, the drudgery of our education, the spring pruning of our vine trees, without which we can never be healthy or happy, fit for heaven, or qualified to bring forth fruit whereby our Father may be glorified.

—Horton.

mosses, the loveliest gems of wild flowers abound far up on the bleak, storm-scalped peak. One of the richest displays of organic colouring I ever beheld was near the summit of Mont Chenebetta, a hill about 10,000 feet high, immediately above the great St. Bernard Hospice. The whole face of an extensive rock was covered with a most vivid yellow lichen, which shone in the sunshine like the golden battlement of an enchanted castle. There, in that lofty region, amid the most frowning desolation, exposed to the fiercest tempest of the sky, this lichen exhibited a glory of colour such as it never showed in the sheltered valley. I have two specimens of the same lichen before me while I write these lines, one from the great St. Bernard, and the other from the wall of a Scottish castle, deeply embosomed among sycamore trees; and the difference in point of form and colouring between them is most striking. The specimen nurtured amid the wild storms of the mountain peak is of a lovely primrose hue, and is smooth in texture and complete in outline; while the specimen nurtured amid the soft airs and the delicate showers of the lowland valley, is of a dim rusty hue, and is scurfy in texture, and broken in outline. And is it not so with the Christian who is afflicted, tempest-tossed, and not comforted? Till the storms and vicissitudes of God's providence beat upon him again and again, his character appears marred and clouded by selfish and worldly influences. But trials clear away the obscurity, perfect the outlines of his disposition, and give brightness and beauty to his piety—

"Amidst my list of blessings infinite Stands this the foremost, that my heart has bled;
For all I bless Thee, most for the severe."

—Macmillan.

9. Afflictions do not debar us from usefulness.

(213.) If thou canst not help the great cause of God in any other mode, at anyrate there is open to thee that of fervent prayer. How much may be done for the Master's kingdom by the "king's remembrancers," who put Him in mind day by day of the agonies of His Son, and of His covenant and promise to give Him a widening dominion! I doubt not that many sick-beds in England are doing more for Christ than our pulpits. Oh! what showers of blessings come down in answer to the prayers and tears of poor godly invalids, whose weakness is their strength, and whose sickness is their opportunity. In all buildings there must be some unseen stones, and are not these very often the most important of all? In the very foundation of a church I should place those who are mighty in prayer. They are hidden as it were beneath the sods of obscurity where we cannot see them, but they are upbearing the entire structure. My dear afflicted brethren and sisters, when at any time you are cut off from the active ministries which have been your delight, solace yourselves with this, that your sacred patience under suffering, and your fervent prayers for the promotion of the Redeemer's kingdom, are a sacrifice of a sweet smell, holy, acceptable unto God.

—Spurgeon.

10. Afflictions prepare us for greater happiness and honour.

(214.) Not only does the Lord always advance by afflictions the spiritual and everlasting good of the faithful, but sometimes also turns them to their greater benefit even in the things of this life. As we may see in the example of Joseph, who was sold as a slave that he might be made a great commander, and lost his patrimony at home that he might receive a much more large inheritance in a strange country; and therefore he professes that when his brethren intended evil against him, God disposed it to the good, not of himself alone, but of many others.

And thus also Job by his afflictions was not only assured of heavenly glory, but also got endless fame on earth, and was not alone enriched much more with God's spiritual graces, but also had a twofold increase in his worldly estate.

Neither ought this to seem strange, that God through His infinite wisdom and power should be able to bring happiness out of misery, comfort out of crosses, and so much good out of these afflictions which both to the flesh and the world seem so evil; seeing it is a familiar course with earthly physicians, by medicines to make men weaker that they may recover strength, and sicker for the present that they may be more healthy ever after; and with surgeons to cut, lance, and torment their patients with torturing corrosives, that they may cure their wounds and give them perfect ease for the time to come.

11. Afflictions are among the means which God uses to make us "meet for the inheritance of the saints in light."

(215.) "Every branch that beareth fruit, He purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." They assuredly are right who recognise in this "He purgeth" no direct, but only a secondary, allusion to temptations and afflictions, as the means by which the purging is effected. It is the whole process of sanctification, the circumcision of the Spirit, by whatever discipline brought about, of which Christ is speaking, and to which He pledges His Father here. At the same time, seeing that afflictions play so large, so necessary a part in the process of sanctification, it is in a secondary sense most true that there is here a reference to these. Regarded as a means of this purifying, as an evidence of the intention of the Heavenly Husbandman that the fruit-bearing branches shall be more fruitful still, these may be welcomed, may be contemplated in some sort as rewards of obedience. St. James bids the faithful to welcome them, for the blessing they bring with them (l. 2-4, 12, and compare Heb. xii. 11; Rom. v. 3-5). To how many dealings of God with His own, mysterious, inscrutable, inexplicable otherwise, will this, kept properly in mind, furnish us with a key! Oftentimes the fine gold of some saint appears to us as if cleansed from all its dross; but the inexorable refiner, who sees with other eyes than ours, and detects remains of dross where we see only gold, flings it again into the furnace, that so it may be purer yet. Augustine has a striking image in illustration. Many a time, he observes, a portrait seems perfect in the judgment of all eyes save those of the artist who drew it. Others would fain see him now to hold his hand; they count that he cannot improve it, perhaps may mar it; but he returns it to the easel, touches and retouches still. And why? Because, being this artist, there floats before his mind's eye an ideal perfection, to which hitherto his work has not attained, but to which he would fain see it approach more nearly yet.

—Trench.

12. Our afflictions are but "for a moment."

(216.) Often at sea men are heartily sick, yet no man hardly there doth mind or pity them, because the malady is not supposed dangerous, and within a while the sight of land will relieve them. It is our case: we passing over this troublesome sea of life; from inexperience, joined with the tenderness of our constitution, the changes and crosses of fortune make us nauseate all things, and appear sorely distempered; yet is not our condition so dismal as it seems; we may grow hardier, and wear out our sense of affliction; however, the land is not far off, and by disembarking hence we shall suddenly be discharged of all our molestations. It is a common solace of grief, approved by wise men, si gravis, brevis est; si longus, levis; if it be very grievous and acute it cannot continue long, without intermission or respite; if it abide long, it is supportable; intolerable pain is like lightning, it destroys us, or is itself instantly destroyed. However, death at length (which is never far off) will free us; be we never so much tossed with storms of misfortune, that is a sure haven; let what pains or diseases soever infest us, that is an infallible remedy for them all. Shall I die? I shall then cease to be sick; I shall be exempted from disgrace; I shall be enlarged from prison; I shall be no more pinched for want; no more tormented with pain. Death is a winter, that as it withers the rose and lily, so it kills the nettle and thistle; as it stifles all worldly joy and pleasure, so it suppresses all care and grief; as it hushes the voice of mirth and melody, so it stills the clamours and the sighs of misery, as it defaces all the world's glory, so it covers all disgrace, wipes off all tears, silences all complaint, buries all disquiet and discontent.

13. Our light affliction "is but for a moment."

(217.) Oh, comfort one another, Christians, with this; though your life be evil with troubles, yet 'tis short; a few steps, and you are out of the rain. There is a great difference between a saint in regard of the evils he meets with, and the wicked; as two travellers riding contrary ways, both taken in the rain and wet; but one rides from the rain, and so is soon out of the shower; but the other rides into the rainy corner; the farther he goes the worse he is. The saint meets with troubles as well as the wicked, but he is soon out of the shower; when death comes, he has fair weather; but the wicked, the farther he goes, the worse; what he meets with here is but a few drops, the great storm is the last. The pouring out of God's wrath shall be in hell, where all the deeps of horror are opened, both from above of God's righteous fury, and from beneath of their own accusing and tormenting consciences.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(218.) Affliction may be compared to frost; it will break, and spring-flowers will come on. "Sorrow and sighing shall fly away." Affliction hath a sting, but withal a wing, sorrow shall fly away; this land-flood shall be dried up.

—Watson, 1696.

14. Our present sorrows are not to be compared with the glory which is to be revealed in us.

(219.) As the globe of the earth, which, improperly for its great show and bigness, we term the world, and is, after the mathematician's account,

"many thousands of miles in compass, yet, being compared unto the greatness of the starry sky's circumference, is but a centre or a little prick: so the sorrows of this life temporal, in respect of the joys eternal in the world to come, bear not any proportion, but are to be reputed as nothing, or as a dark cloud that cometh and goeth in a moment.

—Boys, 1560-1643.

15. Our present sorrows will give rest to our future joys.

(220.) By our afflictions our ensuing prosperity is made more delightful and grateful; these bitter crosses make us to relish much better the sweetness of God's blessings. The sparing of the coarsest fare makes it to have a good relish, and to become pleasant to the taste and appetite (Prov. xxvii. 7). The day's brightness, if it were continual, would become tedious; and the glorious light of the sun would bring weariness, unless it were made grateful by the night's darkness.

In a word, pleasure itself would not long please us, if the glutting satiety of these sweetmeats were not taken away by abstinence, or sauced, as it were, with the sour sauce of intermingled miseries. Health when it is continually enjoyed is scarce thought on, but then it is sweet and most highly prized when we have long wanted it. Liberty, though it be precious as life, is but little regarded of those who have never felt the misery of restraint; but after long imprisonment it becomes most delightful. Riches are most esteemed by those who have formerly been pinched with poverty, and meat is most savoury when it is sauced with hunger. That victory is fullest of joy which is hardly obtained after a long, doubtful, and dangerous fight; and the safe harbour is then desiered with most comfort of the passengers, after they have escaped the perils of tempestuous storms. The delights of the spring are much more delightful because they follow the nipping frosts and foul weather of lowering winter. All pleasures become much more pleasing, when they succeed and are interchanged with miseries. In all human affairs there can scarce be any true joy, unless doleful sorrows have gone before, and the bitterness of some passed griefs doth the more commend the sweetness of ensuing gladness.

Therefore, seeing by these afflictions the Lord doth but sauce His benefits that we may enjoy them with the more delight, and takes away for a while the earthly blessings that after they are restored they may bring with them the greater pleasure, let us by this consideration be moved to bear these crosses with patience: and as the usurer, though he make an idol of his god, yet is content to wait it for a time, because when the term is expired he expects to have it with some increase; so, though our hearts too much adhere to earthly things, yet let us be content to forbear their company for a while, seeing upon their return the joy and comfort which we take in them shall be much increased.

—Downham, 1644.

16. Afflictions bring us even now into closer communion with God.

(221.) Hast thou seen the rainbow in the blue sky, when the bright sun shineth without a cloud in the summer's heaven? Hast thou seen it in the driving tempest, when the whole horizon gathered blackness? No; but when the cloud of rain was in the sky, and the sun looked upon it from the other side of heaven, then did the falling drops receive the slanting beams, and untwisting their seven colours, return them to the eye of the beholder, a beautiful bow, "a faithful witness," the truth of God. And thus it is not chiefly in the bright season of worldly comfort that the faithful witness of God is seen and felt; nor is it always in the season of affliction; for affliction may be unsanctified. But when the Sun of Righteousness sendeth forth His bright beams into the cloud of tribulation, then is the faithfulness of God perceived, then is His love felt, then are His promises enjoyed, then "we glory in tribulations also, knowing that tribulation worketh patience," &c.

—Salter, 1840.

VII. OUR AFFLICTIONS ARE INTERMITTENT.

(222.) Our troubles are not at all times alike troubles to us. Even the sea ceases its motion at times, and its surf forgets to murmur. Griels and cares, bitter memories, and heavy troubles intermit their tyranny, and come again with redoubled oppressions. Like tides, sorrow seems sometimes to flow out, and leave the sands bare. But again they sometimes rush in upon us like tides, as if they feared that something should have snatched from them their lawful prey.

—Becher.

VIII. IS NOT IN ITSELF SANCTIFYING.

(223.) To the wicked the issue is sad; first, in regard of sin, they leave them worse, more impenitent, hardened in sin, and outrageous in their wicked practices. Every plague on Egypt added to the plague of hardness on Pharaoh's heart. He that for some while could beg prayers of Moses for himself, at last comes to that pass, that he threatens to kill him if he come to him any more. Oh, what a prodigious height do we see many come to in sin, after some great sickness or other judgment! Children do not more shoot up in their bodily stature after an ague, than they in their lusts after afflictions. Oh, how greedy and ravenous are they after their prey, when they once get off their clog and chain from their heels! When physic works not kindly, it doth not only leave the disease uncured, but the poison of the physic stays in the body also. Many appear thus poisoned by their afflictions, by the breaking out of their lust afterward.

Secondly, In regard of sorrow. Every affliction on a wicked person produceth another, and that a greater than itself. The greatest wedge comes at last, which shall rive him fit for the fire. The sinner is whipt from affliction to affliction, as the vagrant from constable to constable, till at last he comes to hell, his proper place and settled abode, where all sorrows will meet in one that is endless.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(224.) One may have trouble for sin, yet not be a new creature. Trouble of spirit may appear, while God's judgments lie upon men; when these are removed, their trouble ceaseth. "When He slew them, then they sought Him; nevertheless they did flatter Him with their lips" (Ps. lxxviii. 36). Metal that melts in a furnace, take it out of the furnace, and it returns to its former hardness: many in time of sickness seem to be like melted metal: what weeping and wringing of hands! what confessions of sin will they make! Do not these look like new creatures? But as soon as they recover, they are as bad as ever; their pangs go off again, and it never comes to a new birth.

—Watson, 1696.

(225.) Affliction has a tendency, especially if long continued, to generate a kind of despondency and ill-temper; and spiritual incapacity is closely connected with pain and sickness. The spirit of prayer does not necessarily come with affliction. If this be not poured out upon the man, he will, like a wounded beast, skulk to his den, and growl there.

—Cecil, 1743-1810.

(226.) Affliction has its dangers as well as prosperity. The one is a smooth sea with rocks beneath the shining surface. The other is a troubled ocean in a dark and stormy night.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

(228.) Trust not in any unsanctified afflictions, as if these could permanently and really change the true condition of your heart. I have seen the characters of the writing which the flames had turned into a film of buoyant coal; I have seen the thread which has been passed through the fire retain, in its cold grey ashes, the twist it had got in spinning; I have found every shivered splinter of the flint as hard as the unbroken stone: and let trials come, in providence, sharp as the fire and ponderous as the crushing hammer, unless a gracious God send along with these something else than these, bruised, broken, bleeding as thy heart may be, its nature remains the same.

—Guthrie.

IX. ITS DIVERSE EFFECTS.

(229.) The stalk and the ear of corn fall upon the threshing-floor under one and the same flail, but the one is shattered in pieces, the other preserved. From one and the same olive, and from under one and the same press, is crushed out both oil and dregs, but the one is tunned up for use, the other thrown out as unserviceable; and by one and the same breath the fields are perfumed with sweetness, and annoyed with unpleasant savours. Thus afflictions are incidental to good and bad, may and do befall both alike, but by the providence of God not upon the same account. Good men are put into the furnace for their trial, bad men for their ruin; the one is sanctified by afflictions, the other made far worse than before; the self-same affliction is as a loadstone to the one, to draw him to heaven, as a millstone to the other, to sink him down into hell.

—Pinto, 1584.

(230.) There is as much difference between the sufferings of the saints and those of the ungodly as there is between the cords with which an executioner pinions a condemned malefactor and the bandages wherewith a tender surgeon binds his patient.

—Arrousmûh, 1602-1659.

(231.) Afflictions sent by Providence melt the constancy of the noble-minded, but confirm the obduracy of the vile. The same furnace that hardens clay liquefies gold; and in the strong manifestations of divine power Pharaoh found his punishment, but David his pardon.

—Colton, 1832.

(232.) How different are summer storms from winter ones! In winter they rush over the earth with their violence; and if any poor remnants of foliage or flowers have lingered behind, these are swept along at one gust. Nothing is left but desolation; and long after the rain has ceased, pools of water and mud bear tokens of what has been. But when the clouds have poured out their torrents in summer, when the winds have spent their fury, and the sun breaks forth again in glory, all things seem to rise with renewed loveliness from their refreshing bath. The flowers, glistening with rainbows, smell sweeter than before; the grass seems to have gained another brighter shade of green; and the young plants which had hardly come into sight, have taken their place among their fellows in the borders, so quickly have they sprung among the showers. The air, too, which may previously have been oppressive, is become clear, and soft, and fresh. Such, too, is the difference when the storms of affliction fall on hearts unrenewed by Christian faith and on those who abide in Christ. In the former, they bring out the dreariness and desolation which may before have been unapparent. The gloom is not relieved by the prospect of any cheering ray to follow it; of any flowers or fruits to show its beneficence. But in the true Christian soul, "though weeping may endure for a night, joy cometh in the morning." A sweet smile of hope and love follows every tear; and tribulation itself is turned into the chief of blessings.

—Spurgeon.

(233.) "You smell delightfully fragrant," said the Gravel-walk to a bed of Camomile flowers under the window.

"We have been trodden on," replied the Camomiles.

"Does that cause it?" asked the Gravel-walk.

"Treading on me produces no sweetness."

"Our natures are different," answered the Camomiles. "Gravel-walks become only the harder by being trodden upon; but the effect on our own selves is, that if pressed and bruised when the dew is upon us, to give forth the sweet smell which you now perceive."

—Bowden.

X. SHOULD BE ANTICIPATED AND PREPARED FOR.

(234.) Look for them. The first day that we begin to be Christians we must reckon of the cross. Christ has drawn up the form of our indenture, to which every one must yield and consent before he can call Him Master. "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow Me." In Luke it is, "take up his cross daily." Though there be fair days as well as foul in Christianity, yet we must every day be ready. As porters stand in the street waiting for a burden for them to carry if they be hired to it, so must a Christian every day be prepared to take up his burden, if God shall call him to it.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(235.) Be prepared for afflictions. To this end would Christ have us reckon upon the cross, that we may be forewarned. He that builds a house does not take care that the rain should not descend upon it, or the storm should not beat upon it, or the wind blow upon it; there is no fencing against these things, they cannot be prevented by any care of ours; but that the house may be able to endure all this without prejudice. And he that builds a ship, does not make this his work, that it should never meet with waves and billows, that is impossible; but that it may be light and staunch, and able to endure all weathers. A man that takes care for his body does not care for this, that he meet with no change of weather, hot and cold, but how his body may bear all this. Thus should Christians do; not so much to take care how to shift and avoid afflictions, but how to bear them with an even quiet mind. As we cannot hinder the rain from falling upon the house, nor the waves from beating upon the ship, nor change of weather and seasons from affecting the body, so it is not in our power to hinder the falling out of afflictions and tribulations: all that lies upon us, is to make provision for such an hour, that we be not overwhelmed by it.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(236.) Do not imagine that because you have hitherto experienced but little trouble, your path shall always be smooth and easy. No; it is a thorny wilderness that you have to pass through, and a troubled ocean that you have to navigate ere you can reach the desired haven. The mariner, when scarcely launched upon the deep, does not expect that the breeze shall be alike gentle to the end of his voyage; he prepares for storms, that he may be ready to meet them when they come. In like manner, you also will do well to prepare for seasons of adversity and trial.

—Simcox, 1758-1836.

AMBITION.

1. Is in itself a beneficial impulse.

(237.) One of the strongest incitements to excel in such arts and accomplishments as are in the highest esteem among men, is the natural passion which the mind of man has for glory; which though it may be faulty in the excess of it, ought by no means to be discouraged. Perhaps some moralists are too severe in beating down this principle, which seems to be a spring implanted by nature to give motion to all the latent powers of the soul, and is always observed to exert itself with the greatest force in the most generous dispositions. The men whose characters have shone the brightest among the ancient Romans appear to have been strongly animated by this passion.

—Hughes.

2. Yet the craving for prominence is often the mark of a poor nature.

(238.) The nettle moutheth on high; while the violet shrouds itself under its own leaves, and is chiefly found out by its fragrantcy. Let Christians be satisfied with the honour that cometh from God only.
—Saller, 1840.

3. It is usually unwise.

(239.) Seek not great things for yourselves in this world, for if your garments be too long, they will make you stumble; and one staff helps a man in his journey, when many in his hands at once hinders him; but labour to do great things for God, and God will do great things for you.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(240.) Who would not be covetous, and with reason, if health could be purchased with gold? Who not ambitious, if it were at the command of power, or restored by honour? But, alas! a white staff will not help gouty feet to walk better than a common cane; nor a blue ribbon bind up a wound so well as a fillet; the glitter of gold or of diamonds will but hurt sore eyes, instead of curing them; and an aching head will be no more eased by wearing a crown instead of a common night-cap.

—Sir. W. Temple.

4. It blinds the understanding.

(241.) Ambition is to the mind what the cap is to the falcon, it first blinds us, and then compels us to lower, by reason of our blindness.

—E. Cook.

5. It is unsatiable.

(242.) Ambition is like the sea which swallows all the rivers and is none the fuller; or like the grave whose insatiable maw for ever craves for the bodies of men. It is not like an amphora, which being full receives no more, but its fulness swells it till a still greater vacuum is formed. In all probability, Napoleon never longed for a sceptre till he had gained the bâton, nor dreamed of being emperor of Europe till he had gained the crown of France. Caligula, with the world at his feet, was mad with a longing for the moon, and could he have gained it the imperial lunatic would have coveted the sun. It is in vain to feed a fire which grows the more voracious the more it is supplied with fuel; he who lives to satisfy his ambition has before him the labour of Sisyphus, who rolled up hill an ever-rebounding stone, and the task of the daughters of Danans, who are condemned for ever to attempt to fill a bottomless vessel with buckets full of holes.

—Spurgeon.

6. It causes men to set aside all moral restraints.

(243.) What are not men ready to do to gratify an inordinate and insatiate ambition! You know how the old Romans built their military roads. They projected them in a mathematical line, straight to the point of termination, and everything had to give way, there could be no deviation. And so on went the road, bridging rivers, filling up ravines, hewing down hills, levelling forests, cutting its way through every obstacle! Just so men set their lust upon self-emolument, some height of ambition, the attainment of place, rank, power, and hew their way toward it, not minding what gives way. No obstacle is insurmountable, health, happiness, home-comfort, honesty, integrity, conscience, the law of God, everything is sacrificed to the god of ambition!

—A. T. Pierson.

7. It exposes us to bitter disappointments.

(244.) Ambition may rear turrets in emulation of heaven, and vainglory build castles in the air; but they shall have no roof, as the latter shall have no foundation. Philip threatened the Lacedemonians, that, as he entered their country, he would utterly extinguish them. They wrote him no other answer but Si (if); meaning, it was a condition well put in, for he was never like to come there.

—Adams, 1653.

(245.) Could we know the secret heart-breaks and wearinesses of ambitious men, we should need no Wolsey's voice crying, "I charge thee, fling away ambition;" but we should flee from it as from the most accursed blood-sucking vampire which ever uprose from the caverns of hell."

—Spurgeon.

8. The penalties of successful ambition more than outweigh its pleasures.

(246.) Envy, a mischief not to be aviped of the great. This shadow follows that body inseparably. All the curs in the street are ready to fall upon that dog that does away with the bone; and every man hath a cudgel to fling at a well-loaded tree; whereas a mean condition is no eyesore to any beholder. Low shrubs are not wont to be struck with lightning; but tall oaks and cedars feel their flames. While David kept his father's sheep at home, he might sing sweetly to his harp in the fields without any disturbance; but when he once comes to the court, and finds applause and greatness creep upon him, now emulation, despite, and malice, dog him close at the heels wheresoever he goes. Let him leave the court, and flee into the wilderness; there these bloodhounds follow him in hot suit. Let him run into the land of the Philistines; there they find him out, and chase him to Ziklag. And if at the last he hath climbed up to his just throne, and there hopes to breathe him after his tedious pursuit, even there he meets with more unquietness than in the desert; and, notwithstanding all his royalty, at last cries out, "Lord, remember David and all his troubles." How many have we known whom their wealth hath betrayed, and made innocent malefactors! who might have slept securely upon a hard bolster, and, in a poor estate, outlived their judges and accusers! Besides, on even ground, a fall may be harmless; but he that falls from on high cannot escape bruising. He therefore that can think the benefits of eminence can countervail the dangers which haunt greatness, let him affect to overtop others: for me, let me rather be safely low than high with peril.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(247.) As for worldly greatness, affect neither the thing nor the reputation of it. Look up, if you please, to the top of steeples, masts, and mountains, but stand below if you would be safe. Though the chimney be the highest part of the house, it is not the cleanest or the sweetest part; it is more scorched with the fire and suffocated with the smoke than other parts.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(248.) The tallest trees are most in the power of the winds, and ambitious men most exposed to the blast of fortunes.

—E. Cook.

9. Its triumphs are soon ended.

(249.) I cannot but look upon all the glory and dignity of this world, lands and lordships, crowns and kingdoms, even as on some brain-sick, beggarly fellow, that borrows fine clothes, and plays the part of a king or lord for an hour on a stage, and then comes down, and the sport is ended, and they are beggars again.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

10. It must be checked in its commencement.

(250.) The smallest root of it, if not quickly plucked up, presently becomes a tree, the deep and strong roots whereof twine about the heart.

—Fenelon.

11. There is a Christian ambition by which we should all be inspired.

(251.) He who diffuses the most happiness and mitigates the most distress within his own circle is undoubtedly the best friend to his country and the world, since nothing more is necessary than for all men to imitate his conduct, to make the greatest part of the misery of the world cease in a moment. While the passion, then, of some is to shine, of some to govern, and of others to accumulate, let one great passion alone influence our breasts, the passion which reason ratifies, which conscience approves, which Heaven inspires,—that of being and doing good.

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

ANGELS, THE.

1. Reasonableness of belief in their existence.

(252.) There are many who deny the existence of any spiritual beings save God and man. The wide universe is to them a solitary land, without inhabitants. There is but one oasis filled with living creatures. It is the earth on which we move; and we, who have from century to century crawled from birth to death, and fretted out our little lives upon this speck of star-dust which sparkles amid a million, million others upon the mighty plain of infinite space, we are the only living spirits. There is something pitiable in this impertinence. It is a drop of dew in the lonely cup of a gentian, which imagines itself to be all the water in the universe. It is the summer midge which has never left its forest pool, dreaming that it and its companions are the only living creatures in earth or air.

There is no proof of the existence of other beings than ourselves, but there is also no proof of the contrary. Apart from revelation, we can think about the subject as we please. But it does seem incredible that we alone should represent in the universe the image of God; and if in one solitary star another race of beings dwell, if we concede the existence of a single spirit other than ourselves, we have allowed the principle. The angelic world of which the Bible speaks is possible to faith.

—Stopford Brooke.

2. How little we know of them.

(253.) Little is said [in the Bible] of angels. They are like the constellations in space: there is light enough to reveal, to show that they are; but more is needed to reveal all their nature and functions.

—Henry Batchelor.

3. Their appearance to the shepherds.

(254.) There is something so unspeakably great and glorious in this union of earthly obscurity with heavenly splendour, of angels with shepherds, of the form of a servant with the majesty of a king, that the well-known saying, "It is not thus invented," can never be better applied than to the whole narrative.

—J. J. Van Oosterzee.

4. Inseparable from our conceptions of Christ.

(255.) Their airy and gentle coming may well be compared to the glory of colours flung by the sun upon the morning clouds, that seem to be born just where they appear. Like a beam of light striking through some orifice, they shine upon Zacharias in the temple. As the morning light finds the flowers, so they found the mother of Jesus; and their message fell on her, pure as dewdrops on the lily. To the shepherds' eyes, they filled the midnight arch like auroral beams of light; but not as silently, for they sang more marvellously than when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy. They communed with the Saviour in His glory of transfiguration, sustained Him in the anguish of the garden, watched Him at the tomb; and as they had thronged the earth at His coming, so they seem to have hovered in the air in multitudes at the hour of His ascension. Beautiful as they seem, they are never mere poetical adornments. The occasions of their appearing are grand, the reasons weighty, and their demeanour suggests and befits the highest conception of superior beings. Their very coming and going is not with earthly movement. They are suddenly seen in the air, as one sees white clouds round out from the blue sky in a summer's day, that melt back even while one looks upon them. We could not imagine Christ's history without angelic lore. The sun without clouds of silver and gold, the morning on the fields without dew-diamonds, but not the Saviour without His angels.

—Becher.

5. How they set us an example.

(256.) No sooner did one angel of the Lord announce the manifestation of God in the flesh, than the whole multitude of the heavenly host immediately are on the wing, breaking forth into the harmonious praises of their Creator, that by their example they might teach us, as often as any one of our brethren should proclaim aloud the lessons of Divine wisdom, or as often as we ourselves should ponder on any sacred truths we have heard or read, that we should at once give praise to the Lord by word of mouth and in our hearts and lives.

—Bede, 672-725.

6. Their interest in man.

(257.) The interest felt by the angels in all that concerns the Gospel, and the eternal interests of men, put on their probation, form a very humbling contrast to our cold indifference in what concerns us much more nearly than them. It is as if, on a ship nearing a lee shore in the midst of tremendous breakers, while every inhabitant of the neighbouring coast was watching her progress with beating hearts, and longing to see her delivered, the passengers and crew should pursue their wonted amusements; or, hanging over the straining sides, idly speculate on the number of billows, and sport with the raging foam. Alas! with the hosts of heaven there is all sympathy and intense interest—with perishing men, all apathy and madness.

7. Their care for God's children.

(258.) Lot's guests were his best friends; he had entertained angels, and they now deliver him; he would have preserved them, and they did preserve him. Where should the angels lodge, but with Lot? The houses of holy men are full of those heavenly spirits, though they be not seen; their protection is comfortable, though not visible. In our tents they pitch their tents; and when devils would mischief us, they turn them out of doors. It is the honour of God's saints to be attended by angels while in life, and to be exalted by angels when they die. Lazarus was "carried by angels into Abraham's bosom." As, in a family, the greater children carry the less, so God has charged His elder sons, the angels, to bear up our souls.

—Adams, 1653.

8. Their joy in the conversion of sinners.

(259.) "A child lost in the forest!" Such was the cry which startled the inhabitants of a remote and thinly-populated district in the wilderness. After a search of three days, the child was found, faint and famished, and well-nigh dead with weariness and terror. With songs and shouts they bore him back in their arms, swift runners going before, and crying "FOUND, FOUND!" The entire hamlet was stirred by the tidings, and broke forth into thanksgivings. All participated in the happiness of the parents; and though there were a hundred children in the settlement, more joy was felt that night over the one little wanderer rescued from death, than over the ninety and nine that had been exposed to no danger.

This touching incident well illustrates the joy of angels over the repentant sinner—that thrill of rapture every conversion sends through all the ranks of the blessed. And why do they so rejoice? Conversion brings a new servant to their Lord. It is the accession of a new individual to that holy kingdom of which God and His Christ are the head. Satan loses a vassal, and God reclaims a subject. In every individual converted and saved, they also behold a living manifestation of divine mercy, a new trophy in the temple of Christ's praise, a new jewel added to His crown, a new star lighted up in the firmament of His glory. And then, as they reflect on the misery he escapes, the gloom, and the flame, and the groans of the prison-house from which he has been delivered, and think of the overflowing glories and transports of a blessed immortality awaiting him in their happy society, is it any wonder that they should burst forth in triumphant hosannas, and make all heaven ring with this outgushing joy?

We may illustrate this by an incident which occurred in connection with the wreck of the ill-fated steamer Central America. A few days after that startling event, which sent hundreds to a watery grave, and plunged the nation in grief, a pilot-boat was seen, on a fair, breezy morning, standing up the bay of New York. The very appearance of the vessel gave token that she was freighted with tidings of no common interest. With every sail set, and streamers flying, she leaped along the waters as if buoyant with some great joy; while the glad winds that swelled her canvas, and the sparkling waves that kissed her sides, and urged her on her way, seemed to laugh with conscious delight. As she drew nearer an unusual excitement was visible on her deck: and her captain, running out to the extreme point of the bowsprit, and swinging his cap, appeared to be shouting something with intense earnestness and animation. At first, the distance prevented his being distinctly understood. But soon, as the vessel came farther into the harbour, the words, Three more saved! Three more saved! reached the nearest listeners. They were caught up by the crews of the multitudinous ships that lay anchored around, and sailors sprang wildly into the rigging and shouted, "Three more saved!" They were heard on the wharves; and the porter threw down his load, and the drayman stopped his noisy cart, and shouted, "Three more saved!" The tidings ran along the streets; and the newsboys left off crying the last murder, and shouted, "Three more saved!" Busy salesmen dropped their goods, book-keepers their pens, bankers their discounts, tellers their gold, and merchants, hurrying on the stroke of the last hour of grace to pay their notes, paused in their headlong haste, and shouted, "Three more saved!" Louder and louder grew the cry—fast and faster it spread—along the crowded piers of the Hudson and East River—up by the graves of Trinity, the hotels of Broadway, the marble palaces of the Fifth Avenue—over the heights of Brooklyn—across to Hoboken and Jersey City—away, away, beyond tower and pinnacle, beyond mansion and temple, beyond suburb and hamlet—till a million hearts pulsed with its thrill, and above all the sounds of the vast metropolis, mightier than all, hushing all, rose the great, exultant shout, "Three more saved! Three more saved!"

If cold and selfish men will thus stop short in the eager quest of gain or of pleasure, to let the voice of humanity speak out, and to express their joy that three fellow-beings have been rescued from the ocean depths, shall we deem it an incredible thing that the holy and loving denizens of heaven should rejoice when a sinner repents, and is delivered from the abyss of hell? —Ide.

(260.) I have read that when the Declaration of Independence was being made in Philadelphia, in 1776, the people were so anxious to know the exact moment when the document was completed, that they placed a man at the door of the hall where the delegates were assembled, and another man on the stairs leading to the tower, and another man with his hand on the rope of the bell; and then, when the last signer of the Declaration had affixed his name, the man at the door shouted upward, "Ring!" and the man on the stairs heard it, and shouted upward, "Ring!" and the man with his hand on the bell of the rope heard it, and sounded the tidings over the city.

If to-night, in the strength of Christ, you would make your declaration of independence from the power of sin, there would be great rejoicing on earth and in heaven. I would cry upward to the angels poising in mid-air, Ring! and they to those standing on the battlements of heaven, Ring! and those on the battlements to the dwellers in the temples and in the mansions, Ring! and all heaven would ring, and ring, at the news of a soul redeemed.

—Talmage.

ANGER.

1. Defined.

(261.) Aristotle, in his Rhetoric, . . . defines anger to be "a desire, accompanied by mental uneasiness, of avenging one's self, or, as it were, inflitting punishment for something that appears an unbecoming slight, either in things which concern one's self, or some of one's friends." And he hence infers that, if this be anger, it must be invariably felt towards some individual, not against a class or description of persons.

—Whately.

2. Differs from hatred.

(262.) There is a great difference between the sin of one who is angry, and the cruelty of one who holds another in hatred. For even with our children are we angry; but who is ever found to hate his children? Among the very cattle, too, the cow, in a sort of weariness, will sometimes in anger drive away her suckling calf; but anon she embraces it with all the affection of a mother. She is in a way disgusted with it when she butts it; yet, when she misses it, she will seek after it. Nor do we discipline our children otherwise than with a degree of anger and indignation; yet we should not discipline them at all, but in love to them.

So far, then, is every one who is angry from hating, that sometimes one would be rather convicted of hating if he were not angry; for suppose a child wishes to play in some river's stream, by whose force he would be like to perish, if you see this and patiently suffer it, this would be hating—your patient suffering him in his death. How far better is it to be angry than to suffer him to perish. Great is the difference, indeed, between one's exceeding due limits in some words through anger, which he afterwards wipes off by repenting of it, and the keeping an insidious purpose shut up in the heart.
—Augustine, 353-429.

(263.) Anger is a transient hatred; or, at least, very like it.
—South, 1633-1716.

(264.) Adam Smith, in his Theory of Moral Sentiments, seems to consider as the chief point of distinction between anger and hatred, the necessity to the gratification of the former that the object of it should not only be punished, but punished by means of the offended person, and on account of the particular injury inflicted. Anger requires that the offender should not only be made to grieve in his turn, but to grieve for that particular wrong which has been done by him. The natural gratification of this passion tends, of its own accord, to produce all the political ends of punishment: the correction of the criminal, and example to the public.
—Whately.

3. A compound of pride and folly.

(265.) He does anger too much honour who calls it madness, which being a distemper of the brain, and a total absence of all reason, is innocent of all the ill effects it may produce, whereas anger is an affected madness, compounded of pride and folly, and an intention to do commonly more mischief than it can bring to pass.
—Lord Clarendon, 1608-1673.

4. Different kinds of anger.

(266.) If of two evils we ought to choose the least, sudden anger upon slight and inadequate occasions is, at anyrate, better than secret and cunning malice, which burns the longer the more it is concealed, and generally breaks out, at its own time, into inextinguishable revenge.

Irascibility is like a flame in flax or straw, which suddenly blazes up, and as suddenly dies; and those subject to it are for the most part upright, truthful, and honourable persons, who, when the transitory heat is past, repay by their liberality any injury they may have done.

Slow wrath, however, is like the flame of sulphur, or like fire in green wood, which, the longer it takes to kindle, burns with all the more intense heat. Persons who, when they receive an affront, knavishly smile, keep silence, and pretend indifference, generally treasure up rancour in their breasts, and wait for some convenient time to discharge it with greater vengeance. They are like goats, which deliberately recede from their adversary, when they mean to give him a hard blow, and level him with the ground. Of such persons it is well to beware.

—Scriver, 1629-1693.

5. Impulses to anger must be carefully repressed.

(267.) When anger rises, think of the consequences.
—Confucius.

(268.) If anger is not restrained, it is frequently more hurtful to us than the injury that provokes it.
—Seneca.

(269.) If we have eaten poison, we seek forthwith to vomit it up again with all speed; and if we be fallen into any disease, we use the means we can to provide a remedy; so, likewise, when we feel any unruly motions of anger, and the fiery flames thereof be once kindled in our hearts, we must be careful to repress them, as we would be to quench the fire in our houses.
—Cowdrey, 1598-1664.

(270.) If anger arises in thy breast, instantly seal up thy lips, and let it not go forth: for, like fire when it wants vent, it will suppress itself. It is good in a fever to have a tender and smooth tongue; but it is better that it be in anger; for if it be rough and distempered, there it is an ill sign, but here it is an ill cause. Angry passion is a fire, and angry words like breath to fan them together; they are like steel and flint, sending out fire by mutual collision.
—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(271.) Never do anything that can denote an angry mind; for, although everybody is born with a certain degree of passion, and, from untoward circumstances, will sometimes feel its operation, and be what they call "out of humour," yet a sensible man or woman will never allow it to be discovered. Check and restrain it; never make any determination until you find it has entirely subsided; and always avoid saying anything that you may wish unsaid.
—Lord Collingwood.

6. Must be moderately expressed.

(272.) They who put on a supreme anger, or express the less anger with the highest reproaches, can do no more to him that steals, than to him that breaks a crystal; non plus aequo, non diutius aequo, was a good rule for reprehension of offending servants; but no more anger, no more severe language than the thing deserves: if you chide too long, your reproof is changed into reproach; if too bitterly, it becomes railing; if too loud, it is immodest; if too public, it is like a dog.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

7. Is not to be too long retained.

(273.) As fire when it is covered with ashes, yet it is not quenched; even so anger or choler, though it be dissembled, covered, or retained in the heart awhile, yet it is not so quenched, but it hatcheth hatred, which by little and little so converteth itself into his substance, as in short time it becometh inseparable from his nature.

—Cawdray, 1598-1664.

(274.) It is observable that the New Testament precept on the subject of anger is, in so many words, a restraint and not a prohibition. "Be ye angry, and sin not; let not the sun go down upon your wrath." Anger in itself is no sin, but it has a tendency to become so rapidly if it be harboured too long. Like the manna it corrupts and breeds worms if kept over night in the close chamber of the heart. Then it will appear in the morbid shapes of spite, malice, revenge. The Christian rule is to throw it all away before the fermentation commences.

—Goulburn.

8. Its Unrighteousness.

(275.) The angry man, like the two hot disciples that called fire from heaven, ordains himself the judge, and would have God turn his executioner.

—Adams, 1653.

9. Its Folly.

(276.) The choleric man is like one that dwells in a thatched house, who, being rich in the morning, by a sudden fire is a beggar before night.

How foolish is the bee that loses her life and her sting together. She puts another to a little pain, but how dearly does she pay for it.

—Adams, 1653.

(277.) To be angry, is to revenge the faults of others upon ourselves.

10. The folly of meeting anger with anger.

(278.) Like as if a man join fire to fire, he maketh the flame the greater; even so, if a man think to suppress another man's anger by being angry himself, he shall both lose his labour, and rather increase the other man's anger.

—Cawdray, 1598-1664.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

11. Silence is the best reply to offensive sayings.

(280.) It is reported of Titus Vespasian, that when any one spake ill of him, he was wont to say that he was above false reports; and if they were true, he had more reason to be angry with himself than the relator. And the good Emperor Theodosius commanded no man should be punished that spake against him: "for what was spoken slightly," said he, "was to be laughed at; what spitefully, to be pardoned; what angrily, to be pitied; and if truly, he would thank him for it." Oh, that there were but such a frame of spirit in this carping age of ours, wherein men, like tinder, are ready to take fire upon the least spark that falls, to quarrel sometimes on the most inoffensive word that can be spoken; whereas the best way is to be silent. Sile et furantem delisti plagam (Say nothing, and you pay a talking man to the purpose). Thus it was that Hezekiah would not answer Rabshakeh, nor Jeremiah Hananiah, nor our blessed Saviour His railing adversaries. He reviled not His revilers; He threatened not His opponents. (Jer. xxviii. 11; Matt. xxvi. 62; 1 Pet. ii. 23.) —Spencer, 1654.

12. It often works irreparable mischief.

(281.) He that is inebriated with passion is unfit for an action; like Samson's foxes, he scatters fire-brands abroad, to the hurt of all that are near him.

—Adams, 1653.

(282.) Your anger may sting venomously. Your jealousy may do a mischief in one short hour that your whole life cannot repair. Your cruel pride may do a whole age's work in a day. You cannot take back the injuries that you have done to those whose hearts lie throbbing next to yours. Ah! when winter has frozen my heliotropes, it makes no difference that the next morning thaws them out. There lie the heliotropes—a black, noisome heap; and it is possible for you to chill a tender nature so that no thawing can restore it. You may relent, but frost has been there, and you cannot bring back freshness and fragrance to the blossom. You cannot sweeten the embittered heart to which your words have been like scorpions. It is a terrible thing for a man to have the power of poisoning the hearts of others, and yet carry that power carelessly. He cannot find place for repentance, though he seeks it carefully with tears.

—Becher.

13. Irritableness is a characteristic of weak and base natures.

(283.) Anger is certainly a kind of baseness; as it appears well in the weakness of those subjects in whom it reigns,—children, women, old folks, sick folks. Only men must beware that they carry their anger rather with scorn than with fear; so that they may seem rather to be above the injury than below it; which is a thing easily done, if a man will give law to himself in it.

—Bacon, 1560-1626.

(284.) It is the base and vile bramble, the fruit of the earth's curse, that tears and rends what is next to it.

—Adams, 1653.

(285.) Wise men are not too nimble at an injury. For as, with fire, the light stuff and rubbish kindle sooner than the solid and more compacted; so anger sooner inflames a fool than a man composed in his resolutions.

—Felltham, 1668.

14. How the tendency to it is to be overcome.

(286.) There is no other way but to meditate and ruminate well upon the effects of anger,—how it troubles man's life; and the best time to do this is to look back upon anger when the fit is thoroughly over. Seneca saith well, "that anger is like rain, which breaks itself upon that it falls." The Scripture exhorteth us "to possess our souls in patience;" whosoever is out of patience is out of possession of his soul.

—Bacon, 1560-1626.

APOSTLES, THE

1. Were trained for their task.

(287.) Such men Christ took as might be no occasion to their hearers to ascribe the work to their efficiency; but yet, such men, too, as should be no examples to insufficient men to adventure upon that great service ; but men, though ignorant before, yet docile and glad to learn. In a rough stone, a cunning lapidary will easily foresee what his cutting, and his polishing, and his art will bring that stone to. A cunning statuary discerns in a marble stone under his feet where there will arise an eye, and an ear, and a hand, and other lineaments, to make it a perfect statue. Much more did our Saviour Christ, who was Himself the author of that disposition in them (for no man has any such disposition but from God), foresee in these fishermen an inclinableness to become useful in that great service of His Church. Therefore, He took them from their own ship, but He sent them from His cross. He took them, weather-beaten with north and south winds, and routh-cast with foam and mud, but He sent them back suppled, and smoothed, and levigated, quickened and animated with that spirit which He had breathed into them. He took fishermen, and He sent fishers of men. He sent them not out to preach, as soon as He had called them to Him ; He called them ad discipulatum before He called them ad apostolatam ; He taught them before they taught others.

2. Their natural unfitness for the task assigned them.

(288.) When kings send out ambassadors to represent their person and their interests in foreign courts, they choose out from amongst the people men of high name and reputation, well skilled in the ways of the world and the policy of states ; whom, having clothed with powers plenipotentiary, and appointed with officers and servants of every kind, they send forth accredited with royal letters to all courts and kingdoms whither they may come, furnished with grace and splendour to feast the common eye, and laden with rich gifts to take the cupidity or conciliate the favour of those with whom they have to do. Also, when a nation fitteth out a journey or voyage of discovery, they choose out men of fortitude, humanity, and skill, upon whom to bestow a valorous and steady crew, who will not be daunted by the dangers, nor baffled by the difficulties of the work ; and having called in the whole science and art of the country, to fortify and accommodate the danger-hunting men, they launch them forth amidst the hearty cheers and benedictions of their country. And when a nation arrayeth its strength to battle for its ancient rights and dominions ; or when a noble nation armeth in the cause of humanity to help an insulted sister in the day of her need, as we Britons have oft been called upon to do, the nation is shaken to her very centre with commotion, and every arm and sinew of the land straineth to the work. Fleets and armies, and munitions of war ; the whole chivalry, the whole prowess, strength and policy, and oft the whole wealth of the land muster in the cause ; and the chief captains forsake their wives and children, and peaceful homes ; and the warlike harness is taken from the hall where it hung in peace ; and the bold peasantry come trooping from their altars and their household hearths ; and " the trumpet speaketh to the armed throng : " they gather into one, and descend unto the shores of the surrounding sea, whither every fleet ship and gallant sailor have made ready to bear them to the place where the rights of the nation, or the insulted rights of humanity, cry upon their righteous arm for redress ; and their kinsmen follow them with their prayers, and their wives and children, their fathers, and the households of their fathers, with the assembled congregations of the people, commit them and their righteous cause to the safe conduct and keeping of the Lord of Hosts.

But when the King of Heaven sendeth forth these twelve ambassadors to the nations, fitteth out these discoverers of the people that sat in darkness and the shadow of death, and furnisheth forth this little army to subvert the thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers of darkness which brooded over the degenerate earth, to bring forth the lost condition of humanity, and establish its crown of glory as at the first, He took men of no name nor reputation, endowed with no Greek, with no Roman fame, by science untaught, by philosophy unschooled, fishermen from the shores of an inland sea ; the class of men, which of all classes is distinguished for no exploit in the story of the world ; Galileans, a people despised of the Jews, who were themselves a despised people. As at first, when God wished to make a man in His own image, after His own likeness, He brought not the materials from heavenly regions, neither created a finer quintessence of matter for the high occasion, but took from the ground a handful of dust, thereon to impress His divine image, and thereinto to breathe the spirit of lives : so the Son of God, Himself a servant, despised and rejected of men, when He chose vessels to bear His name before Gentiles and kings, and the children of Israel, preferred that they should be empty of human greatness, without any grace or comeliness in the sight of man, without any odour of a good name, or rich contents of learning or knowledge ;—that the treasure being in earthen vessels, the praise might be of God.

—Irving.

3. The wonderfulness of their success.

(289.) Do the Greeks charge the Apostles with want of learning ? This same charge is their praise. And when they say that the Apostles were rude, let us follow up the remark, and say, that they were also untaught, and unlettered, and poor, and vile, and wanting in acuteness, and insignificant persons. It is not a slander on the Apostles to say so, but it is even a glory that, being such, they should have outshone the whole world. For these untrained, and rude, and illiterate men, have completely vanquished the wise, and powerful, and the tyrants, and those who flourished in wealth and glory, and all outward good things, as though they had not been men at all : from whence it is manifest that great is the power of the Cross ; and that these things were done by no human strength. For the results do not keep the course of nature, rather the good done was above all nature. Now, when anything takes place above nature, and exceedingly above it, on the side of rectitude and utility, it is quite plain that these things are done by some Divine power and co-operation. And observe : the fisherman, the tentmaker, the publican, the ignorant, the unlettered, coming from the far distant country of Palestine, and having beaten off their own ground the philosophers, the masters of oratory, the skilful debaters, alone prevailed against them in a short space of time ; in the midst of many perils, the opposition of people and kings, the striving of nature herself, length of time, the vehement resistance of inveterate custom, demons in arms, the devil in battle-array, and stirring up all—kings, rulers, people, nations, cities, barbarians, Greeks, philosophers, orators, sophists, historians, laws, tribunals, divers kinds of punishments, deaths innumerable, and of all sorts. But, nevertheless, all these were confuted, and gave way when the fishermen spake; just like the light dust, which cannot bear the rush of violent winds. Now, what I say is, let us learn thus to dispute with the Greeks; that we be not like beasts and cattle, but "prepared" as concerning "the hope which is in us." And let us pause for a while to work out this topic, no unimportant one; and let us say to them, How did the weak overcome the strong; the twelve, the world? Not by using the same armour, but in nakedness contending with men in arms.

For, say, if twelve men, unskilled in matters of war, were to leap into the midst of an immense and armed host of soldiers, themselves not only unarmed but of weak frame also; and to receive no harm from them, nor yet be wounded, though assailed with ten thousand weapons; if, while the darts were piercing them through, with bare naked body, they overthrew all their foes, using no weapons but striking with the hand, and in conclusion killing some, and others took captive and led away, themselves receiving not so much as a wound, would any one have ever said that the thing was of man? And yet the trophy of the Apostles is much more wonderful than that. For a man's escaping a wound is not so wonderful by far, as that the ordinary and unlettered person,—that a fisherman,—should overcome such a body of talent; and neither for fewness, nor for poverty, nor for dangers, nor for prepossession of habit, nor for so great austerity of the precepts given in charge, nor for the daily deaths, nor for the multitude of those who were deceived, nor for the great reputation of the deceivers, be turned from his purpose.

—Chrysostom, 347-407.

(290.) Had it been published by a voice from heaven, that twelve poor men, taken out of boats and creeks, without any help of learning, should conquer the world to the cross, it might have been thought an illusion against all the reason of men; yet we know it was undertaken and accomplished by them. They published this doctrine in Jerusalem, and quickly spread it over the greatest part of the world. Folly outwitted wisdom, and weakness overpowered strength. The conquest of the East by Alexander was not so admirable as the enterprise of these poor men.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

4. Their success is a proof that they wrought miracles.

(291.) A few persons of an odious and despised country could not have filled the world with believers, had they not shown undoubted credentials from the Divine person who sent them on such a message.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

5. Their boldness.

(292.) Many interdictions rung peals of menaces in the Apostles' ears, that they "should speak no more in the name and word of Christ;" they did all rather, like bells, toll them into the Church, to preach it more fervently. The princes of the nations would have hedged it in with their prohibitions; but the word of heaven and edict of God's spiritual court of glory scored the prohibitions given by their temporary laws. They might easier have hedged in the wind, or pounded the eagle.

—Adams, 1653.

6. Their influence compared with that of the ancient philosophers.

(293.) Where are all the sects of philosophers, the Platonists, the Peripatetics, the Stoics, the Epicureans, and the rest that filled Greece with their fame, and so many volumes with fancies and error? Like a torrent that rolls down with great noise from the top of a mountain, so for a time the speculations of their lofty minds poured along in a flood of swelling, frothy eloquence; but now (and for many ages since) the very channel is dried up wherein they ran, so that scarce any visible ruins remain in Athens itself of the schools where they taught the greatest among them. Plato, adorned with the title of divine, could never see his commonwealth framed by him with so much study, to be satisfied in one city. Whereas if we consider the gospel of Christ, it is hard to determine whether the doctrine be more simple or the Apostles the first masters of it to outward appearance; yet, without learning or human strength, in a short space they triumphed over that eloquence of the Greeks, the power of the Romans, the rage of the barbarous nations. They abrogated laws, changed customs, and renewed the face of the world.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

ARGUMENTS.

1. Their value.

(294.) Testimony is like an arrow shot from a long bow, the force of it depends on the strength of the hand that draws it: argument is like an arrow from a cross-bow, which has great force though shot by a child.

—Bacon, 1560-1626.

2. How they are to be estimated.

(295.) Reasons of things are rather to be taken by weight than tale.

—Collier, 1650-1726.

3. Are not to be accumulated on one side of a question only.

(296.) Hunting after arguments to make good one side of a question, and wholly to neglect those which favour the other, is wilfully to misguide the understanding; and is so far from giving truth its due value, that it wholly debases it.

—Locke.

4. Should not be used too profusely.

(297.) Whereas men have many reasons to persuade, to use them all at once weakeneth them. For it argueth a neediness in every one of the reasons, as if one did not trust to any of them, but fled from one to another.

—Bacon, 1560-1626.

5. Value of probable arguments.

(298.) Probable arguments are like little stars, every one of which will be useless as to our conduct and enlightening, but when they are tied together by order and vicinity, by the finger of God and the hand of an angel, they make a constellation, and are not only powerful in their influence, but like a bright angel to guide and to enlighten our way. And, although the light is not great as the light of the sun or moon, yet mariners sail by their conduct ; and, though with trepidation and some dangers, yet very regularly they enter into the haven. This heap of probable inducements is of no power as a mathematical and physical demonstration, which is in discourse as the sun is in the heaven, but it makes a milky and a white path, visible enough to walk securely. And next to these tapers of effective reason, drawn from the nature, and from the events, and the accidents, and the expectation, and experiences of things, stands the grandeur of a long and united authority. The understanding thus reasoning, that it is not credible that this thing should have escaped the wiser heads of all the great personages in the world, who stood at the chair of princes, or sat in the ruler's chair, and should not only appear to two or three bold, illiterate, or vicious persons, ruled by lusts, and overruled by evil habits. But in this we have the same security and the same confidence that timorous persons have in the dark ; they are pleased, and can see what is and what is not if there be a candle ; but in the dark they are less fearful if they be in company.

6. Lawfulness of arguments ad hominem.

(299.) In the persuasion of a truth, it is lawful to use such arguments whose strength is wholly made prevailing by the weakness of him that is to be persuaded. Such as are arguments ad hominem, that is, proportionable to the doctrines, customs, usages, belief, and credulity of the man.

The reasons are these :—

1. Because ignorant persons are not capable of such arguments as may demonstrate the question ; and he that goes to draw a child to him, may pull him by the long sleeve of his coat, and need not hire a yoke of oxen.

2. That which will demonstrate a truth to one person, possibly will never move another.

But in all arguments which are to prevail by the weakness or advantages taken from the man, he that goes about to persuade must not say anything that he knows to be false ; but he must comply and twist about the man's weakness, so as to be innocent all the way. Let him take him that is weak and wrap him in swaddling clothes, but not encompass him with snakes. —Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

7. Should be conducted calmly.

(300.) We see in experience, that confidence is generally ill-grounded, and is a kind of passion in the understanding ; and is commonly made use of, like fury and force, to supply for the weakness and want of argument. If a man can prove what he says by good argument, there is no need of confidence to back and support it. We may at any time trust a plain and substantial reason, and leave it to make its own way, and to bear out itself. But if the man's reasons and arguments be not good, his confidence adds nothing of real force to them, in the opinion of wise men, and tends only to its own confusion. Arguments are like powder, which will carry and do execution according to its true strength ; and all the rest is but noise.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

8. Folly of abuse in argument.

(301.) Upon the points in which we dissent from each other, argument will always secure the attention of the wise and good ; whereas, invective must disgrace the cause which we may respectively wish to support.

—Parr.

(302.) Nothing is easier than to use bad names ; but bad names are bad arguments. When your opponent is driven to personal abuse, he is driven to his wit's end, and you may safely leave him. Never throw mud. You may miss your mark, but you must have dirty hands.

—Joseph Parker.

9. The best mode of refuting sophistical arguments.

(303.) False reasoners are often best confuted by giving them the full swing of their own absurdities. Some arguments may be compared to wheels, where half a turn will put everything upside down that is attached to their peripheries ; but if we complete the circle, all things will be just where we found them. Hence, it is common to say, that arguments that prove too much, prove nothing. I once heard a gentleman affirm, that all mankind were governed by a strong and overruling influence, which determined all their actions, and over which they had no control ; and the inference deducible from such a position was, that there was no distinction between virtue and vice. Now, let us give this mode of reasoning full play. A murderer is brought before a judge, and sets up this strong and overruling propensity in justification of his crime. Now, the judge, even if he admitted the plea, must, on the criminal's own showing, condemn him to death. He would thus address the prisoner : You had a strong propensity to commit a murder, and this, you say, must do away the guilt of your crime ; but I have a strong propensity to hang you for it, and this, I say, must also do away with the guilt of your punishment.

—Colton, 1832.

ASSURANCE.

I. IS DESIRABLE.

(304.) The conceit of propriety hardens a man against many inconveniences, and adds much to our pleasure. The mother abides many unquiet nights, many painful throes and unpleasant savours of her child, upon this thought, "It is my own." . . . If we could think, It is my God that cheers me with His presence and blessings, while I prosper ; that afflicts me in love, when I am dejected ; my Saviour is at God's right hand ; my angels stand in His presence—it could not be but God's favour could be sweeter, His chastisements more easy, His benefits more effectual.

—Holdsworth, 1627.

II. IS ESSENTIAL :—

1. To the comfort and joy of the believer.

(306.) It is related of a man, that being upon the point of drowning in a great river, he looked up and saw the rainbow in the clouds, and considering that God had set it there as a sign of His covenant, never more to drown the world by water, made this sad conclusion to himself: "But what if He save the world from a deluge of waters, and suffer me to be drowned here in this river, I shall be never the better for that. When I am once gone, all the world is gone with me." Thus it is in the matter of heaven and heavenly things, as in the point of calling and election, whereas it is said that many are called but few chosen; so that if a man cannot make out unto himself that he is none of the many so-called, and one of the few that shall be certainly saved, he must needs be but in a sad condition. What is the blood of Christ, though in itself sufficient to save ten thousand worlds, if it be not efficient in the application thereof unto his soul? He shall be never the better for it. What if the Gospel come to him in word only, and not in power, not in the Holy Ghost and full assurance? It would do him little good. What are promises, if he be not heir of them? What are mercies, if he be no sharer in them? What is heaven, if he have no evidence for it? And what is Christ (though all in all in Himself, yet nothing—nay, the further occasion of damnation to him), if he be not in Him? —Alardus Emstrelredamus, 1518.

(307.) A man may praise God for the redemption of the world, &c., who has no consciousness of having secured an interest in it, but not like him who feels he has a property in it. How different will be their feelings! Just as great will be the difference of interest which will be felt by a stranger passing through a beautiful estate, and by the owner of it. One may admire the richness of the soil, the beauty of its crops, and the stateliness of its trees; but his interest in it will fall very far short of his who has the title and property in it. —Salter, 1840.

2. To his spiritual vigour.

(308.) Believe me, the life of grace is no dead level; it is not a fen country, a vast flat. There are mountains and there are valleys. There are tribes of Christians who live in the lowlands, like the poor Swiss of the Valais, who live between the lofty ranges of mountains in the midst of the miasma, where the air is stagnant, and fever has its lair, and the human frame grows languid and enfeebled. Such dwellers in the lowlands of unbelief are for ever doubting, fearing, troubled about their interest in Christ, and tossed to and fro; but there are other believers, who, by God's grace, have climbed the mountain of full assurance and near communion, their place is with the eagle in his eyrie, high aloft; they are like the strong mountaineer, who has trodden the virgin snow, who has breathed the fresh, free air of the Alpine regions, and therefore his sinews are braced, and his limbs are vigorous; these are they who do great exploits, being mighty men, men of renown. —Spurgeon.

III. IS ATTAINABLE.

(309.) As certain as he that hath a corporeal eye knoweth that he sees, so certainly he that is illuminated with the light of faith knoweth that he believeth. The glorious splendour of such an orient and splendid jewel cannot but show itself, and shine clearly to the heart wherein it dwells. Like a bright lamp set up in the soul, it does not only manifest other things, but also itself appears by its own light. When I see and rely upon a man promising me this or that, I know I see and rely upon him. Shall I by faith behold my blessed Redeemer lifted up, as an only antitype of the brazen serpent, for the everlasting cure of my wounded conscience, and rest upon Him, and yet know no such thing? —Salter, 1840.

(310.) Next, it is asked, "Can a man know within himself that he is a Christian? If so, does that constitute experimental religion?"

If it were not that men's minds have been greatly perplexed by diverse and often contrary instructions, so that they are really bewildered, I should almost be disposed to ridicule such a question. When I think of the truth itself, it seems preposterous that a man should not know whether he is a Christian or not. Suppose a man should ask you, "Do you know, sir, whether you are sick or whether you are well?" I think there is no difficulty in your being able to answer that question. You either are well, or, you are sick, or, you are a little unwell. You can state almost to a degree where you are on the scale of health.

Or, to take it out of the sphere of bodily sensation, suppose a man should ask you, "Do you know, sir, whether you are happy or unhappy?" Would you be in doubt as to that?

Suppose a man should come to you and say, "Have you any idea whether you are a man of truth and veracity or not?" If a man wants to know himself on that subject, can he not? Do you not generally have a pretty near estimate of what you are?

Suppose a man should ask you, "Are you a thief, or are you not?" Cannot a man know it if he is honest? It is hard work, I know, for some; but still it can be found out.

Or, put it in a different form still. Suppose a man should ask you, "Are you on the side of justice and liberty, or are you on the side of false aristocracy and oppression?" Can a man doubt which side he is on?

Again, suppose a man should ask you, "Are you a British subject or an American citizen? Do you belong to Great Britain or to the young Stars-and-Stripes country? Which government are you under, anyhow?"

Now, if I think simply of the truth, I aver that it is just as easy and natural that a man should know whether he is a Christian or not, as that he should know whether he is an American or a Briton, whether he belongs to Canada or the United States, whether he is sick or well, whether he is democratic or aristocratic. For religion is not a mystic veil that descends upon a man from afar, that he has no connection with, and that comes and goes as atmospheric conditions do. Religion has in it all the great distinctive elements of intelligent being—namely, reason, conviction, moral will, and distinct and classified emotions; and they belong to man in such relations that he can tell whether he has them or not, and whether he has them on one side or on the other.

But when I look at the feebleness of many persons' minds; when I see their want of discrimination; when I remember how they are blown about by many winds of doctrine; when I observe how some men have the idea that religion is mere ecstatic fervour, and how other men have the idea that religion is something widely different from that; when I call to mind the fact that the tests of religious experience have been varied by different schools and in different ways; and when I consider how a sensitive conscience and an emotive nature must be drifted hither and thither by these conflicting views—I am constrained to say that a man may be a Christian, and yet be in great doubt as to whether he is one or not.

—Beecher.

IV. YET EVEN BY GENUINE BELIEVERS IS NOT ALWAYS ATTAINED.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(312.) Assurance is a fruit that grows out of the root of faith; the fruits in winter appear not upon the tree. Because I see not a flourishing top, shall I deny the existence and sappiness of the root? Mary, when she wept at Christ's feet, had no assurance of His love, yet Christ sent her away with the encomium of her faith, acted before the comfort dropped from His lips. (Luke vii. 45-50.) The characters of faith may be written in the heart as letters engraven upon a seal, yet filled with so much dust as not to be distinguished; the dust hinders the reading of the letters, but does not raze them out.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(313.) A child of God may have the kingdom of grace in his heart, yet not know it. The cup was in Benjamin's sack, though he did not know it was there; thou mayest have faith in thy heart, the cup may be in thy sack, though thou knowest it not. Old Jacob wept for his son Joseph, when Joseph was alive; thou mayest weep for want of grace, when grace may be alive in thy heart. The seed may be in the ground, when we do not see it spring up; the seed of God may be sown in thy heart, though thou dost not perceive the springing of it up. Think not grace is lost, because it is hid.

—Watson, 1696.

(314.) Salvation, and the joy of salvation, are not always contemporaneous: the latter does not always accompany the former in present experience, though ultimately, as cause and effect, they must be united. Though they are not parallel lines, yet they are converging lines which must meet at last, however gradual be the tendency towards each other. They differ as life and health, as heirship and the means of knowing it.

—Salter, 1840.

V. EFFORTS SHOULD BE MADE TO ATTAIN IT.

(315.) Labour as to know heaven to be the only happiness, so also to be thy happiness. We may confess heaven to be the best condition, though we despair of enjoying it; and we may desire and seek it, if we see the attainment to be but probable and hopeful: but we can never delightfully rejoice in it, till we are somewhat persuaded of our title to it. What comfort is it to a man that hath not a bit to put in his mouth, to see a feast which he must not taste of? What delight hath a man that hath not a house to put his head in, to see sumptuous buildings of others? Would not all this rather increase his anguish, and make him more sensible of his own misery? So, for a man to know the excellences of heaven, and not to know whether he shall ever enjoy them, may well raise desire, and provoke to seek it, but it will raise but little joy and content. Who will set his heart on another man's possessions? If your house, your goods, your cattle, were not your own, you would less mind them, and delight less in them. Oh, therefore, Christian, rest not till you can call this rest your own; sit not down without assurance.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(316.) You have a valuable house or farm. It is suggested that the title is not good. You employ counsel. You have the deeds examined. You search the record for mortgages, judgments, and liens. You are not satisfied until you have a certificate, signed by the great seal of the State, assuring you that the title is good. Yet how many leave their title to heaven an undecided matter! Why do you not go to the records, and find it? Give yourself no rest day nor night, until you can read your title clear to mansions in the skies.

—Talmage.

VI. COUNSELS TO THOSE WHO ARE SEEKING TO ATTAIN IT.

1. Avoid everything that would tend to cause you to return an untrue verdict.

(317.) Let not self-love, partiality, or pride on the one side, or fear on the other side, pervert your judgment in the trial, and hinder you from the discerning of the truth. Some men cannot see the clearest evidences of their unsanctified hearts, because self-love will give them leave to believe nothing of themselves which is bad or sad. They will believe that which is good and pleasant, be it never so evidently false. As if a thief could be saved from the gallows, by a strong conceit that he is a true man: or the conceit that one is learned would make him learned. Others, through timorousness, can believe nothing that is good or comfortable of themselves; like a man on the top of a steeple, who, though he know that he standeth fast and safe, yet trembleth when he looketh down, and can scarce believe his own understanding. Silence all the objections of an over-timorous mind, and it will doubt and tremble still.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(318.) Look not so much either at what you should be, or at what others are, as to forget what you are yourselves. Some look so much at the glory of that full perfection which they want, as that their present grace seemeth nothing to them; like a candle to one that hath been gazing on the sun. And some look so much at the debauchery of the worst, that they think their lesser wickedness to be holiness.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(319.) It concerns all who think it worth while to be in earnest with their immortal souls not to abuse themselves with a false confidence; a thing so easily taken up, and so hardly laid down.

2. Remember that it is reasonable only in the regenerate.

(320.) "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus, who, according to His abundant mercy, hath begotten us again to a lively hope." The new birth entitles to the new hope; if the soul be dead, the hope cannot be alive. And the soul may be dead, and yet put into a very handsome dress of external reformation and profession, as well as a dead body may be clad with rich clothes. A beggar's son got into the clothes of a rich man's child, may as well hope to be heir to the rich man's land, as thou, by an external reformation and profession, to be God's heir in glory.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

3. Remember that it is attained gradually.

(321.) True faith is at first nothing, but an embryo, it is minute and small; it is full of doubtings, temptations, and fears: it begins in weakness. It is like the smoking flax (Matt. xii. 20). It smokes with desires, but doth not flame with comfort; it is at first so small that it is scarce discernible. Such as, at the first dash, have a strong persuasion that Christ is theirs, who leap out of sin into assurance, their faith is false and spurious: that faith, which is come to its full stature on its birthday, is a monster. The seed that sprang up suddenly withered (Matt. xiii. 5). —Watson, 1696.

4. Remember that it is frequently not attained till late in life.

(322.) Have you never, in a summer morning, seen the sun come nimbly up only to make battle with the clouds? It is obscured when it first rises; but by ten o'clock it is seen again. By eleven o'clock it is obscured once more. Through all the forenoon it is stormy and cloudy by turns. All the afternoon there are dense vaporous clouds which shroud the sun's glory. And yet, as he draws near to the horizon the clouds lift, and with full-orbed majesty he descends into the open space, and looks back across the whole earth; and he is never so radiant as just before he sets. Having triumphed over the day, having come out victorious over the storm, he goes down in wondrous beauty.

So have I seen men and women go through sorrows and conflicts, through storms and suffering, during their mortal life, with here and there an experience of joy, till they came to their last years, when God said to them, "Stand a little while, my child, and shine;" and they stood, luminous, to teach men how real is the transformation of the soul, by love, into the likeness of God; and how beautiful was holiness as exemplified by them!

—Becher.

5. Remember that some men, eminent for holiness and usefulness, have had painful doubts as to their acceptance with God.

(323.) The characteristic mark of early Christian experience was its certainty and overflowing joy. It was transcendent in its conviction of certainty; and nowhere can we find, in the personal experiences that are recorded or hinted at in the New Testament, wavering or doubt.

My venerable father after he came to Brooklyn, having been more than half a century a preacher and leader of souls, as simple-hearted a man and as honest as ever drew breath,—a thoroughly manly man,—after he was laid aside from preaching, said to his daughter one day, "I have been attempting to ascertain the grounds of my hope; and I have tried to deal with myself just as I would with an inquiring soul that thought it had a hope, and I have spent two days, and I have thoroughly looked at everything, and I have come to the conclusion that I have a right to the hope that I am a Christian."

Suppose George Washington, in his last sickness, had whispered to his doctor, "I have been looking over my whole career to know whether I have a right to call myself a patriot, to ascertain whether I have really loved my country; and in this review of my career I have come to the conclusion, with great caution, that, on the whole, I may think that I am patriotic in my spirit," what would be thought of it?

More than that, suppose a child that had been reared in the household, revering father and mother, coming to the age of thirty or forty years, through sorrow, through sickness, through joy, through light, through darkness, friended all the way by the parental presence, should sit down and write in his or her journal, "I have been greatly disturbed lest I should be deceived in regard to my feelings toward my father and my mother; I have made it a subject of calm investigation and review; and I have been led, at last, by the Divine Spirit to the conclusion that I may believe that I do love my father and my mother." What would any one think of the solemnity with which a child came to such a simple statement as that? —Becher.

VII. HOW IT IS TO BE ATTAINED.

1. By the exercise of faith in God's promises to pardon the penitent.

(324.) First, exercise faith on forgiveness in God; and when the soul is fixed therein, it will have a ground and foundation whereon it may stand securely in making application of it to itself. Drive this principle, in the first place, unto a stable issue upon Gospel evidence, answer the objections that lie against it, and then you may proceed. In believing the soul makes a conquest upon Satan's territories. Do, then, as they do who are entering on an enemy's country,—secure the passages, fortify the strongholds as you go on, that you be not cut off in your progress. Be not as a ship at sea, which passes on, and is no more possessed or master of the water it has gone through, than of that whereunto it is not yet arrived. But so it is with a soul that fixes not on these foundation principles: he presses forwards, and the ground crumbles away under his feet, and so he wilders away all his days in uncertainties. Would men but lay this principle well in their souls, and secure it against assaults, they might proceed, though not with so much speed as some do, yet with more safety. Some pretend at once to fall into full assurance; I wish it prove not a broad presumption in the most. It is to no purpose for him to strive to fly who cannot yet go,—to labour to come to assurance in himself who never well believed forgiveness in God.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

2. By keeping grace in action.

(325.) Grace is never apparent and sensible to the soul, but while it is in action; therefore want of action must needs cause want of assurance. Habits are not felt immediately, but by the free-

ness and facility of their acts : of the very being of the soul itself, nothing is felt or perceived, but only its acts. The fire that lieth still in the flint is neither seen nor felt, but when you smite it, and force it into action, it is easily discerned. The greatest action doth force the greatest observation, whereas the dead and inactive are not remembered or taken notice of. Those that have long lain still in their graves are out of men's thoughts as well as their sight, but those that walk the streets, and bear rule among them, are noted by all : it is so with our graces. That you have a habit of love or faith, you can no otherwise know but as a consequence by reasoning ; but that you have acts, you may know by feeling. If you see a man lie still in the way, what will you do to know whether he be drunk, or in a swoon, or dead ? Will you not stir him, or speak to him, to see whether he can go ; or feel his pulse, or observe his breath, knowing that where there is life there is some kind of motion ? I earnestly beseech thee, Christian, observe and practise this excellent rule : thou now knowest not whether thou have repentance, or faith, or love, or joy ; why, be more in the acting of these, and thou wilt easily know it. Draw forth an object for godly sorrow, or faith, or love, or joy, and lay thy heart flat unto it, and take pains to provoke it into suitable action, and then see whether thou have these graces or not. As Dr. Sibbes observeth, "There is sometimes grief for sin in us when we think there is none." It wants but stirring up by some quickening word ; the like he saith of love, and it may be said of every other grace. You may go seeking for the hare or partidge many hours, and never find them while they lie close and stir not ; but when once the hare betakes himself to his legs, and the bird to her wings, then you see them presently. So long as a Christian hath his graces in lively action, so long, for the most part, he is assured of them. How can you doubt whether you love God in the act of loving, or whether you believe in the very act of believing ! If, therefore, you would be assured whether this sacred fire be kindled in your hearts, blow it up ; get it into a flame, and then you will know ; believe till you feel that you do believe, and love till you feel that you love.

The acting of the soul upon such excellent objects doth naturally bring consolation with it. The very act of loving God in Christ, doth bring inexpressible sweetness with it into the soul. The soul that is best furnished with grace, when it is not in action, is like a lute well stringed and tuned, which while it lieth still doth make no more music than a common piece of wood ; but when it is taken up and handled by a skilful lutist, the melody is most delightful. "Some degree of comfort," saith that comfortable doctor, "follows every good action, as heat accompanies fire, and as beams and influence issue from the sun ;" which is so true, that very heathens upon the discharge of a good conscience have found comfort and peace answerable : this is præmium ante præmium, a reward before the reward.

As a man, therefore, that is cold, should not stand still and say, "I am so cold that I have no mind to labour," but labour till his coldness be gone, and heat excited ; so he that wants assurance of the truth of his grace, and the comfort of assurance, must not stand still and say, "I am so doubtful and uncomfortable that I have no mind to duty," but ply his duty, and exercise his graces, till he find his doubts and discomforts to vanish.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

3. By conference with experienced Christians.

(326.) If you cannot see the sincerity of your hearts, go to your faithful, able guides, and open the case to them, and let not passion prevail against the Scripture and reason which they bring. Yea, if in your trouble you cannot by all their helps perceive the uprightness of your hearts, I must tell you, you may stay yourselves much upon their judgment of your state. Though it cannot give you full assurance, it may justly help to silence much of your self-accusations, and give you the comfort of probability. If a physician that feels not what you feel, shall yet, upon your speeches and other evidences, tell you that he is confident your disease is not mortal, nor containeth any cause of fear, you may rationally be much encouraged by his judgment, though it give you no certainty of life. As wicked men through contempt, so many godly people through melancholy, do lose much of the fruit of the office of the ministry, which lieth much in this assisting men to judge of the life or death of their souls. "Alas !" say they, "he feels not what I feel : he useth to judge charitably, and he knoweth not me so well as I know myself." But when you have told him faithfully, as you do your physician, what it is that you know by yourself, he is able to pass a far sounder judgment of your life or death than yourselves can do, for all your feeling : for he knows better what those symptoms signify, and what is used to be the issue of such a case as yours. Be not, then, so proud or wilful as to refuse the judgment of your faithful pastors, about the state of your souls, in a confidence on your own.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

VIII. REASONS FOR CHERISHING IT.

1. Holiness in the life.

(327.) Both faith and hope are of a cleansing nature (Acts xv. 9 ; 1 John iii. 3). The devil is an unclean spirit ; he fouls wheresoever he comes ; and all sin is nasty and beastly. Faith and hope, like as neat housewives when they come into a foul and sluttish house, cleanse all the rooms of the soul, and make it a fit habitation for the spirit of God. Are our hearts lifted up, then, in a comfortable expectation of the performance of God's merciful promises ? And are they, together with our lives, swept and cleansed from the wonted corruptions of our nature, and pollutions of our sin ? This is an undoubted evidence of our calling and election.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(328.) Wherever God pardons sin, He subdues it (Micah vii. 19). Then is the condemning power of sin taken away, when the commanding power of it is taken away. If a malefactor be in prison, how shall he know that his prince hath pardoned him ? If a jailer come and knock off his chains and fetters, and lets him out of prison, then he may know he is pardoned : so, how shall we know God hath pardoned us ? If the fetters of sin be broken off, and we walk at liberty in the ways of God (Ps. cxix. 45), this is a blessed sign we are pardoned.

—Watson, 1696.

2. A sense of the burdensomeness of sin.

(329.) In the drawing up of water out of a deep well, as long as the bucket is under water we feel not the weight of it, but so soon as it cometh above water it beginneth to hang heavy on the hand. When a man diveth under water he feeleth no weight of the water, though there be many tons of it over his head; whereas half a tubful of the same water, taken out of the river and set upon the same man's head, would be very burdensome unto him, and make him soon grow weary of it. In like manner, so long as a man is over head and ears in sin, he is not sensible of the weight of sin, it is not troublesome unto him; but when he beginneth once to come out of that state of sin wherein he lay and lived before, then beginneth sin to hang heavy on him, and he to feel the heavy weight of it. So, so long as sin is in the will, the proper seat of sin, a man feeleth no weight of it, but, like a fool, it is a sport and pastime unto him to do evil. And it is therefore a good sign that sin is removed out of his seat, out of his chair of state, when it becomes ponderous and burdensome to us, as the elements do when they are out of their natural place.

3. Every evidence of spiritual life, however small.

(330.) A spark of fire is but little, yet it is fire as well as the whole element of fire; and a drop of water, it is water as well as the whole ocean.

When a man is in a dark place,—put the case it be in a dungeon,—if he have a little light shining in to him from a little crevice, that little light discovers that the day is broke, that the sun is risen.

Put the case, there be but one grape on a vine, it shows that it is a vine, and that the vine is not dead. So, put the case, there be but the appearance of but a little grace in a Christian, perhaps the Spirit of God appears but in one grace in him at that time, yet that one grace shows that we are vines, and not thistles, or thorns, or other base plants, and it shows that there is life in the root.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(331.) There is the same reason of the natural life and the spiritual. Life where it is, is discerned by breathing, sense, motion.

Where there is the breath of life, there must be a life that sends it forth. If, then, the soul breathes forth holy desires, doubtless there is a life whence they proceed.

Sense is a quick descrier of life: pinch or wound a dead man, he feels nothing; but the living perceiveth the easiest touch. When thou hast heard the fearful judgments of God denounced against sinners, and laid home to the conscience, hast thou not found thy heart pierced with them? hast thou not shrunk inward, and secretly thought, "How shall I decline this dreadful damnation?" When thou hast heard the sweet mercies of God laid forth to penitent sinners, hath not thy heart silently said, "Oh, that I had my share in them!" When thou hast heard the name of Christ blasphemed, hast thou not felt a secret horror in thy bosom? All these argue a true spiritual life within thee.

Motion is the most perfect discoverer of life. He that can stir his limbs, is surely not dead. The feet of the soul are the affections. Hast thou not found in thyself a hate and detestation of that sin where-into thou hast been miscarried? Hast thou not found in thyself a true grief of heart, for thy wretched indisposition to all good things? Without a true life of grace, these things could never have been. Are not thine eyes and hands many times lifted up, in an imploration of mercy? Canst thou deny, that thou hast a true, though but weak, appetite to the means, and further degrees of grace? What can this be, but that hunger and thirst after righteousness, to which our Saviour hath pronounced blessedness?

(333.) It is not the degree of grace absolutely in itself considered, wherein sincerity doth consist, nor which we must inquire after in trial, but it is the degree in a comparative sense; as when we compare God and the creature, and consider which we desire, love, fear, &c., more; and, therefore, here it is far easier to try by the degree. You know that gold is not current except it be weight as well as pure metal. Now, if you put your gold in one end of the scale, and nothing in the other, you cannot judge whether it be weight or not; but if you put the weights against it, then you may discern it. If it be downright weight, you may discern it without either difficulty or doubt. If it be but a grain overweight, you may yet discern it; though it is possible it may be so little that the scales will scarcely turn, and then you will not discern so easily which is the heavier end. But if it want much, then you will as easily on the other side discern the defectiveness. So thus here. If God had said absolutely, "So much love you must have to me, or you cannot be saved," then it were hard to know when we reach the degree. But you must, as I said, put Christ and heaven in one end, and all things below in the other, and then you may well find out the sincerity in the degree. Every grain that Christ hath more than the creature is sincere and saving.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(334.) It may be, some weak believer may be saying, "Some of these marks I know to my experience; but others are dark to me, therefore, I doubt of all." To which we reply, if, indeed, you have one saving solid mark, and can really close with it, it may satisfy you, though you be in the dark in others. If a child cannot go, yet if it can suck; if it cannot suck, yet if it can cry; if it cannot cry, yet if it can breathe, it is a mark of life: so, there may be breathings in the soul, that are evidential of life and faith, when other things are hid. Oh, try yourselves, and look to God to search and try you! it is by His judgment you stand or fall.

—Erskine, 1680-1754.

IX. HINDRANCES TO ITS ATTAINMENT.

1. The weakness of our spiritual graces.

(335.) One common and great cause of doubting and uncertainty is the weakness and small measure of our grace. A little grace is next to none: small things are hardly discerned. He that will see a small needle, a hair, a mote, or atom, must have clear light and good eyes; but houses, and towns, and mountains are easily discerned. Most Christians content themselves with a small measure of grace, and do not follow on to spiritual strength and manhood. They believe so weakly, and love God so little, that they can scarce find whether they believe and love at all; like a man in a swoon, whose pulse and breathing is so weak and obscure that it can hardly be perceived whether they move at all, and, consequently, whether the man be alive or dead. The chief remedy for such would be to follow on their duty, till their graces be increased. Ply your work; wait upon God in the use of His prescribed means, and He will undoubtedly bless you with increase and strength. Oh! that Christians would bestow most of that time in getting grace which they bestow in anxious doubtings, whether they have any or none; and that they would lay out those serious affections in praying, and seeking to Christ for more grace, which they bestow in fruitless complaints of their supposed gracelessness! I beseech thee, Christian, take this advice as from God; and then, when thou believest strongly, and lovest fervently, thou canst not doubt whether thou do believe and love or not, any more than a man that is burning hot can doubt whether he be warm; or a man that is strong and lusty can doubt whether he be alive. Strong affections will make you feel them. Who loveth his friends, or wife, or child, or anything strongly, and doth not know it? A great measure of grace is seldom doubted of; or, if it be, you may quickly find when you seek and try.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

2. Worldly lusts.

(336.) If you cherish your sensual, fleshly lusts, and set your heart too eagerly on the world, or defend your unpeaceableness and passion, or neglect your own duty to God or man, and make no conscience of a true reformation, it is not any inquiries after signs of grace that will help you to assurance. You may complain long enough before you have ease, while such a thorn is in your foot.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

3. Distracting thoughts.

(337.) The heart is most confused, as well as dark and deceitful; it is like a house, or shop of tools, where all things are thrown together on a heap, and nothing keeps its own place. There are such multiplicity of cogitations, fancies, and passions, and such irregular thronging in of them, and such a confused reception, and operation of objects and conceptions, that it is a wonderful difficult thing for the best Christian to discern clearly the bent and actions, and so the state of his own soul. For in such a crowd of cogitations and passions, we are like men in a fair or crowd of people, where a confused noise may be heard, but you cannot well perceive what any of them say, except either some one near you that speaks much louder than all the rest, or else except you single out some one from the rest, and go close to him to confer with him of purpose.

Our intellect and passions are like the lakes of water in the common roads, where the frequent passage of horses doth so muddy it that you can see nothing in it, especially that is near the bottom; when in pure, untroubled waters you may see a small thing. In such a confusion and tumult as is usually in men's souls, for a poor weak Christian to seek for the discovery of his sincerity, is, according to the proverb to seek for a needle in a bottle of hay.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

4. Forgetfulness of the true object of faith.

(338.) Assurance is often hindered by the mind being improperly directed to faith (as if it were a kind of abstract principle), rather than to the truth, or the object of faith; to the acts of their mind, instead of the truth of God. To such we would simply say, "Look unto Jesus." A man who hears good news and believes it, knows and can tell whence his joy arises. If addressed to him, and containing what is adapted to his circumstances, it fills him with gladness. This gladness does not arise from any reflection on the exercises of his mind in believing it, but from the thing itself believed. It were well for our peace if we looked more to the thing testified, than in what manner we have believed the tidings.

—Salter, 1840.

5. A melancholy temperament.

(339.) A melancholy person can think of nothing with confidence and comfort; there is nothing but trouble, confusion, fears, and despair in his apprehension. He still seems to himself undone and hopeless. A person naturally timorous cannot choose but fear, if you show him the clearest reasons of assurance. These are like pain in sickness, which faith and reason will not cure, but should help us to strive against and bear. God will not impute our diseased misery to us as our damning sin.

It is one thing to have grace, and another thing to know that we have it; many have it, who doubt whether it be sincere. And it is an unspeakable mercy to have it, though you doubt of it. God knoweth His grace in us, and will own it, when we doubt of it or deny it. As long as this foundation of God is sure, that God knoweth who are His, and while we name Christ, we depart from iniquity, we are safe, though through fear we are uncomfortable.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

X. EVEN WHEN IT IS ATTAINED, IT IS INTERMITTENT, AND NOT ALWAYS CLEAR AND JOYFUL.

(340.) It is often day when the sun doth not shine, and though thick clouds breathed from the air, make a sad face of the sky, as if it were night, yet we cannot say, the sun is gone down. This is the condition of many men in a state of nature; in the state of salvation the sun is with them; they are children of the day, yet have they no joy of their salvation, their sun doth not shine, they have no clear day. Hence it is that assurance of salvation will not content the soul, except it may have the joy of salvation also. This was that which made David cry out, "Restore unto me the joy of Thy salvation." —Lake, 1626.

(341.) Look upon a coal covered with ashes; there is nothing appearing in the heap but only dead ashes; there is neither light, nor smoke, nor heat; and yet, when those embers are stirred to the bottom, there are found some living gleams which do contain fire, and are apt to propagate it. Many a Christian breast is like this hearth, no life of grace appearing there for the time, either to his own sense or the apprehension of others. Whilst the season of temptation lasteth, all seems cold and dead; yet still, at the worst, there is a secret coal from the altar of heaven raked up in their bosom, which, upon the gracious motions of the Almighty, doth both bewray some remainders of that Divine fire and is easily raised to a perfect flame. Let no man, therefore, deject himself or censure others for the utter extinction of that spirit, which doth but hide itself in the soul for a glorious advantage.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(342.) Discomfort not thyself too much, my son, with the present disappearance of grace, during the hour of thy temptation. It is no otherwise with thee, than with a tree in winter season, whose sap is run down to the root; wherein there is no more to show of the life of vegetation by any buds of blossoms that it might put forth, than if it were stark dead: yet, when the sun returns, and sends forth his comfortable beams in the spring, it burgeons out afresh; and bewrays that vital juice, which lay long hiddden in the earth. No otherwise, than with the hearth of some good housewife, which is, towards night, swept up; and hideth the fire, under the heap of her ashes: a stranger would think it were quite out: there is no appearance of light, or heat, or smoke; but, by that time she hath stirred it up a little, the bright gleeds show themselves, and are soon raised to a flame. Stay but till the spring, when the Sun of Righteousness shall call up thy moisture into thy branches; stay but till the morning, when the fire of grace which was raked up in the ashes shall be drawn forth and quickened; and thou shalt find cause to say of thy heart, as Jacob said of his hard lodging, "Surely the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not" (Gen. xxviii. 16). Only do thou, not neglecting the means, wait patiently upon God's leisure: stay quietly upon the bank of this Bethesda, till the angel descend and move the water.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(343.) Temptation time is a dark time. When a man cannot see his own hand, though he lift it up before his eyes, then he is in the dark indeed. Now, possibly a good man may be in such a temptation, that he shall not be able to see the lifting-up of his own hand in prayer, saying, "I go to prayer, but I cannot pray at all; and that which I do perform, it is no duty." Sometimes it is so with him, that he cannot read his own graces nor see them. Though the fish lie playing upon the water, and you may see them in a fair sunshine; yet in a storm or night ye see them not, though they be in the pond or river still. So here, though when the light of God's countenance doth shine upon the soul, he is then able to see and read his own graces; yet if it be a storm, or the night of temptation, he cannot see them. Why? Not because they are not in his heart and life as before, but because he is in the dark.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(344.) True believers have seasons of unfruitfulness, in which they bring forth no good works, devout thoughts, or holy aspirations. They are then like the trees in winter, which are indeed destitute of leaves, but are not destitute of sap and life, and hence, when spring returns, bud and blossom, and bear afresh. The ungodly, however, resemble withered trees, which at all seasons alike are without either sap, or life, or fruit, and consequently are fit for nothing but the fire —Scripps, 1629-1693.

(345.) Take heed that thou dost not mistake and think thy grace decays, when, may be, 'tis only thy temptations increase, and not thy grace decreases. If you should hear a man say, because he cannot to-day run so fast, when an hundredweight is on his back, as he could yesterday without any such a burthen, that therefore he was grown weaker, you would soon tell him where his mistake lies.

—Saller, 1840.

(346.) "What is the matter with the light, that you look so dismally dim this evening?" said the Wheelbarrow to the Lamp in the street.

"The light is the same as ever in its own nature," replied the Lamp, "but its present appearance is owing to what surrounds it in the atmosphere. When the air is free from smoke and mist, the light looks clear and bright; but when fog arises as now, the brightest Lamp will look dim, and shed but a feeble light."

"There is hardly enough to see one's way along now, truly," said the Barrow.

Inbred corruptions sometimes arise in the believer's heart like mists from the earth, which cloud his evidences, distress his soul, and cause him to walk in darkness, having no light (Isa. l. 10).

—Bowden.

XI. WHEN ONCE VOUCHSAFED, IT IS NOT TO BE LIGHTLY SURRENDERED.

(347.) Be careful to keep thy old receipts which thou hast had from God for the pardon of thy sins. There are some gaudy days, and jubilee-like festivals, when God comes forth clothed with the robes of His mercy, and holds forth the sceptre of His grace more familiarly to His children than ordinary, bearing witness to their faith, sincerity, &c. And then the firmament is clear, not a cloud to be seen to darken the Christian's comfort. Love and joy are the soul's repast and pastime, while this feast lasts. Now when God withdraws, and this cheer is taken off, Satan's work is how he may deface and wear off the remembrance of this testimony, which the soul so triumphs in for its spiritual standing, that he may not have it as an evidence when he shall bring about the suit again, and put the soul to produce his writings for his spiritual state, or renounce his claim. It behoves thee, therefore, to lay them up safely: such a testimony may serve to non-suit thy accuser many years hence. One affirmative from God's mouth for thy pardoned state, carries more weight (though of old date) than a thousand negatives from Satan's.

—Gurnall, 1677-1679.

been convinced of the truth, and then will let every sudden thought, or temptation, or difficulty seem enough to question all again, this is unfaithfulness to the truth, and the way to resist the clearest evidences, and never to have done. It is like as if you should answer your adversary in the court, when your witnesses are all dismissed, or out of the way, and all your evidences are absent, and perhaps your counsellor and advocate too. It is like the casting up of a long and intricate account, which a man hath finished by study and time; and when he hath done all, one questioneth this particular, and another that, when his accounts are absent: it is not fit for him to answer all particulars, nor question his own accounts, till he have as full opportunity and help to cast up all again.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

XII. HOW IT MAY BE STRENGTHENED.

(349.) Be much in the exercise of your hope. Repeated acts strengthen habits. Thus the little waddling child comes to go strongly by going often.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(350.) Resort to God daily, and beg a stronger hope of Him. That is the way the Apostle took to help the saints at Rome to more of this precious grace. "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost." God you see is the God of hope; and not only of the first seed and habit, but of the whole increment, and abounding of it in us also. He doth not give a saint the first grace of conversion, and then leave the improvement of it wholly to his skill and care; as sometimes a child hath a stock at first to set up, and never hath more help from his father, but by his own good husbandry advanceth his little beginnings into a great estate at last. But rather as the corn in the field, that needs the influences of heaven to flower and ripen it for harvest, as much as to quicken it in the clouds when first thrown in. And therefore be sure thou humbly acknowledgest God by a constant waiting on Him for growth.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

XIII. IT IS NOT TO BE ABUSED.

(351.) If you have assurance of your justification, do not abuse assurance.

1. It is an abusing of assurance, when we grow more remiss in duty; as the musician, having money thrown him, leaves off playing. By remissness, or intermitting the exercises of religion, we grieve the Spirit, and that is the way to have an embargo laid upon our spiritual comforts.

2. We abuse assurance, when we grow presumptuous and less fearful of sin. What, because a father gives his son an assurance of his love, and tells him he will entail his land upon him, shall the son therefore be wanton and dissolute. This were the way to lose his father's affection, and make him cut off the entail; it was an aggravation of Solomon's sin, "his heart was turned away from the Lord, after He had appeared to him twice." It is bad to sin when one wants assurance, but it is worse to sin when one hath it. Hath the Lord sealed His love with a kiss? Hath He left a pledge of heaven in your hands, and do you thus requite the Lord? Will you sin with manna in your mouth? Doth God give you the sweet clusters of assurance to feed on, and will you return Him wild grapes? It much pleaseth Satan, either to see us want assurance, or abuse it; this is to abuse assurance, when the pulse of our souls beats faster in sin, and slower in duty.

—Watson, 1696.

XIV. FOR WHAT END IT IS BESTOWED.

(352.) Assurance and comforts are desirable, but fruitfulness is absolutely necessary. If we do not diligently and faithfully mind our duty in the latitude of it, and apply not ourselves wholly to the work the Lord has set us to do, we shall be found unfruitful. And then what place, what ground will there be for comfort or assurance? What claim can we lay to the privileges we are so much taken with? The end why the Lord offers us comfort and assurance of His love, is to make us cheerful in His service, and to encourage us in His work, and engage our hearts in it thoroughly. Now, if we mind the means more than the end, we act irregularly and irrationally.

What will you think of a servant who minds his refreshments more than his work? Who takes more care and spends more time about his meals than in his labour and employment? Will you think him a profitable servant, or expect much fruit of his labour? You are too like such servants when you are eager for comforts and spiritual refreshments, but less active for God in a way of serviceableness, and more backward to do or suffer what He calls you to. This is to be more for yourselves than for Him; and while you are so disposed, He is not like to find much fruit on you.

ATHEISM.

1. ITS ABSORDITY EVINCED.

1. By the existence of the universe.

—Watson, 1696.

(354.) I appeal to any man of reason, whether anything can be more unreasonable than obstinately to impute to chance an effect which carries, in the very face of it, all the arguments and characters of a wise design and contrivance? Was ever any considerable work, in which there was required a great variety of parts, and a regular and orderly disposition of those parts, done by chance? Will chance fit means to ends, and that in ten thousand instances, and not fail in any one? How often might a man, after he had jumbled a set of letters in a bag, fling them out on the ground before they would fall into an exact poem; yea, or so much as to make a good discourse in prose? And may not a little book be as easily made by chance, as this great volume of the world? How long might a man be in sprinkling colours upon canvas with a careless hand, before they would happen to make the exact picture of a man? And is a man easier made by chance than his picture? How long might twenty thousand blind men, who should be sent out from the most remote parts of England, wander up and down before they would all meet upon Salisbury plains, and fall into rank and file in the order of an army? And yet this is much more easy to be imagined, than how the innumerable blind parts of matter should rendezvous themselves into a world. A man that sees Henry the Seventh's Chapel at Westminster, might with as good reason maintain (yea, with much better, considering the vast difference between that little structure and the huge fabric of the world), that it was never contrived or built by any man, but that the stones did by chance grow into those curious figures into which they seem to have been cut and graven; and that upon a time (as tales usually begin), the materials of that building, the stone, mortar, timber, iron, lead and glass, happily met together, and very fortunately ranged themselves into that delicate order, in which we see them now so closely compacted that it must be a very great chance that parts them again. What would the world think of a man that should advance such an opinion as this, and write a book for it? If they would do him right, they ought to look upon him as mad; but yet with a little more reason than any man can have to say that the world was made by chance.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(355.) As when a man comes into a palace, built according to the exactest rule of art, and with an unexceptionable conveniency for the inhabitants, he would acknowledge both the being and skill of the builder; so whosoever shall observe the disposition of all the parts of the world, their connection, comeliness, the variety of seasons, the swarms of different creatures, and the mutual offices they render to one another, cannot conclude less, than it was contrived by an infinite skill, effected by infinite power, and governed by infinite wisdom. None can imagine a ship to be orderly conducted without a pilot; nor the parts of the world to perform their several functions without a wise guide; considering the members of the body cannot perform theirs, without the active presence of the soul. The atheist, then, is a fool to deny that which every creature in his constitution asserts, and thereby renders himself unable to give a satisfactory account of that constant uniformity in the motions of the creatures.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(356.) We are told, that there was an innumerable company of little bodies, called atoms, from all eternity, flying and roving about in a void space, which at length hitched together and united; by which union they grew at length into this beautiful, curious, and most exact structure of the universe.

A conceit fitter for bedlam than an academy; and taken up, as it were, in direct opposition to common sense and experience. For, let any one take a vessel full of dust, and shake it from one end of the year to the other, and see whether ever it will fall into the figure of a horse, an eagle, or a fish; or let any one shake ten thousand letters together, till by some lucky shape they fall at length into an elegant poem or oration. That chance and blind accident, the usual parent of confusion and all deformity in men's actions, should yet in this out-do the greatest art and diligence in the production of such admirable, stupendous effects, is contrary to all the rules that human nature has been hitherto accustomed to judge by; and fit for none to assert but for him who, with his God, has also renounced his reason.

—South, 1633-1716.

(357.) That the universe was formed by a fortuitous concourse of atoms, I will no more believe than that the accidental jumbling of the alphabet would fall into a most ingenious treatise of philosophy.

—Swift.

(358.) We will suppose that one who had never seen a watch, or anything of that sort, hath now this little engine first offered to his view; can we doubt but he would, upon the mere sight of its figure, structure, and the very curious workmanship which we will suppose appearing in it, presently acknowledge the artificer's hand. But if he were also made to understand the purpose which it serves, and it were distinctly shown him how all things in this little fabric concur to this purpose—the exact measuring of time—he would certainly both confess and praise the great ingenuity of the first inventor. But now, if a bystander, beholding him in this admiration, would undertake to show a profounder reach and strain of wit, and should say, —Sir, you are mistaken concerning the composition of this much-admired piece, it was not designed by the hand or skill of any one, there were only an innumerable company of little atoms, or very small bodies, much too small to be perceived by your sense, that were busily frisking and flying to and fro about the place of its nativity; and by a strange chance (or a stranger fate, and the necessary laws of that motion which they were unavoidably put into, by a certain boisterous undesigning weaver), they fell together into this small bulk, so as to compose it into this shape and figure, and with this same number and order of parts which you now behold, one squadron of these busy particles (little thinking what they were about) agreeing to make up one wheel, and another some other, and so on in that proportion which you now see,—all conspiring to fall together each in its own place, as that the regular motion failed not to ensue, which we now see is observed in it,—what man is there, either so wise or so foolish (for it is hard to determine whether the excess or the defect should best qualify him to be of this faith) as to be capable of believing this piece of natural history? And if one should give this account of the production of such a trifle, would he not be thought in jest? And should he persist in repeating the statement, would he not be thought, in good earnest, mad? Let but any sober reason judge then, whether we have not unspeakably more manifest madness to contend against, in such as suppose this world, and the bodies of living creatures, to have fallen into this frame and orderly disposition of parts wherein they are, without the direction of a wise and designing cause? And if the concourse of atoms could make this world, why not (as Tully says) a porch, or a temple, or a house, or a city, which were less operose and much more easy performances?

—Living.

(359.) Should you see a fine ship, well built, handsomely rigged, and completely equipped for a voyage, could you believe that she built herself? or that she was built by chance? or that she sprung like a bubble out of the sea? Would you not feel as certain that she was the work of some builder, as if you had stood by and seen him shape every timber, and drive every bolt? And can you, then, be made to believe that this great ship, the world, built itself? or that it was built by chance? or that it sprung out of nothing without any cause?

2. By the constitution of the human body.

(360.) When we examine a watch, or any other piece of machinery, we instantly perceive marks of design. The arrangement of its several parts, and the adaptation of its movements to one result, show it to be a contrivance; nor do we ever imagine the faculty of contriving to be in the watch itself, but in a separate agent. If we turn from art to nature, we behold a vast magazine of contrivances; we see innumerable objects replete with the most exquisite design. The human eye, for example, is formed with admirable skill for the purpose of sight, the ear for the function of hearing. As in the productions of art we never think of ascribing the power of contrivance to the machine itself, so we are certain the skill displayed in the human structure is not a property of man, since he is very imperfectly acquainted with his own formation. If there be an inseparable relation betwixt the ideas of a contrivance and contriver—and it is evident, in regard to the human structure, the designing agent is not man himself—there must undeniably be some separate invisible being who is his former. This great being we mean to indicate by the appellation of Deity.

—Robert Hall, 1764–1831.

3. By the character of God's works.

(361.) A connoisseur in works of art, so soon as the dust of years has been wiped from an old picture, can name the master who painted the glowing canvas. So also, though time has left no record of their history, and no date stands carved on the crumbling ruins, an antiquarian can tell from its form when that arch was sprung; from their capitals, by what hands, long mouldering in the dust, these grand, impressive, silent pillars, were reared on their massive pedestals. The works of all great men, and those of all great ages, are marked by properties peculiar to themselves. And features entirely their own are eminently characteristic of all the works of God; so characteristic of these that the untutored Arab when challenged to prove in God the existence of a being whom he had never touched, nor heard, nor seen, regarded the scoffer with amazement; nor deigned to return any answer to his gibes, but one borrowed from the scenes of his native desert: "Just as I know," he replied, in terms worth a volume of divinity, "Just as I know," pointing to a footprint on the sand, "whether it was a man or a camel that passed my tent."

So distinguished by a Divine wisdom, power, and goodness, are God's works of creation and providence, that all nature, by the gentle voices of her skies and streams, of her fields and forests, as well as by the roar of breakers, the crash of thunder, the rumbling earthquake, the fiery volcano, and the destroying hurricane, echoes the closing sentence of this angel hymn, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God Almighty, the whole earth is full of His glory!"

—Guthrie.

4. By the preservation and government of the universe.

(362.) The wise government of all things evinces there is a God. God is the great superintendent of the world; He holds the golden reins of government in His hand, guiding all things most regularly and harmoniously to their proper end. Who that eyes providence, but must be forced to acknowledge there is a God? Providence is the queen and government of the world; it is the hand that turns the wheel of the whole creation; providence sets the sun its race, the sea its bounds. If God should not guide the world, things would run into disorder and confusion. When one looks on a clock, and sees the motion of the wheels, the striking of the hammer, the hanging of the plummets, he would say there was some artificer did make it and put it into that order: so, when we see the excellent order and harmony in the universe, the sun, that great luminary, dispensing its light and heat to the world, without which, the world were but a grave or a prison; the rivers sending forth their silver streams to refresh the bodies of men, and prevent a drought; and every creature acting within its sphere, and keeping its due bounds; we must needs acknowledge there is a God, who wisely orders and governs all these things. Who could set this great army of the creatures in their several ranks and squadrons, and keep them in their constant march, but He, whose name is THE LORD OF HOSTS? And as God doth wisely dispose all things in the whole regiment of the creatures, so, by His power, He doth support them. Did God suspend and withdraw His influence never so little, the wheels of the creation would unpin, and the axle-tree break asunder.

—Watson, 1696.

(363.) Who ever saw the various scenes of a theatre move by hazard in those just spaces of time, as to represent palaces, or woods, rocks and seas, as the subject of the actors required? And can the lower world four times in the circle of the year change appearance, and alter the seasons so conveniently to the use of nature, and no powerful mind direct that great work?

—Bates, 1625–1699.

(364.) Should you see a vessel go every year, for many years successively, to a distant port, and return at a set time, performing all her voyages with perfect regularity, and never going a cable's length out of her course, nor be a day out of her time, could any man persuade you to believe that she had no commander, pilot, or helmsman on board? That she went, and came back of her own accord, and had nothing to steer her but the wind? Would you have any more doubt that she was under the command of some skilful navigator, than if you were on board and saw him? Look then, once more, at this great ship, the world; see how regularly she makes her annual voyage round the sun without ever getting out of her course, or being a day or an hour out of her time. Should she gain or lose a single day, in making this voyage, what would all your tables or nautical almanacks be good for? Now, ask yourselves, would she go and come with such perfect regularity and exactness of her own accord, or with no one to regulate her course? Can you any more doubt that she is under the direction of some wise and skilful commander, than if you saw Him regulating all her motions?

some morning to find that in the night there has been a fall of blue snow? How is it that this vast earth has swept through space, with inconceivable velocity, for so many thousands of years without once swerving from its course, or increasing or diminishing its distance from the sun? Is it by accident that the seasons succeed each other with unvarying regularity, so that we never have two summers or two winters together; or, to come to myself, how is it that my heart throbs, and my pulses beat, year after year; that food nourishes, and sleep refreshes me? Let the scoffer, I repeat, explain to us how it comes to pass that "all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation," and that all the events of nature occur with such undeviating regularity, if behind all the forces of nature there is no God to inspire, guide, and control them.

Does it make any difference to the force of this argument, that no man has seen God at any time? Because God is hidden from us, shall we therefore refuse to believe that it is by Him that all the events of nature are controlled? Suppose that from some elevated position I could during the past week have surveyed the six Prussian armies marching on Paris, cavalry, infantry, artillery, baggage waggons, ambulances, all converging to one spot, would it have been reasonable or unreasonable, scientific or unscientific, to believe that they were all obeying the orders of one commander-in-chief? Would sound reason have demanded that I should refuse to believe this, until I had actually sat in General Moltke's tent, and heard him giving his directions, and looked over his shoulder as he penned his orders? But if the orderly march of an army without some master-mind to direct it is inconceivable, what shall we say of the harmonious progress, age after age, of the mighty forces of the universe? Is there not behind them One who directs and controls all their movements?

—R. A. Bertram.

II. THE FOLLY OF ITS APPEAL TO THE SENSES.

(366.) It is a universal truth in regard to science, that it lies beyond the sphere of the senses. The presiding and central principle of astronomy, and to a great extent, of mechanics, is gravitation. We see and feel its effects; we feel the impact of a falling body; we see the change in the places of the planets; but who has seen gravitation itself? We see the spark produced by the electric power as it passes from the machine, its flash as it bursts from the cloud, the combined mass of neutral salt which the same power forms in uniting the acid and the alkali; but none of these things known to the senses is electricity itself. This who has seen or can see? The man who thinks he has seen gravitation or galvanism, as much mistakes their nature as he mistakes the nature of spirit who talks of seeing one. God is denied because not known to the senses. What is known to them? Effects only. And these are not our learning; they are our ignorance, the catechism we address to the sciences; which answer only by advancing above the region of sense.

In illustration of these general ideas, I know not that I can adduce anything more striking, although I do not by any means consider it as the weightiest example that could be brought forward, than the great and important discoveries of Mr. Faraday in regard to electricity. You are aware that those discoveries appear to have ascertained that electricity or galvanism (call it by which name you will), or the principle of voltaic galvanism, is the grand combining agent throughout the matter of the universe. You are aware that, in reference to the extent of its presence in the creation, Mr. Faraday appears to have ascertained that a single grain of water is held together by as much of this principle as would form a powerful flash of lightning, or equal to 800,000 charges of his powerful Leyden battery. And you are aware that, with all this, the change which Mr. Faraday has introduced into the definition of electricity is one which I am just going to describe; whereas formerly it was spoken of as a fluid, or as two fluids, the definition which Mr. Faraday has reason to substitute is, that it is an axis of power, having equal and opposite forces. In other words, that it is known to us solely as a power whose presence is indicated by its effects, the laws of whose working constitute for us its definition; but that as an object of sense in itself it is utterly unknown to us.

—A. J. Scott, 1866.

III. THE VASTNESS OF ITS ASSUMPTIONS.

(367.) An atheist is one of the most daring beings in the creation, a contemner of God, who explodes His laws by denying His existence. If you were so unacquainted with mankind that this character might be announced to you as a rare or singular phenomenon, your conjectures, till you saw and heard the man, at the nature and the extent of the discipline through which he must have advanced, would be led toward something extraordinary. And you might think that the term of that discipline must have been very long; since a quick train of impressions, a short series of mental gradations, within the little space of a few months and years, would not seem enough to have matured such an awful heroism. Surely the creature that thus lifts his voice, and defies all invisible power within the possibilities of infinity, challenging whatever unknown being may hear him, was not as yesterday a little child, that would tremble and cry at the approach of a diminutive reptile. But indeed it is heroism no longer, if he knows there is no God. The wonder then turns on the great process by which a man could grow to the immense intelligence that can know that there is no God. What ages and what lights are requisite for this attainment! This intelligence involves the very attributes of the Divinity, while a God is denied. For unless this man is omnipresent, unless he is at this moment in every place in the universe, he cannot know but there may be in some place manifestations of a Deity by which even he would be overpowered. If he does not know absolutely every agent in the universe, the one that he does not know may be God. If he is not in absolute possession of all the propositions that constitute universal truth, the one which he wants may be, that there is a God. If he does not know everything that has been done in the immeasurable ages that are past, some things may have been done by a God. Thus, unless he knows all things, that is, precludes another Deity by being one himself, he cannot know that the Being whose existence he rejects does not exist. And yet a man of ordinary age and intelligence may present himself to you with the avowal of being thus distinguished from the crowd!

—Foster, 1770-1843.

IV. ITS POWERLESSNESS.

(368.) Our belief or disbelief of a thing does not alter the nature of the thing. We cannot fancy things into being, or make them vanish into nothing, by the stubborn confidence of our imaginations. Things are as sullen as we are, and will be what they are whatever we think of them. And if there be a God, a man cannot by an obstinate disbelief of Him make Him cease to be, any more than a man can put out the sun by winking.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

V. IS USUALLY IMMORAL IN ITS ORIGIN.

(369.) Men are atheistical because they are first vicious, and question the truth of Christianity because they hate the practice.

—South, 1633-1716.

VI. DEGRADES MAN.

(370.) They that deny a God destroy a man's nobility; for certainly man is of kin to the beasts by his body; and if he be not of kin to God by his spirit, he is a base and ignoble creature. It destroys, likewise, magnanimity and the raising human nature.

—Bacon, 1560-1626.

VII. IS MORALLY AND SOCIALLY DANGEROUS.

(371.) As the advantage of the armed over the unarmed is not seen till the moment of attack, so in that tranquil state of society in which law and order maintain their ascendancy, it is not perceived, perhaps not even suspected, to what an alarming degree the principles of modern infidelity leave us naked and defenceless. But let the state be convulsed, let the mounds of regular authority be once overflowed, and the still small voice of law drowned in the tempest of popular fury (events which recent experience shows to be possible), it will then be seen that atheism is a school of ferocity; and that having taught its disciples to consider mankind as little better than a nest of insects, they will be prepared in the fierce conflicts of party to trample upon them without pity, and extinguish them without remorse.

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

VIII. IS A TRANSIENT EXPERIENCE IN AN HONEST MIND.

(372.) I had rather believe all the fables in the legend, and the Talmud, and the Alcoran, than that this universal frame is without a mind; and therefore God never wrought miracles to convince atheism, because His ordinary works convince it. It is true that a little philosophy inclineth man's mind to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion: for while the mind of man looketh upon second causes scattered, it may sometimes rest in them, and go no farther; but when it beholdeth the chain of them confederate, and linked together, it must needs fly to providence and Deity.

—Bacon, 1560-1626.

IX. IS RENOUNCED BY ATHEISTS OF ALL KINDS IN THE TIME OF AFFLICTION.

(373.) The Persian messenger in his narrative to the king, of the overthrow of his army by the Grecians, related that those gallants, who before the fight, in the midst of their corps and bravery, denied God and providence, as secure of victory; yet afterwards, when furiously pursued by their enemies, they came to the river Strymon, that was frozen and began to thaw, then upon their knees they mournfully implored the favour of God, that the ice might hold and give them safe passage over from the pursuers. Nature in extremities has irresistible workings, and the inbred notions of the Deity, though long suppressed by imperious lusts, will then rise up in men's souls. Tullus Hostilius is another example, who disdained to express submission to God by acts of worship as a thing unbecoming his royal state; but when his stubborn, fierce mind was broken in his diseased body, he used all the servile rites of superstition, and commanded the people to join with him, thinking by his flattering devotions to appease the incensed Deity. Bion, the philosopher, was a declared atheist, till struck with a mortal disease, and then, as a false witness on the rack, confessed the truth, and addressed himself by prayers and vows to God for his recovery. Egregious folly, as the historian observes, to think that God would be bribed with his gifts, and was or was not according to his fancy! And thus it happens to many like him. As a lamp near expiring shines more clearly, so conscience, that burned dimly for a time, gives a dying blaze, and discovers Him who is alone able to save or to destroy. But how just were it to deal with them as Herofilus with Diodorus Cronus, a wrangler that vexed the philosophers, by urging a captious argument against the possibility of motion. For thus he argued: a stone, or whatever else, in moving itself, is either where it is, or where it is not; if where it is, it moves not; if where it is not, then it will be in any place, but where it is. While this disputing humour continued, one day he fell and displaced his shoulder, and sends in haste for Herofilus, of excellent skill in surgery. But he, desirous first to cure his brain, and then his shoulder, told him that his art was needless in that case: for, according to your own opinion, this bone in the dislocation either was where it was, or where it was not, and to assert either makes the displacing of it equally impossible. Therefore it was in vain to reduce it to the place from whence it was never parted. And thus he kept him roaring out with pain and rage till he declared himself convinced of the vanity of his irrefutable argument. Now, if, according to the impiety of atheists, there is no God, why do they invoke Him in their adversities? If there be, why do they deny Him in their prosperity?

—Bates, 1625-1699.

ATONEMENT.

I. DEFINED.

(374.) Vicarious sufferings and obedience are penal inflictions, and acts of obedience to law which are rendered in our place or stead (vice), as well as in our behalf by our substitute. An alien goes to the army in the place of a drafted subject. He is the substitute of the man in whose place he goes. His labours, his dangers, his wounds, and his death, are vicarious.

—Hodge.

II. NECESSITY OF A MEDIATOR.

—Charnock, 1620-1680.

(376.) The sense of mankind, with regard to the necessity of a mediator, may be illustrated by the following similitude:—Let us suppose a division of the army of one of the wisest and best of kings, through the evil counsel of a foreign enemy, to have been disaffected to his government; and that, without any provocation on his part, they traitorously conspired against his crown and life. The attempt failed; and the offenders were seized, disarmed, tried by the laws of their country, and condemned to die. A respite, however, was granted them during his majesty's pleasure. At this solemn period, while every part of the army and of the empire was expecting the fatal order for execution, the king was employed in meditating mercy. But how could mercy be shown? "To make light of a conspiracy," said he to his friends, "would loosen the bands of good government: other divisions of the army might be tempted to follow their example; and the nation at large be in danger of imputing it to tameness, fear, or some unworthy motive."

Every one felt in this case the necessity of a mediator, and agreed as to the general line of conduct for him to pursue. "He must not attempt," said they, "to compromise the difference by dividing the blame; that would make things worse. He must justify the king, and condemn the outrage committed against him; he must offer, if possible, some honourable expedient, by means of which the bestowment of pardon shall not relax, but strengthen just authority; he must convince the conspirators of their crime, and introduce them in the character of supplicants; and mercy must be shown them out of respect to him, or for his sake."

But who could be found to mediate in such a cause? This was an important question. A work of this kind, it was allowed on all hands, required singular qualifications. "He must be perfectly clear of any participation in the offence," said one, "or inclination to favour it; for to pardon conspirators at the intercession of one who is friendly to their cause would be not only making light of the crime, but giving a sanction to it."

"He must," said another, "be one who, on account of his character and services, stands high in the esteem of the king and of the public; for to mediate in such a case is to become, in a sort, responsible for the issue. A mediator, in effect, pledges his honour that no evil will result to the state from the granting of his request. But if a mean opinion be entertained of him, no trust can be placed in him, and, consequently, no good impression would be made by his mediation on the public mind."

"I conceive it is necessary," said a third, "that the weight of the mediation should bear a proportion to the magnitude of the crime, and to the value of the favour requested; and that for this end it is proper he should be a person of great dignity. For his majesty to pardon a company of conspirators at the intercession of one of their former comrades, or of any other obscure character, even though he might be a worthy man, would convey a very diminutive idea of the evil of the offence."

A fourth remarked, that, "He must possess a tender compassion towards the unhappy offenders, or he would not cordially interest himself on their behalf."

Finally. It was suggested by a fifth, "That, for the greater fitness of the proceeding, it would be proper that some relation or connection should subsist between the parties. We feel the propriety," said he, "of forgiving an offence at the intercession of a father or a brother; or, if it be committed by a soldier, of his commanding officer. Without some kind of previous relation or connection, a mediation would have the appearance of an arbitrary and formal process, and prove but little interesting to the hearts of the community."

Such were the reasonings of the king's friends; but where to find the character in whom these qualifications were united, and what particular expedient could be devised, by means of which, instead of relaxing, pardon should strengthen just authority, were subjects too difficult for them to resolve.

Meanwhile, the king and his son, whom he greatly loved, and whom he had appointed generalissimo of all his forces, had retired from the company, and were conversing about the matter which attracted the general attention.

"My son," said the benevolent sovereign, "what can be done in behalf of these unhappy men? To order them for execution violates every feeling of my heart; yet to pardon them is dangerous. The army, and even the empire, would be under a strong temptation to think lightly of rebellion. If mercy be exercised, it must be through a mediator; and who is qualified to mediate in such a cause? And what expedient can be devised by means of which pardon shall not relax, but strengthen just authority? Speak, my son, and say what measures can be pursued."

"My father," said the prince, "I feel the insult offered to your person and government, and the injury thereby aimed at the empire at large. They have transgressed without cause, and deserve to die without mercy. Yet I also feel for them. I have the heart of a soldier. I cannot endure to witness their execution. What shall I say? On me be this wrong! Let me suffer in their stead. Inflict on me as much as is necessary to impress the army and the nation with a just sense of the evil, and of the importance of good order and faithful allegiance. Let it be in their presence, and in the presence of all assembled. When this is done, let them be permitted to implore and receive your majesty's pardon in my name. If any man refuse so to implore, and so to receive it, let him die the death!"

"My son!" replied the king, "you have expressed my heart! The same things have occupied my mind; but it was my desire that you should be voluntary in the undertaking. It shall be as you have said. I shall be satisfied; justice itself will be satisfied; and I pledge my honour that you also shall be satisfied in seeing the happy effects of your disinterested conduct. Propriety requires that I stand aloof in the day of your affliction; but I will not leave you utterly, nor suffer the beloved of my soul to remain in that condition. A temporary affliction on your part will be more than equivalent to death on theirs. The dignity of your person and character will render the suffering of an hour of greater account, as to the impression of the public mind, than if all the rebellious had been executed; and by how much I am known to have loved you, by so much will my compassion to them, and my displeasure against their wicked conduct, be made manifest. Go, my son, assume the likeness of a criminal, and suffer in their place!"

The gracious design being communicated at court, all were struck with it. Those who had reasoned on the qualifications of a mediator saw that in the prince all were united, and were filled with admiration; but that he should be willing to suffer in the place of rebels was beyond all that could be asked or thought. Yet, seeing he himself had generously proposed it, would survive his sufferings, and reap the reward of them, they cordially acquiesced. The only difficulty that was started was among the judges of the realm. They, at first, questioned whether the proceeding were admissible. "The law," said they, "makes provision for the transfer of debts, but not of crimes. Its language is, 'The soul that sinneth shall die.'" But when they came to view things on a more enlarged scale, considering it as an expedient on an extraordinary occasion, and perceived that the spirit of the law would be preserved, and all the ends of good government answered, they were satisfied. "It is not a measure," said they, "for which the law provides; yet it is not contrary to the law, but above it."

The day appointed arrived. The prince appeared, and suffered as a criminal. The hearts of the king's friends bled at every stroke, and burned with indignation against the conduct which rendered it necessary. His enemies, however, even some of those to whom he suffered, continuing to be disaffected, added to the affliction by deriding and insulting him all the time. At a proper period, he was rescued from their outrage. Returning to the palace, amidst the tears and shouts of the loyal spectators, the suffering hero was embraced by his royal father; who, in addition to the natural affection which he bore to him as a son, loved him for his singular interposition at such a crisis: "Sit thou," said he, "at my right hand! Though the threatenings of the law be not literally accomplished, yet the spirit of them is preserved. The honour of good government is secured, and the end of punishment more effectually answered than if all the rebels had been sacrificed. Ask of me what I shall give thee! No favour can be too great to be bestowed, even upon the unworthiest, nor any crime too aggravated to be forgiven, in thy name. I will grant thee according to thine own heart! Ask of me, my son, what shall I give thee?"

He asked for the offenders to be introduced as supplicants at the feet of his father, for the forgiveness of their crimes, and for the direction of affairs till order and happiness should be perfectly restored.

A proclamation addressed to the conspirators was now issued, stating what had been their conduct, what the conduct of the king, and what of the prince. Messengers also were appointed to carry it, with orders to read it publicly, and to expostulate with them individually, beseeching them to be reconciled to their offended sovereign, and to assure them that, if they rejected this, there remained no more hope of mercy.

A spectator would suppose that in mercy so freely offered, and so honourably communicated, every one would have acquiesced; and if reason had governed the offenders, it had been so; but many among them continued under the influence of disaffection, and disaffection gives a false colouring to everything. The time of the respite having proved longer than was at first expected, some had begun to amuse themselves with idle speculations, flattering themselves that their fault was a mere trifle, and that it certainly would be passed over. Indeed, the greater part of them had turned their attention to other things, concluding that the king was not in good earnest.

When the proclamation was read, many paid no manner of attention to it; some insinuated that the messengers were interested men, and that there might be no truth in what they said; and some even abused them as impostors. So, having delivered their message, they withdrew; and the rebels, finding themselves alone, such of them as paid any attention to the subject expressed their mind as follows:—

"My heart," says one, "rises against every part of this proceeding. Why all this ado about a few words spoken one to another? Can such a message as this have proceeded from the king? What have we done so much against him that so much should be made of it? No petition of ours, it seems, would avail anything; and nothing that we could say or do could be regarded, unless presented in the name of a third person. Surely if we presented a petition in our own names, in which we beg pardon, and promise not to repeat the offence, this might suffice. Even this is more than I can find in my heart to comply with; but everything beyond it is unreasonable."

able; and who can believe that the king can desire it?"

"If a third person," says another, "must be concerned in the affair, what occasion is there for one so high in rank and dignity? To stand in need of such a mediator must stamp our characters with everlasting infamy. It is very unreasonable: who can believe it? If the king be just and good, as they say he is, how can he wish thus publicly to expose us?"

"I observe," says a third, "that the mediator is wholly on the king's side; and one whom, though he affects to pity us, we have, from the outset, considered as no less our enemy than the king himself. If, indeed, he could compromise matters, and would allow that we had our provocations, and would promise us redress, and an easier yoke in future, I should feel inclined to hearken; but if he have no concessions to offer, I can never be reconciled."

"I believe," says a fourth, "that the king knows very well that we have not had justice done us, and therefore this mediation business is introduced to make us amends for the injury. It is an affair settled somehow betwixt him and his son. They call it grace, and I am not much concerned what they call it, so that my life is spared; but this I say, if he had not made this or some kind of provision, I should have thought him a tyrant."

"You are all wrong," says a fifth: "I comprehend the design, and am well pleased with it. I hate the government as much as any of you; but I love the mediator; for I understand it is his intention to deliver me from its tyranny. He has paid the debt, the king is satisfied, and I am free. I will sue out for my right, and demand my liberty!"

In addition to this, one of the company observed, he did not see what the greater part of them had to do with the proclamation, unless it were to give it a hearing, which they had done already. "For," said he, "pardon is promised only to them who are willing to submit, and it is well known that many of us are unwilling; nor can we alter our minds on this subject."

After a while, however, some of them were brought to relent. They thought upon the subject-matter of the proclamation, were convinced of the justice of its statements, reflected upon their evil conduct, and were sincerely sorry on account of it. And now the mediation of the prince appeared in a very different light. They cordially said amen to every part of the proceeding. The very things which gave such offence, while their hearts were disaffected, now appeared to them fit, and right, and glorious. "It is fit," said they, "that the king should be honoured, and that we should be humbled; for we have transgressed without cause. It is right that no regard should be paid to any petition of ours, for its own sake; for we have done deeds worthy of death. It is glorious that we should be saved at the intercession of so honourable a personage. The dignity of his character, together with his surprising condescension and goodness, impress us more than anything else, and fill our hearts with penitence, confidence, and love. That which in the proclamation is called grace is grace; for we are utterly unworthy of it; and if we had all suffered according to our sentence, the king and his throne had been guiltless. We embrace the mediation of the prince, not as a reparation for an injury, but as a singular instance of mercy. And far be it from us that we should consider it as designed to deliver us from our original and just allegiance to his majesty's government! No, rather, it is intended to restore us to it. We love our intercessor, and will implore forgiveness in his name; but we also love our sovereign, and long to prostrate ourselves at his feet. We rejoice in the satisfaction which the prince has made, and all our hopes of mercy are founded upon it; but we have no notion of being freed by it previously to our acquiescence in it. Nor do we desire any other kind of freedom than that which, while it remits the just sentence of the law, restores us to his majesty's government. Oh, that we were once clear of this hateful and horrid conspiracy, and might be permitted to serve him with affection and fidelity all the days of our life! We cannot suspect the sincerity of the invitation, or acquit our companions on the score of unwillingness. Why should we? We do not on this account acquit ourselves. On the contrary, it is the remembrance of our unwillingness that now cuts us to the heart. We well remember to what it was owing that we could not be satisfied with the just government of the king, and afterwards could not comply with the invitations of mercy: it was because we were under the dominion of a disaffected spirit—a spirit which, wicked as it is in itself, it would be more wicked to justify. Our counsel is, therefore, the same as that of his majesty's messengers, with whom we now take our stand. Let us lay aside this cavilling humour, repent, and sue for mercy in the way prescribed, ere mercy be hid from our eyes!"

The reader, in applying this supposed case to the mediation of Christ, will do me the justice to remember that I do not pretend to have perfectly represented it. Probably there is no similitude fully adequate to the purpose. The distinction between the Father and the Son is not the same as that which subsists between a father and a son among men; the latter are two separate beings; but to assert this of the former would be inconsistent with the Divine unity. Nor can anything be found analogous to the doctrine of Divine influence, by which the redemption of Christ is carried into effect. And with respect to the innocent voluntarily suffering for the guilty, in a few extraordinary instances this principle may be adopted; but the management and the application of it generally require more wisdom and more power than mortals possess. We may, by the help of a machine, collect a few sparks of the electrical fluid, and produce an effect somewhat resembling that of lightning; but we cannot cause it to blaze like the Almighty, nor thunder with a voice like Him.

III. ITS SUFFICIENCY.

(377.) When the Lord Jesus Christ offered up Himself a sacrifice unto God the Father, and had our sins laid upon Him, He did give more perfect satisfaction unto Divine justice for our sins than if you, and I, and all of us had been damned in hell unto all eternity. For a creditor is more satisfied if his debt be paid him all down at once, than if it be paid by the week: a poor man that cannot pay all down, will pay a groat a week, or sixpence a week; but it is more satisfaction to the creditor to have all paid at once. Should we have been all damned, we should have been but paying the debt a little, and a little, and a little; but when Christ paid it, He paid it all down to God the Father. Had we gone to hell and been damned for ever, we had always been satisfying of God; aye, but God had never been satisfied: but now when Christ makes satisfaction, God is satisfied. The creditor, if he be a merciful and a good man, is more truly satisfied where the debtor is spared : he does not desire that the debtor should be cast into prison, and there lie and rot ; but he is better satisfied with the sparing of the debtor ; let me have but my money, and so the debtor be spared, I am willing, nay, I desire it, says the good creditor. Now, if all we had been cast into everlasting burnings, indeed, the debt should have been a-paying, but there the debtor had been lost : but now when Christ comes and makes satisfaction unto Divine justice, ah ! poor man is redeemed ; here is the debtor spared. And, therefore, the Lord He is infinitely more satisfied by the satisfaction that Christ made upon the cross for our sins, than if we had gone to hell and been damned to all eternity. Oh, what a glorious and blessed satisfaction did this our High Priest make unto God the Father !

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(378.) When the sins of believers were laid on Him, then He did make full satisfaction unto God the Father and Divine justice for all our sins. This is a bottom of much comfort. For if the Lord Jesus Christ, our Surety, had not satisfied to the utmost farthing our great Creditor, God the Father, for all our debts, God the Father might come upon us, the debtors. But our Surety, the Lord Christ, hath given full satisfaction unto God the Father, that no more demands can be made upon us. And, indeed, else how could our Surety ever have come out of prison : He was under arrest, He was in the jail, in the grave ; the Father, the great Creditor let Him out ; and did not only let Him out, but the Lord Jesus Christ, He goes into heaven, and sits down there at the right hand of the Father ; surely, if the Creditor had not been satisfied, the Surety should never have been released out of prison.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(379.) If the Lord Jesus Christ hath satisfied Divine justice as our great High Priest, then I may come with boldness unto the throne of grace. A debtor, so long as his debt is unpaid, he dare not come by the prison door ; he is afraid of every sergeant, he is afraid of his friends that they should be sergeants : but when his debt is paid, then he dare go up and down with boldness. And so the poor soul, when he knows that his debt is paid, and Christ hath satisfied, then he may go with boldness unto the throne of grace.

But you will say, "I cannot have the comfort of this, because I cannot say that Christ hath satisfied for me : how shall I know that Jesus Christ is my High Priest, so as to have satisfied for me ? Ah, if I did but know that the Lord Jesus Christ were my High Priest in this particular, so as to have satisfied for me, then should I have comfort indeed : how shall I discover that ? I am afraid He hath not satisfied for me !"

And why not for thee ? I shall tell you what I have heard concerning a young man that lay upon his death-bed, and went to heaven : while he was lying upon his death-bed, he comforted himself in this : That the Lord Jesus died for sinners. "Oh ! blessed be the Lord !" says he, "Jesus Christ hath died for me !" Satan came in with this temptation to him : "Aye, but, young man, why for thee ? Christ died for sinners, but why for thee ? how canst thou make that appear, that Christ died for thee ?" "Nay, Satan," says he,

"and why not for me ? Ah ! the Lord Jesus, He died for sinners, and therefore, Satan, why not for me ?" So he held his comfort, and went up to heaven triumphing.

So say I to thee, poor drooping soul that labours under temptation ; why not for thee ? and say so unto Satan, why not for me ?

(380.) But you will say then, if the Lord Christ made this full satisfaction unto God the Father, how is it that believers, many of them have their consciences so perplexed in regard of sin, as if there were no satisfaction at all made ? The reason is, because that men do not study this truth, but are ignorant of it. As, suppose that a man do owe three or four hundred pounds to a shopkeeper for wares that he hath taken up there : a friend comes, pays the debt, and crosses the book : but the debtor when he comes and looks upon the book is able to read all the particulars ; and not being acquainted with the nature of crossing the book, he is able to read all the particulars, and he charges it still upon himself, because he does not understand the nature of this crossing the book, and he is as much troubled how he shall pay the debt, as if it were not paid at all. So now it is here : the Lord Jesus Christ hath come and crossed our book with His own blood ; the sins are to be read in your own consciences, but we, being not acquainted with the nature of Christ's satisfaction, we charge ourselves, as if no sin at all were satisfied for us.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(381.) The extent of the atonement is frequently represented, as if a calculation had been made, how much suffering was necessary for the Surety to endure, in order exactly to expiate the aggregate number of all the sins of all the elect ; that so much He suffered precisely, and no more ; and that when this requisition was completely answered, He said, "It is finished, bowed His head, and gave up the ghost" (John xix. 30). But this nicety of computation does not seem analogous to that unbounded magnificence and grandeur which overwhelm the attentive mind in the contemplation of the Divine conduct in the natural world. When God waters the earth, He waters it abundantly (Psal. lxxv. 10) ; He does not restrain the rain to cultivated or improvable spots, but with a profusion of bounty worthy of Himself His clouds pour down water with equal abundance upon the barren mountain, the lonely desert, and the pathless ocean. Why may we not say with the Scriptures, that Christ died to declare the righteousness of God (Rom. iii. 25, 26), to manifest that He is just in justifying the ungodly who believe in Jesus ? And for anything we know to the contrary, the very same display of the evil and demerit of sin, by the Redeemer's agonies and death, might have been equally necessary, though the number of the elect were much smaller than it will appear to be when they shall all meet before the throne of glory. If God had formed this earth for the residence of one man only ; had it been His pleasure to afford him the same kind and degree of light which we enjoy, the same glorious sun, which is now sufficient to enlighten and comfort the millions of mankind, would have been necessary for the accommodation of that one person. So, perhaps, had it been His pleasure to save but one sinner, in a way that should give the highest possible discovery of His justice and of His mercy, this could have been done by no other method than that which He has chosen for the salvation of the innumerable multitudes who will in the great day unite in the song of praise to the Lamb who loved them, and washed them from their sins in His own blood.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

IV. FROM WHAT IT HAS REDEEMED US.

(382.) Redemption being deliverance by means of the substitution of a ransom, it follows that, although the ransom can only be paid to God, and to Him only as the Moral Governor of the universe, we may still be said to be redeemed from all that we are delivered from by means of the ransom paid in the sacrifice of Christ. Thus we are said to be redeemed "from our vain conversation" (1 Pet. i. 18), "from death" (Hosea xii. 14), "from the devil" (Col. ii. 15; Heb. ii. 14), "from all iniquity" (Titus ii. 14), and "from the curse of the law" (Gal. iii. 13; iv. 5), while it is, of course, not meant that the ransom is paid to the devil, or to sin, or to death, or to the law. It is simply absurd to claim that these different representations are inconsistent. A captive is redeemed by a price paid only to him that holds him in bondage, but by the same act may be redeemed from labour, from disease, from death, from the persecution of his fellow-captives, and from a slavish disposition.
—Lodge.

V. A CAUTION CONCERNING A FAMILIAR COMPARISON.

(383.) Many important mistakes have arisen from considering the interposition of Christ under the notion of paying a debt. The blood of Christ is indeed the price of our redemption, or that for the sake of which we are delivered from the curse of the law; but this metaphorical language, as well as that of head and members, may be carried too far, and may lead us into many errors. In cases of debt and credit among men, where a surety undertakes to represent the debtor, from the moment his undertaking is accepted the debtor is free, and may claim his liberty, not as a matter of favour, at least on the part of the creditor, but of strict justice. Or should the undertaking be unknown to him for a time, yet as soon as he knows it he may demand his discharge, and, it may be, think himself hardly treated by being kept in bondage so long after his debt had been actually paid. But who in their sober senses will imagine this to be analogous to the redemption of sinners by Jesus Christ? Sin is a debt only in a metaphorical sense; properly speaking it is a crime, and satisfaction for it requires to be made, not on pecuniary, but on moral principles. If Philemon had accepted of that part of Paul's offer which respected property, and had placed so much to his account as he considered Onesimus to have "owed" him, he could not have been said to have remitted his debt; nor would Onesimus have had to thank him for remitting it. But it is supposed of Onesimus that he might not only be in debt to his master, but have "wronged" him.

Perhaps he had embezzled his goods, corrupted his children, or injured his character. Now, for Philemon to accept of that part of the offer were very different from the other. In the one case he would have accepted of a pecuniary representative, in the other of a moral one, that is, of a mediator. The satisfaction in the one case would annihilate the idea of remission; but not of the other. Whatever satisfaction Paul might give to Philemon respecting the wound inflicted upon his character and honour as the head of a family, it would not supersede the necessity of pardon being sought by the offender, and freely bestowed by the offended.

The reason for this difference is easily perceived. Debts are transferable, but crimes are not. A third person may cancel the one, but he can only obliterate the effects of the other; the desert of the criminal remains. The debtor is accountable to his creditor as a private individual, who has power to accept of a surety, or, if he please, to remit the whole without any satisfaction. In the one case he would be just, in the other merciful; but no place is afforded by either of them for the combination of justice and mercy in the same proceeding. The criminal on the one hand, is amenable to the magistrate, or to the head of a family, as a public person, and who, especially if the offence be capital, cannot remit the punishment without invading law and justice, nor, in the ordinary discharge of his office, admit of a third person to stand in his place. In extraordinary cases, however, extraordinary expedients are resorted to. A satisfaction may be made to law and justice, as to the spirit of them, while the letter is dispensed with. The well-known story of Zaleucus, the Grecian lawgiver, who consented to lose one of his eyes to spare one of his son's eyes, who, by transgressing the law, subjected himself to the loss of both, is an example. Here, as far as it went, justice and mercy were combined in the same act; and had the satisfaction been much fuller than it was, so full that the authority of the law instead of being weakened should have been abundantly magnified and honoured, still it had been perfectly consistent with free forgiveness.

Finally, in the case of the debtor, satisfaction being once accepted, justice requires his complete discharge; but in that of the criminal, where satisfaction is made to the wounded honour of the law and the authority of the lawgiver, justice, though it admits of his discharge, yet no otherwise requires it than as it may have been matter of promise to the substitute.

I do not mean to say that cases of this sort afford a competent representation of redemption by Christ. That is a work which not only ranks with extraordinary interpositions, but which has no parallel: it is a work of God, which leaves all the petty concerns of mortals infinitely behind it. All that comparisons can do is to give us some idea of the principle on which it proceeds.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

VI. WAS MADE FOR ALL MEN.

(384.) As the sun is the general giver of light to the whole world, although there be many who do receive no light at all of it; or as there was among the Jews, upon the year of jubilee, a general delivery of all bondmen, although many abode still in their bondage and refused the grace of their delivery: even so the redemption of mankind by Christ is available for all, although reprobate and wicked men, for want of the grace of God, do not receive the same; yet there is no reason that it should lose its title and glory of universal redemption because of the children of perdition, seeing that it is ready for all men and all be called unto it.

—Cowdrey, 1598-1664.

tudes, endeavour to illustrate this matter, and somewhat to assail the difficulty (i.e., that, as a matter of fact, all men are not saved). They compare our Saviour to the sun, who shines indifferently to all the world, although there be some private corners and secret caves, to which his light doth not come; although some shut their windows or their eyes, and exclude it; although some are blind, and do not see it. That mystical Sun of Righteousness (saith St. Ambrose) is risen to all, come to all, did suffer and rise again for all—but if any one doth not believe in Christ, he defrauds himself of the general benefit. As if one shutting the windows should exclude the beams of the sun, the sun is not therefore not risen to all. They compare our Lord to a physician, who professes to relieve and cure all that shall have recourse to His help; but doth cure only those who seek for remedy, and are willing to take the medicine; because all (saith St. Ambrose again) do not desire cure, but most do shun it, lest the ulcer should smart by medicaments; therefore volentes curant, non astringit invitos; He cures only the willing, doth not compel those that are unwilling; they only receive health, who desire medicine. Evangelical grace, say they, is like a fountain standing openly, to which all men have free access; at which all men may quench their thirst, if they will inquire after it, and go thereto. "The fountain of life," saith Arnobius, "is open to all; nor is any man hindered or driven from the right of drinking it." The covenant of grace is, say they, a door standing open to all, wherinto all have liberty to enter. "When an entrance," saith St. Chrysostom, "being open to all, and there being nothing that hinders, some being wilfully naught abide without, they have no other but their own wickedness to impute their destruction unto."

And again he puts the question, "If Christ enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world, how is that so many remain unenlightened?" &c. To which he answers, that "If some wilfully shutting the eyes of their minds will not receive the beams of this light, it is not from the nature of light that those remain still in darkness, but from the wickedness of those who wilfully deprive themselves of the gift of it," &c.

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

(386.) Suppose a great kingdom, consisting of several provinces, should have revolted from their sovereign; disclaiming his authority, neglecting and disobeying his laws; that the good prince, out of his goodness and piety toward them (and upon other good considerations moving him thereto, suppose the mediation of his own son), instead of prosecuting them with deserved vengeance, should grant a general pardon and amnesty, in these terms, that whoever of those rebels willingly should come in, acknowledge his fault, and promise future loyalty, or obedience to his laws declared to them, should be received into favour, have impunity, enjoy protection, and obtain rewards from him. Further, for the effectuating of this gracious intent, suppose that he should appoint and commissionate messengers, empowering and charging them to divulge the purport of this act of grace to all the people of that kingdom. Admit now, that these messengers should go forth and seat themselves only in some provinces of that kingdom, proclaiming this universal pardon (universal as to the design, and as to the tenor thereof), only in those, neglecting others; or that, striving to propagate it farther, they should be rejected and repelled; or that from any the like cause the knowledge thereof should not reach to some provinces; it is plain, that indeed the effect of that pardon would be obstructed by such a carriage of the affair; but the tenor of that act would not thereby be altered; nor would the failure in execution (consequent upon the ministers' or the people's misbehaviour) detract from the real amplitude of the prince's intent; no more than the wilful incredulity, refusal, or non-compliance of some persons, where the business is promulgated and notified, would prejudice the same. It is plain the prince meant favourably toward all, and provided carefully for them; although by accident (not imputable to him) the designed favours and benefits do not reach all. The case so plainly suits our purpose, that I need not make any application. —Barrow, 1630-1677.

VII. THE SPIRIT IN WHICH THE DECLARATIONS OF SCRIPTURE CONCERNING IT ARE TO BE STUDIED.

(387.) It is necessary to know what God hath revealed concerning the way of pardon by Christ: it is impossible to know more than He has revealed. If men would forbear to explicate further, there would be more Christianity and less controversy.

—Whichcote.

(388.) In studying all Divine truths, but specially a truth like this (which involves the nature of God, His mysterious dealings, and the relations which it has pleased Him to establish between Himself and man—topics the most arduous in the whole range of theology), we must be careful to accept with the utmost simplicity the intimations of holy Scripture. It would be presumptuous to go into such a subject at all, except so far as those intimations lead us by the hand. In every such investigation, it should be present to our minds from first to last, that in estimating the ways of God, we are like little children estimating the ways of matured and sage men,—men enriched with all the fruits of a long experience and an extensive observation. The unitarian professes an inability to receive the doctrine of the atonement, as it is held by Christians, on the ground that it conflicts with his natural instincts. His sense of justice, he tells us, revolts from the notion of an innocent victim bearing the sins of a guilty world: to represent God as requiring such a sacrifice, in order to the expiation of human guilt, is to paint Him as a ruthless and relentless tyrant, determined to have His blow and to gratify His revenge somewhere, even should it fall upon the unoffending. That this view of what the Scripture says upon the subject is not simply exaggerated, but falsified, we shall presently see.

What I am now concerned to remark is, that our natural instincts, and even our so-called moral sense, are no safe guide upon a subject which soars so infinitely above our limited capacity. We are children; and in considering the means by which our Heavenly Father will save us, it is wisdom to accept simply His own instructions, desperate folly and presumption to criticise those instructions by our childish notions and puerile instincts. My meaning will be more vividly apprehended, if I draw out the illustration in detail.

A father, inured to life upon the mountains, and acquainted by experience with all the natural phenomena of an Alpine district, is under the necessity of crossing a very perilous glacier with children of four or five years old. His first counsel for their safety is the obvious and usual one—that each holding by a cord, one end of which is in his own hand, they shall keep at as great a distance from him, and from one another, as the length of the cord admits. The children are of such an age that the direction, “Hold this, and keep at as great a distance from me as you possibly can,” can just be made intelligible to them,—the grounds of it (plain enough to an adult, that the weight of the party may be distributed along the ice, and not brought to bear on one particular spot, which might thus give way) are, it may be, out of the reach of a child’s capacity.

Let us suppose that the children, in fright and discomfort, begin to reason about this counsel, and to judge of it by their natural instincts; conceive that one of them should think and say as follows:—“Can this direction come from our father, who is so affectionate a parent, who loves to have us close around him under ordinary circumstances, hanging round his neck and sitting on his knees? Can he say upon this occasion, ‘Come not near me, child, at the peril of thy life?’ Say it he may, but I will not believe such to be his meaning, for it is an ungenial idea, conflicting with all my natural instincts, which are to cling round him in the moment of danger, and, moreover, with confidence in his affection.”

But shortly afterwards a further direction is given. Night falls upon the mountain summits, its blackness only relieved by the flickering snows. The wearied children are irresistibly impelled to lie down without any covering, in which case death would overtake them before the morning. The father discovers a corner, where the snowdrift lies deep. He burrows in it with all the energy of a man who knows that life depends upon his exertions, and proposes that in the cavities so made the children shall lie, the cold snow piled over them as if they were buried in it, and only the smallest possible aperture allowed for the passage of the breath. Adults, of course, would be aware that this would be the only method under the circumstances (and a sure method) of preserving and cherishing the vital heat of the body; but not so the children. Snow, applied only to parts of the person, and not as a general wrapper, is bitterly cold; and the children, unable to understand how the great white mantle of winter really wards off the cold of the atmosphere from the seeds of plants and flowers, imagine cruelty in this direction of the father, and shudder at the sight of the bed which he has prepared for them.

My brethren, a little child, feeling thus and reasoning thus on such an occasion, presents a very just image of a man who rejects (or qualifies, so as to meet his own notions) the doctrine of the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, on the ground that it conflicts with his natural instincts, violates his moral sense, and presents to us (as it does undoubtedly, under one aspect of it) the severity of God. The allowing these grounds to weigh with us against the simple statements of Scripture is not wisdom, is not independence of thought, is not a high reach of mind,—it is simply folly.

The question is not between Revelation and reason, but rather between reason and natural instincts; reliance upon which (in defiance of reason) is folly. For it is reason surely to accept, and folly to reject or modify the Word of the all-wise and all-loving One on points on which He alone is competent to inform us.

The child who keeps at a distance from his father, and buries himself in the snow, is a wise child, because, renouncing the guidance of his instincts, he places faith in one manifestly his superior in capacity. The child who clings round his father’s neck upon the glacier, and stretches his limbs beneath the open sky, in distrust of his parent’s directions, is a foolish child; for what is greater folly than to refuse to be guided by a recognised superior in wisdom? And it cannot be too strongly insisted upon, that one who, in investigating such a subject as the method of human salvation, follows the guidance of his natural instincts in preference to that of Revelation, is a weak person, not a man of bold and courageous thought. Simple dependence upon God, where God alone can teach, is the truest independence of mind.

—Goulburn.

(389.) When I look at the work of the atonement, I look at a grand and glorious transaction that lies back, in the order of nature, of the purpose of election, and that in its original applicability is limited by no design of God. It is for the world—“that whosoever believeth may not perish but have everlasting life.” I see in it a work designed to show the benignity of God; showing how God can be just, and yet the justifier of Him that believeth; how He can maintain His truth and yet forgive; how He can welcome rebels to His favour and yet show that He hates their sins; how He can admit them to the fellowship of angels, and yet not have them revolt at the accession to their number, or lose their confidence in God, as if He were disposed to treat the evil and the good alike. And I love to contemplate it as it stands in its original glory—as it is an emanation of the Divine goodness. I love to contemplate it, not in reference to the comparatively narrow question of selfishness, “who shall or who shall not be saved; not narrowed down by a reference to a sordid commercial transaction of debt and purchase; but with reference to the display of the Divine perfections—the exhibition of the mercy and the goodness of God. So I love to stand on the shore of the ocean, while surge after surge breaks at my feet; and the blue expanse stretches out illimitably before me; and ships ride proudly over the deep; and to contemplate it not with reference to the question whether it will safely bear a cargo of mine across it or not, but as a glorious exhibition of the power and greatness of God. So I love to stand on some eminence, and look down upon the landscape, and to survey the spreading forests, and the river, and the fields, and the waterfalls, and the villages, and the churches, not with the narrow inquiry, “What is all this worth?” but what a view is there here of the goodness of God, and the greatness of His compassion to the children of men! So I stand at Niagara, and as God “pours” the water “from His hollow hand,” and the soul is filled with emotions of unutterable sublimity, I will not ask what is all this worth for a mill-seat? but I will allow the scene to lift my soul up to God; to teach me lessons of His power and greatness, and to show me the littleness of all that man can do. And so I will look on the glorious work of the atonement. I will look at it, and ask the question, who is or who is not to be benefited by it? I will ask what new manifestation there is in it of the character of God? what is there to elevate the soul? what is there to make me think more highly of the love, the truth, and the justice of my Maker? what is there to expand the soul, and to elevate it above the sordid views and grovelling propensities of this world?

—Barnes, 1871.

VIII. NOT THE CAUSE, BUT THE MANIFESTATION OF GOD'S LOVE FOR SINNERS.

(390.) We do not suppose that compassion towards them has been purchased, but that it was originally so great that He was willing to stoop to sacrifice in order to rescue and save them. A father has a beloved son. He embarks on the ocean in the pursuits of commerce, and falls into the hands of an Algerine pirate. He is chained, and driven to the slave market, and sold, and conveyed over burning sands as a slave, and pines in hopeless bondage. The news of this reaches the ears of the father. What will be his emotions? Will the suffering of that son make a change in his character? If required, he would gather up his silver, and his gold, and his pearls, and leave his own home, and cross the ocean, and make his way over the burning sands, that he might find out and ransom the captive. But think you he would be a different man now from what he was? Has the captivity of that son made a change in him? No. His sufferings have called out the original tenderness of his bosom, and have merely developed what he was. He so loved that child that the forsaking of his own home, and the perils of the ocean, and the journey over burning sands, were regarded as of no consequence if he could seek out and save him. These sacrifices and toils would be trifles; if he might again press his lost son to his bosom, and restore him to his desolate home. It is the love—the strong original love in his bosom, that prompts to the sacrifice, and that makes toil and peril welcome. So of God. Such was His original love for man, that He was willing to stoop to any sacrifice to save him; and the gift of a Saviour was the mere expression of that love. —Barnes, 1798–1870.

IX. ITS RELATION TO THE UNIVERSE.

(391.) The mediation of Christ is represented in Scripture as bringing the whole creation into union with the church or people of God. In the dispensation of the fulness of times it is said that God would "gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in Him." Again, "it pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell; and (having made peace through the blood of His cross) by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself; by Him, I say, whether things in earth, or things in heaven."

The language here used supposes that the introduction of sin has effected a disunion between men and the other parts of God's creation. It is natural to suppose it should be so. If a province of a great empire rise up in rebellion against the lawful government, all communication between the inhabitants of such a province and the faithful adherents to order and obedience must be at an end. A line of separation would be immediately drawn by the sovereign, and all intercourse between the one and the other prohibited. Nor would it less accord with the inclination than with the duty of all the friends of righteousness, to withdraw their connection from those who were in rebellion against the supreme authority and the general good. It must have been thus with regard to the holy angels, on man's apostacy. Those who at the creation of our world had sung together, and even shouted for joy, would now retire in disgust and holy indignation.

But, through the mediation of Christ, a reunion is effected. By the blood of the cross we have peace with God; and being reconciled to Him, are united to all who love Him throughout the whole extent of creation. If Paul could address the Corinthians, concerning one of their excluded members, who had been brought to repentance, "To whom ye forgive anything, I also;" much more would the friends of righteousness say, in their addresses to the Great Supreme, concerning an excluded member from the moral system, "To whom Thou forgivest anything, we also!" Hence angels acknowledge Christians as brethren, and become ministering spirits to them while inhabitants of the present world.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754–1815.

X. REASONABLENESS OF CHRIST'S SUFFERINGS FOR HIS PEOPLE.

(392.) The believer can clear God as just in receiving the debt at Christ's hand, from that near union that is betwixt Christ and His people. The husband may lawfully be arrested for his wife's debt, because this union is voluntary; and it is to be supposed, he did, or ought to have considered what her estate was before he contracted so near a relation to her. A suit may justly be commenced against a surety, because it was his own act to engage for the debt. To be sure, Christ was most free in engaging Himself in the sinner's cause. He knew what a sad plight man's nature was in; and He had an absolute freedom to please Himself in His choice; whether He would leave man to perish, or lend His helping hand towards his recovery; He had also an absolute power of His own life, which no mere creature hath; so that it being His own offer (upon His Father's call) to take our nature in marriage, thereby to interest Himself in our debt, and for the payment of it, to disburse and pour out His own precious blood to death, how dare proud flesh call the justice of God to the bar, and bring His righteousness in this transaction into question, for which God promised Himself the highest expressions of love and thankfulness at His creatures' hands?

—Gurnall, 1617–1679.

XI. VICARIOUS SUFFERING THE LAW OF THE UNIVERSE.

(393.) But why must my Lord be wounded for my transgressions, bruised for my iniquities? Why must He be chastised for my peace? It may help some, if we go round about for our answer, if we appeal to dumb, yet speaking, nature. How is it that the ground has to be wounded by spade and plough, and put, as it were, to the torture under harrows before it will produce bread-corn for us? How is it that when the corn is produced it must also be subjected to torture,—must be bruised under millstones, ground and reground, before it will make bread for us? How is it that even then the bread is not committed to the stomach, before it has been further bruised and mangled by the teeth? How is it that plants, flowers, and fruits only yield their latent virtues when bruised? How is it that there can be no wine till the grapes have been pressed or trodden? Why is vegetable life sacrificed for us? Why is animal life slain for us? Why does every creature come into the world through the gate of sorrow? Why is man born to labour? Why is the sweat of the brow associated with labour? Why are labour and sorrow the price which must be paid for knowledge? Why are the holiest things most hidden? Why is God hidden from us? How is it that all things are secreted within chaff, or skin, or shell, and that violence must be done to chaff, skin, or shell, in order to reach the hidden good? How is it that death is the gate of life? If you find the answers to these questions, it will help you to the opening of the higher question: How is it that the bread of God, the Spirit of Life, the mercy of the Eternal Father, is not adapted to our need, till it comes to us through the humbled, bruised, tortured, crucified Son of God? If you cannot answer the former questions, you will learn, at least, that the whole of nature labours under the same difficulty as "Christ crucified." You will see that good comes into this world through a strait gate, the better comes in through a still straiter gate, and the best comes in through the straitest gate of all. Indeed the absolutely best is not known in our world. Nature will grow thorns and thistles without labour and culture, but if you will have corn-fields and vineyards, you must chastise nature, and afflict your own body and soul with hard labour. Children will grow up in ignorance and vice, without the care of parents and the labour of teachers; but not in knowledge and virtue. Still less, without earnest painstaking, will they grow up for heaven. The fact is, evil thrives here, but good suffers. The higher and the purer the good, the more it suffers. However it be accounted for, "this whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain," brings forth in labour and sorrow, runs through its brief course of vanity, and ends in death. Let those, therefore, who turn sulky and grumble, because they find the Cross of Christ in the Bible, have the goodness to remove the stumblingblock from Nature. For my part I find the Cross of Christ, not an untrue revelation of what was a Divine condition, before Jesus was born, or the prophecies written. Upon whose shoulders did the burden of this fallen and degenerate creation rest from time immemorial? Who was grieved and smitten to the heart, by the Titans of rebellion and wickedness that were before the flood? Is it not always the head of the house who feels most sorely the disorder, the evils, and the sorrows of his house? And who is the Head of this great house which we call universe? Is it its own head, or is God its Head? God, certainly. Then the chief pressure of its evil condition must lie upon Him, must it not? Surely. What countenance then, or authority, from nature, have men for objecting to the Cross of Christ? The Cross of Christ did not make a new truth; it was rather the manifestation of a world-old truth.

—Pulsford.

that some one shall suffer to procure them. We move in the midst of comforts, most of which are furnished by the severe toil of the handicraftsman. Our lives are supported by animal food, and in providing animal food, some innocent creature is made to bleed and die. The structure of civilisation is built up upon the groans and toils of the few. It is then surely in accordance with a law which seems to pervade God's universe, that the highest, the inappreciable blessing of redemption, should be purchased by the deepest anguish that ever rent the human soul asunder.

Secondly, the fact is certain, however we may explain it, that sins are visited upon others than their agents. The spendthrift and intemperate father entails upon his son, in the ordinary course of things, an enfeebled constitution, and all the miseries of poverty. We may quarrel with these facts if we please; but they confront us wherever we turn our eyes, and we cannot deny them. Why is an innocent person to suffer even one single pang of bodily pain for the sins of the guilty? I care not to say why; for to our limited capacities many of God's dealings are utterly inscrutable; but I cannot be blind to the fact that so it is in the world of nature. And if God deals thus in the world of nature, why should we refuse to believe that His dealings in the world of grace will be characterised by the same great feature, that (in Scripture phraseology) "Christ was made sin for us, in order that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him"? —Goulburn.

(395.) Society, the whole fabric of the moral world, is carried on, and is held together by a law, by a scheme of natural intervention or mediation; I think you could scarcely name a joy you have ever felt; or a trouble from which you have ever escaped, which you cannot trace to the intervention of another, and not rarely to an intervention effected with pain to the intervener.

Think of the little babe; there it lies, joyous and redolent with the promise of the activities of life, yet utterly helpless and dependent upon others' care. But think also of the pale face of her whose strength scarcely suffices to nestle her little one in her nerveless arms. Nay, without my bidding, some of you perforce recall to memory, how the mother's pulse ceased to beat before she could utter a parent's blessing on a child. And what is all this? what is it but a redemption of a life, at the cost of the sufferings of another!

Pass onwards a few years, and trace that child now walking with elastic step at his father's side—but look upwards at the father's face; you will not be surprised to find many a deep furrow there, furrows that bear testimony to the father's anxieties and father's toils—anxieties and toils, that the bright boy who walks at his side may have a good offset for the battle of life before him, nay, anxieties and toils sometimes deep and inevitable for the bare supply of that child's daily bread. And what means all this? What is it but redemption again, sometimes procured at the cost of labour, and suffering, and tears!

And when is it that you cease to hear men speak of their "friends"? What other word so common among us? Need I remind you what that word "friend" practically implies? Alas! for the most part it implies, not the confiding interchange of thought; not the sweet comparison of experience, and of hope, and of aspiration; not the pleasant suggestions which arise from community of taste; for such high privileges are reserved for those only who by patient continuance in well-doing have acquired the right and the capacity to enjoy them; but that commonest of words a "friend," bears testimony to that commonness of weakness which looks for aid in another's strength; to that commonness of wants which seeks their supply in another's abundance; it bears testimony to that commonness of troubles which not rarely can be removed solely at the cost of another's pains, even greater than those which they assuage. There is not, there cannot be, a man before me who may not trace, again and again, instances of what I mean in his own personal history. "I speak of what we know and feel within."

And think again, for a moment, even of the arts and conveniences of life; of the appliances, the inventions, the discoveries which God hath ordained to ennoble life; such results come at no man's light bidding; the discovery, the invention may come, and in fact must at last like a flash; but the happy, the final thought comes to the man of genius only after days and nights, or even years of patient endurance in intellectual toil. And when it does come to him, not seldom the health is failing, or the lamp of life is flickering and burnt low; or other men step in, reaping the harvest of his toil, and leaving him little more than the gleanings of the field, the sowing whereof was all his own. Look at the countenances of the chief among those able men who now throng your town,* and on their brows you will find many a trace of the midnight struggle with thought, ageing them before they have reached their prime. Herein is that saying true, "One soweth, and another reapeth." These men labour, you and I "enter into their labours."

And so I might proceed with other instances of a like import. If the time allowed, I might more than briefly allude to the well-known names of noble men and of noble women still living among us, who like apostles and martyrs of old, count not their lives dear unto them, if only they may help the helpless, cheer the cheerless, raise the fallen, and impart the joy of hope to the spirit of the dying. But I forbear; for one continuous system of redemption and of vicarious suffering has been ordained of God as the very law and the plan of our natural being.

Now, such being the scheme, such the manner after which it has pleased the Eternal Creator to impart the joys, to assuage the sorrows, and to enlighten the ignorance of His creatures in this their natural life which endures but for threescore years and ten; I ask you, Is there anything which can reasonably jar upon our feelings, if we find that the Eternal Father in His marvellous beneficence has interposed after a like, though a higher manner, on behalf of His children in those higher relations of theirs which endure for ever? —Frithard.

XII. OBJECTIONS ANSWERED.

1. Salvation by the suffering of another is not inconsistent with the Divine justice.

(396.) Men say that it is unjust that one man should suffer for another; however willing may be the sufferer, however he may put aside the rights of his own innocence, it is revolting to our reason to suppose that God will or can accept such a sacrifice as effectual towards the forgiveness of the guilty. Yet, I suppose there is nothing in human history more plain than that men suffer the natural punishments for things of which they are not guilty. We speak as if the Saviour's sacrifice were the only fact hard to be accepted in the Divine economy, as if an objection established against this one tenet would leave all the rest of the Divine Government plain, and easy to be understood. That is not the case. How do we make it just that all from their birth should need atonement, that they should be incapable of holiness? How do we account for the ruined health and morals of the children where the father has been licentious? how for the devastation of whole countries in a warfare waged upon the quarrel of kings? how for the calamities which shipwreck, and earthquake, and contagion bring on the unoffending? how for the light and prosperity enjoyed by European races, whilst the African nations grovel in degradation? Men are not, and cannot be, regarded only as free and responsible units, each planted apart from all his neighbours and thoroughly independent of them all; as perfectly free on the one hand, and on the other, completely responsible for all their acts without help or hindrance from any other. Man has his individual life; but he is also one of a family, of a city, of a nation; and his lot is bound up with that of others in all these relations. When the shells are crashing through the roofs of the bombarded town, they will shatter alike the warrior and the man that longs for peace. When the pestilence that walketh in darkness and destroyeth in the noonday is marching through our streets and alleys, it mows down alike those whose careless habits have encouraged the disease, and those who have purged their dwellings from those pollutions on which infection feeds. The Most High is just indeed; but He is also a jealous God, visiting the sins of the fathers on the children. Through such enactments does His justice work itself out. One day we may understand His ways, and learn that His moral government proceeds on laws as beautiful and as harmonious as those which regulate the world of nature.

But, in the meantime, let us not argue upon God's justice, as if we understood it thoroughly. So far from its being a paradox that another should exercise an influence over our moral being, examples of such an influence will occur to every one. And a being quite separated from all other natures, and owing nothing of his character or his actions to others around him, cannot even be conceived of any existing under our human nature. If it is unjust that your sins, out of which you cannot help yourselves, should receive great help from another whose you are, in whom as the Word and Wisdom of God you live, and move, and have your being, why are you allowed to profit by other men's toil and labour in anything whatever? All that you are and have has come from others, now through the most wearing labour, now through perils that have even cost life itself. There is, therefore, nothing repugnant to the known facts of God's government, in the belief that one may exert an influence over others, both for good and evil; it is not utterly abhorrent to the Divine justice that one should be permitted to lift off the weight of others' sins, unless it is also abhorrent to it that sins should be transmitted from father to child, or the profligate be allowed to entice the innocent to share his sin.

The power of others over us is one of the most difficult forms of that obscure enigma—the existence of evil in the world. But of all solutions the least satisfactory to my own mind would be that which allowed it for evil and denied it for good; which admitted that the sins of the first Adam may be inherited, but denied that the second Adam could relieve them; which was able to say, "In Adam all die," but found it a blasphemy against the justice of heaven to add, "Even so in Christ shall all be made alive."

—Thomson.

2. The redemption of the human race is not a task unworthy of the Divine greatness.

(397.) God is as incapable of being indifferent towards His lost mankind, as is a mother towards her lost child. Lost mankind are not only His lost, but His lost children. His piece of money is Money indeed, for originally it came out of the mine of His Eternal Nature. Heathen poets, Christian Apostles, and modern philosophy are agreed that mankind "are His offspring." And does not the Source of all hearts feel? And is He not concerned for His lost? In the Divinity of indifference I cannot believe. I could far more easily believe that the Divine Heart carries a huge grief; and that "the Man of Sorrows" only partially represents the tenderness of Infinite Love. In human hearts, in mother's love, in angelic love, and in the Person of Jesus, the affections of God have a wide and wonderful revelation; but what the Divine Affections are in their Fountain-head must be beyond all revealing and conceiving. And yet I am strongly inclined to think that, to many, one great offence of the Gospel is, that it is too gracious, too tender, too womanly. They can believe in a God afar off, but they cannot believe in God "nigh at hand." They can conceive God to have Almighty Power, Infinite Wisdom and Justice, but they cannot give Him credit for Infinite Affection. They know that a woman will light a candle and go into every hole and corner, stooping and searching, until she find that which she has missed; but they have no idea that this can be a true parable of God's concern for His lost children. They are not surprised to find a heart in my Lady Franklin: they are not surprised at any measures that she may set on foot to recover the lost one. They are not surprised that the British and American Governments should be concerned to seek, and if possible, to save Sir John and his crew. No one said, they are not worth the expense and labour of seeking, because they are few. Not far from a million pounds were sacrificed in this search. Besides money, good brothers were not found backward to expose their own lives to danger, in the distant hope of finding and relieving their missing brothers. Have the English Government and people so great a concern to recover their lost, and has God none? Better say that a drop contains more than the ocean, that a candle gives more light than the sun, that there are higher virtues in a stream than in its source, and that the creature has more heart than God. Otherwise confess, that the Gospel is infinitely worthy of the Heart of God; and never more imagine the Great Father to find rest under the loss of His human family, in the consolation: "They are nothing compared with My universe, they will never be missed." —Pulford.

3. This world is not too small a sphere for such a wonderful display of the Divine love.

(398.) Let creation be ever so extensive, there is nothing inconsistent with reason in supposing that some one particular part of it should be chosen out from the rest, as a theatre on which the great Author of all things would perform His most glorious works. Every empire that has been founded in the world has had some one particular spot where those actions were performed, from which its glory has arisen. The glory of the Cæsars was founded on the event of a battle fought near a very inconsiderable city; and why might not this world, though less than "twenty-five thousand miles in circumference," be chosen as the theatre on which God would bring about events that should fill His whole empire with glory and joy? It would be as reasonable to plead the insignificance of Actium or Agincourt in objection to the competency of the victories there obtained (supposing them to have been on the side of righteousness), to fill the respective empires of Rome and Britain with glory, as that of our world to fill the whole empire of God with matter of joy and everlasting praise. The truth is, the comparative dimension of our world is of no account. If it be large enough for the accomplishment of events which are sufficient to occupy the minds of all intelligences, that is all that is required.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

XIII. NO DIFFICULTIES IN OUR UNDERSTANDING THE METHOD OF THE ATONEMENT SHOULD HINDER US FROM GRATEFULLY ACCEPTING IT.

(399.) When I see men busy about the method of atonement, I marvel at them. It is as if a man that was starving to death should insist upon going into a laboratory to ascertain in what way dirt germinated wheat. It is as if a man that was perishing from hunger should insist upon having a chemical analysis of bread.

—Becher.

AVARICE.

1. Defined.

(400.) Avarice is nothing but a higher form of the wish to obtain property—so high that it cuts off one's sympathy from others; and lowers the impression of the value of things which are more valuable than riches. It becomes first a kind of intemperance; and then it becomes like intemperance itself, a disease; and finally it becomes insanity. There are few misers; but there are a great many men who have the first touches of miserism in them. There is a closeness, a tenacity with which men hold money. There is a growing indisposition to use it for any other purpose than to increase it. There is a spirit by which men see in riches only capital to be invested for the sake of its interest, which is to them good to be invested again. So they roll their possessions, as boys used to roll the snow in winter. In rolling, it increases in magnitude, and is at last vaster than they can shove. And when they have amassed it, what do they do? They let it stand where it is, and the summer finds it, and melts it all away. It sinks to water again; and the water is sucked up, and goes to make snow once more for other foolish boys to roll into heaps. Men go on amassing wealth, either in the early stages, or the middle stages, or the latter stages of avarice, desiring it, not for what it can do, not for what it is as a quickener, as a helper, as a teacher, as a purveyor of God's bounty, but purely and simply because it is wealth.

—Becher.

2. Is a result of atheism.

(401.) Because men believe not Providence, therefore they do so greedily scrape and board. They do not believe any reward for charity, therefore they will part with nothing.

—Barrow, 1631-1713.

3. Its insidiousness.

(402.) Beware of growing covetousness, for of all sins this is one of the most insidious. It is like the silting up of a river. As the stream comes down from the land, it brings with it sand and earth, and deposits all these at its mouth, so that by degrees, unless the conservators watch it carefully, it will block itself up, and leave no channel for ships of great burden. By daily deposit it imperceptibly creates a bar which is dangerous to navigation. Many a man when he begins to accumulate wealth commences at the same moment to ruin his soul, and the more he acquires, the more closely he blocks up his liberality, which is, so to speak, the very mouth of spiritual life. Instead of doing more for God he does less; the more he saves the more he wants, and the more he wants of this world the less he cares for the world to come.

—Spurgeon.

4. Degrades the character.

(403.) The avaricious man is like a pig, which seeks its food in the mud, without caring where it comes from.

—Vianney.

5. Leads to dishonesty and falsehood.

(404.) The love of money can never keep good quarter with honesty; there is a mint of fraud in the worldly breast, and it can coin lies as fast as utterance.

—Adams, 1653.

6. The imagination of the covetous.

(405.) The fancy is a mint-house, and most of the thoughts a covetous man mints are worldly: he is always plotting and projecting about the things of this life; like a virgin that bath all her thoughts running upon her suitor.

—Watson, 1696.

7. Is insatiable.

(406.) It is not abundance, nor masses of gold and silver, that can quench this insatiable thirst; but thereby it is rather increased. For as more wood put to the fire augments the flame and the heat, so the desire of many by addition of wealth is multiplied.

—Atterhol, 1618.

(407.) The countryman in the fable would needs stay till the river was run all away, and then go over dry-shod; but the river did run on still, and he was deceived in his expectation. Such are the worldling's inordinate desires: the deceitful heart promiseth to see them run over and gone, when they are attained to such a measure, and then they are stronger, wider, and more unruly than before; for a covetous heart grasps at no less than the whole world—would fain be master of all, and dwell alone, like a wren in the body, which draws all to itself. Let it have never so much, it will reach after more; add house to house, and field to field, till there be no more place to compass. Like a bladder, it swells wider and wider, the more of this empty world is put into it. So boundless, so endless, so inordinate are the corrupt desires of worldly-minded men!

—Spencer, 1656.

(408.) A ship may be overlaid with silver, even unto sinking, and yet space enough be left to hold ten times more. So a covetous man, though he have enough to sink him, yet never hath he enough to satisfy him, like that miserable caitiff, mentioned by Theocritus, first wishing that he had a thousand sheep in his flock, and then when he has them, he would have cattle without number. Thus a circle cannot fill a triangle, so neither can the whole world (if it were to be compassed) the heart of man; a man may as easily fill a chest with grace, as the heart with gold. The air fills not the body, neither doth money the covetous mind of man.

—Trapp, 1601-1669.

(409.) Covetousness is a disease of the mind, and an unnatural thirst which is inflamed by that which should quench it. Every desire that is natural is satisfied and at rest, when it hath once obtained the thing it desired. If a man be hungry, he is satisfied when he hath eaten; or if he be thirsty, his thirst is allayed and quenched when he hath drank to such a proportion as nature doth require; and if he eat and drink beyond this measure, nature is oppressed, and it is a burden to him. But covetousness is the thirst, not of nature, but of a diseased mind. It is the thirst of a fever, or of a dropsy; the more a man drinks the more he desires, and the more he is inflamed. In like manner, the more the covetous man increaseth his estate, the more his desires are enlarged and extended, and he finds continually new occasions and new necessities.

If this be the nature of this vice, the more it gets still to covet the more, then nothing can be more unreasonable than to think to gratify this appetite; because, at this rate, the man can never be contented, because he can never have enough. Nay, so far as it is from that, that every new accession to his fortune sets his desires one degree farther from rest and satisfaction. For a covetous mind having no bounds, it is very probable that the man's desire will increase much faster than his estate; and then the richer he is, he is still the poorer, because he is still the less contented with his condition. However, it is impossible that the man's desire should ever be satisfied; for desire being always first, if the man's desire for riches advanceth and goes forward as fast as riches follow, then it is not possible for riches ever to overtake the desire of them, no more than the hinder wheels of a coach can overtake those which are before; because, as they were at a distance at first setting out, so let them go never so far or so fast, they keep the same distance still.

(410.) The thirst for gold, like the drunkard's, is insatiable. The more it is indulged, the more the flame is fed, it burns the fiercer.

—Guthrie.

(411.) Just as our views expand the higher we ascend the steep of a vast mountain, so do our wishes widen the further we advance in wealth.

—Murcell.

(412.) The love of money, like all other passions, grows by what it feeds on. Indulgence serves only to strengthen it, and to render it the more insatiable. What seemed a fortune before it was attained, dwindles into comparative poverty when it has been actually acquired. The height which looked so lofty when viewed from the plain, sinks down almost to the level of the plain itself, when, standing on its summit, the climber contrasts it with the far loftier eminences which have now come into view. He finds himself only as yet at the bottom of a vast mountain chain; the higher he ascends, the more distinctly this fact appears; and just so it is with the love of money. The sum that looked so large in his eye at the outset, shrinks by and by into a trifle. Once it seemed wealth, now it appears the barest competence. It is measured every year by a new standard—the standard of a higher grade of society—of a more ambitious style of living—of new wants and more expensive tastes. Things which at one time would have been accounted luxuries, having now become the merest necessities of life. That which at an earlier stage of his career would have been accounted extravagance, has now almost the aspect of meanness. The point at which he is prepared to say that it is enough, is like the horizon, to which the traveller, however far and however fast the journeys, never gets any nearer. The case now described is, to the full, as common in our day, as it could have been in the time of Solomon.

—Buchanan.

8. Is especially the sin of old age.

(413.) There may be a forsaking of a particular sin that has been delightful and predominant without sincerity towards God, for another lust may have got possession of the heart, and take the throne. There is an alternate succession of appetites in the corrupt nature, according to the change of men's temper or interests in the world. As seeds sown in that order in a garden, that 'tis always full of a succession of fruits and herbs in season; so original sin that is sown in our nature, is productive of divers lusts, some in the spring, others in the summer of our age, some in the autumn, others in the winter. Sensual lusts flourish in youth, but when mature age has cooled these desires, worldly lusts succeed; in old age there is no relish for sensuality, but covetousness reigns imperiously. Now he that expels one sin, and entertains another, continues in a state of sin; 'tis but exchanging one familiar for another; or, to borrow the prophet's expression, "Tis as one should fly from a lion, and meet with a bear" that will as certainly devour him.

—Salter, 1840.

9. Sometimes overreaches itself.

(414.) A very rich merchant, who had an only son, made his will, by which he gave all his wealth, which amounted to three hundred thousand francs, to certain monks, leaving them to give to his son such a sum as they wished. The merchant died; the monks took all to themselves without wishing to give anything to the heir. The latter complained to the viceroy, who, having seen the will, asked the monks what they offered to the son. "Ten thousand francs," they replied. "You wish, then, to have all the rest?" "Yes, my lord, we demanded the execution of the will." "That is just," said the viceroy, "but you do not understand it properly; it is said that the son shall have that which you wish, you grant ten to the heir; it is two hundred and ninety thousand francs that you want. Ah well! following the clause of the will, this sum is set apart for the son. I order you to give it to him; the ten thousand francs remaining are therefore yours." They were obliged to submit.

—W. M. Taylor.

10. Its folly.

(415.) I doubt not many covetous men take a great deal of pleasure in ruminating upon their wealth, and in recounting what they have; but they have a great deal of tormenting care and fear about it, and if they had not, it is very hard to understand where the reasonable pleasure and happiness lies of having things to no end. It is, at the best, like that of some foolish birds, which, they say, take pleasure in stealing money, that they may hide it; as if it were worth the while for men to take pains to dig silver out of the earth, for no other purpose but to melt it down and stamp it, and bury it there again.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(416.) A covetous man is like a dog in a wheel, that roasteth meat for others.

—E. Cook.

11. Its misery.

(417.) Poverty is in want of much, but avarice of everything.

—Publius Syrus.

(418.) What can be more miserable, than for a man to toil and labour his whole life, and to have no power to enjoy any fruit of his labours? to bear like an ass a golden burden all the day, and, without any further use of it, at night to have it taken away, reserving nothing to himself but a galled conscience?

—Downham, 1644.

12. Its odiousness.

(419.) It is a common saying that a hog is good for nothing whilst he is alive: not good to bear or carry, as the horse; nor to draw, as the ox; nor to clothe, as the sheep; nor to give milk, as the cow; nor to keep the house, as the dog; but ad solam mortem nutritur (fed only to the slaughter). So a covetous rich man, just like a hog, doth no good with his riches whilst he liveth, but when he is dead his riches come to be disposed of. "The riches of a sinner are laid up for the just."

—Willet, 1562-1621.

(420.) The avaricious man is like the barren, sandy ground of the desert, which sucks in all the rain and dews with greediness, but yields no fruitful herbs or plants for the benefit of others.

13. Inconsistent with the hope of salvation.

(421.) If a man, sick on his bed, burning of a fever, fetching his breath with straightness and shortness, looking like earth, say he is well in health, we do not believe him: so if we see men swelling with pride, flaming with lust, looking earthy with covetousness, and yet flattering themselves with hope of salvation, we cannot credit them, all the world cannot save them.

—Adams, 1654.

14. Excludes from heaven.

(422.) The covetous is like a camel, with a great hunch on his back; heaven's gate must be made higher and broader, or he will hardly get in.

—Adams, 1654.

BACKSLIDERS.

1. Should be regarded with compassion.

(423.) The story of Hagar with her son Ishmael is set down by so heavenly a pen, that a man cannot read it without tears. She is cast out of Abraham's house with her child, that might call her master father. Bread and water is put on her shoulder, and she wanders into the wilderness; a poor relief for so long a journey, to which there was set no date of returning. Soon was the water spent in the bottle; the child cries for drink to her that had it not, and lifts up pitiful eyes, every glance whereof was enough to wound her soul; vents the sighs of a dry and panting heart; but there is no water to be had, except the tears that ran down from a sorrowful mother's eyes could quench its thirst. Down she lays the child under a shrub, and went, as heavy as ever mother parted from her only son, and sat her down upon the earth, as if she desired it for a present receptacle of her grief, of herself; "a good way off," saith the text, "as it were a bow-shot," that the shrieks, yellings, and dying groans of the child might not reach her ears; crying out, "Let me not see the death of the child." Lie she knew he must, but as if the beholding it would rend her heart and wound her soul, she denies those windows so sad a spectacle: "Let me not see the death of the child. So she lift up her voice and wept." Never was Hagar so pitiful to her son Ishmael, as the Church is to every Christian. If any son of her womb will wander out of Abraham's family, the house of faith, into the wilderness of this world, and prodigally part with his "own mercy" for the gaudy, transient vanities thereof, she follows with entreaties to him and to heaven for him. If he will not return, she is loath to see his death; she turns her back upon him, and weeps. He that can with dry eyes and unrelenting heart behold a man's soul ready to perish, hath not so much passion and compassion as that Egyptian bondwoman.

—Adams, 1654.

2. God's compassion for them.

(424.) He pities the backslider; just as the general on the field of battle pities the wounded who are carried bleeding by their comrades to the rear. "Go and proclaim these words towards the north, and say, Return, thou backsliding Israel, saith the Lord, and I will not cause mine anger to fall upon you; for I am merciful, saith the Lord, and I will not keep anger for ever." —Macduff.

3. Their duty.

(425.) The Christian's care should be to get his armour speedily repaired; a battered helmet is next to no helmet in point of present use; grace in decay is like a man pulled off his legs by sickness; if some means be not used to recover it, little service will be done by it, or comfort received from it. Therefore Christ gives the Church of Ephesus (to whom Paul wrote the Epistle) this counsel: "To remember from whence she was fallen, to repent, and do her first works." —Salter.

4. What reclaimed backsliders are to do with their "old hope."

(426.) One of the very first questions, where persons have been professors of religion, and have for various reasons backslidden and declined into a carnal and secular life, and their moral sense and conscience have begun to be quickened, always is,

"What shall I do with my old hope?" One would think, from their talk, that a hope was a literal, visible, tangible thing, like a title-deed, and that, however one's old hope may have been neglected, when he starts again he must connect it with his new hope, or else there will be a flaw in the title!

My own impression about this is, that an old hope is just like the Jews' manna on the second day. It is said, if I remember correctly, that it stank. The Lord did not let them pick up manna for more than one day. If any of them thought they would—if any of them, greedy, as men are now-a-days, picked up enough for two days, it stank in their vessels. I think our hope in the Lord Jesus Christ is to be gathered up every day fresh, and that if any man undertakes to keep it, it spoils in the keeping. And whether a man thinks he has been a Christian or not, and whether he has been deceived or not, has little to do, it seems to me, with his present duty.

Let me put a case to you—

A man has learned to read of a very poor master. He makes up his mind that he will take lessons of a rhetorical teacher. He takes his book and reads, and as he reads, draws his words and runs them together, and makes bad work of it generally; and the teacher says: "Stop! stop! stop! What sort of reading is that? That will never do in the world. You are no reader at all." And the man says, "Then I suppose I must go back and read my A B C's again." He has already learned them; he simply reads poorly, without proper emphasis, without any appreciation of the sense, and without indicating the pauses; and what has he to do but to start where he is, and do the right and best thing?

Suppose a man has been prescribing for himself for some ailment, and finding that he is getting no better, he calls a doctor, and the doctor says, "You have been mistaken about yourself; you have not understood your own symptoms; you have employed improper remedies; you have not hit the difficulty at all; you have aggravated your trouble"—would there be anything for that man to do except to stop just where he was, and take the new course, that under skilful direction, would lead to entire sanative restoration?

Now, it is precisely so in religious matters. A man who has begun a Christian life, and stopped; or a man who has begun a Christian life, and gone through devious and circuitous ways till he is quite out of the right path; or a man who has been swept away by worldly influences; such a man, the moment he comes to himself, says, or should say, "There is but one course for me." Right there, where he is, without stopping to think of the past or anything relating to it, he should begin to live a humble, loving, obedient life to the Lord Jesus Christ. Standing right in his tracks, he is to begin there and then, and just as he is, as though he had never had any hope or known anything about religion. Throw away all the hope you ever had, and take a new one.

I do not mean by this to bring contempt upon old experiences; but your transcendent duty is to begin instantly, in your place, to fulfil your obligations toward God and man. If you have been a Christian before, you will find it out; and if you have never been a Christian, it is time that you were one; and in either case the way is not to go back and try to analyse and test old evidences, but to take a new start, with a new hope, and a new love, and a new purpose, for the Saviour.

—Becher.

BACKSLIDING.

1. Its perilousness.

(427.) We find in Scripture many desperately sick, yet cured the first time by our Saviour, but where do we read in all the Scripture, where in all the Gospel, of any blind man's eyes twice enlightened? of any deaf ears twice opened? of any tied tongue twice loosened? of any possessed with devils twice dispossessed? of any dead twice raised? No doubt but that Christ could have done it, but we read not that ever He did it—the reason, that we should be most careful to avoid relapses into former sins, the recovery whereof is very uncertain, always difficult, and in some cases, as the apostle teacheth, impossible.

—Alphonous ab Avendanus, 1590.

2. Is gradual in its progress.

(428.) A church is sometimes astounded by the fall of some professor in it: this is the fruit, not the seed or the beginning, of backsliding. So a man is laid on a sick bed, but the disorder has only now arrived at its crisis, it has for some time been working in his system, and has at last burst out and laid him low. So the sin of departing from God, and secretly declining, has been going on while the profession has still been maintained—the process of backsliding has been working silently, yet surely, until a temptation has at last opened the way for its bursting forth, to the scandal of God's people and true religion. "He that despiseth small things shall fall by little and little." In the sight of God the man was fallen before, we only now have first discovered it.

—Salter, 1840.

3. Is most frequently due to indulgence in little sins.

(429.) There is many a man who evinces, for a time, a steadfast attention to religion, walking with all care in the path of God's commandments, &c., but who, after awhile, declines from spirituality, and is dead, though he may yet have a name to live. But how does it commonly happen that such a man falls away from the struggle for salvation? Is it ordinarily through some one powerful and undisguised assault that he is turned from the faith, or over one huge obstacle that he falls not to rise again? Not so. It is almost invariably through little things. He fails to take notice of little things, and they accumulate into great. He allows himself in little things, and thus forms a strong habit. He relaxes in little things, and thus in time loosens every bond. Because it is a little thing, he counts it of little moment, utterly forgetting that millions are made up of units, that immensity is constituted of atoms. Because it is only a stone, a pebble, against which his foot strikes, he makes light of the hindrance; not caring that he is contracting a habit of stumbling, or of observing that whenever he trips there must be some diminution in the speed with which he runs the way of God's commandments, and that, however slowly, these diminutions are certainly bringing him to a stand.

The astronomer tells us, that, because they move in a resisting medium, which perhaps in a million of years destroys the millionth part of their velocity, the heavenly bodies will at length cease from their mighty march. May not, then, the theologian assure us that little roughness in the way, each retarding us, though in an imperceptible degree, will eventually destroy the onward movement, however vigorous and directed it may at one time have seemed? Would to God that we could persuade you of the peril of little offences! We are not half as much afraid of your hurting the head against a rock, as of your hurting the foot against a stone. There is a sort of continued attrition, resulting from our necessary intercourse with the world, which of itself deadens the movements of the soul; there is, moreover, a continued temptation to yield in little points, under the notion of conciliating; to indulge in little things, to forego little strictnesses, to omit little duties; and all with the idea that what looks so light cannot be of real moment. And by these littles, thousands, tens of thousands, perish. If they do not come actually and openly to a stand, they stumble and stumble on, getting more and more careless, nearer and nearer to indifference, lowering the Christian standards, suffering religion to be peeled away by inches, persuading themselves that they can spare without injury such inconsiderable bits, and not perceiving that in stripping the bark they stop the sap.

—Melville, 1798-1871.

BEAUTY.

1. NATURAL BEAUTY.

1. A revelation of God.

(430.) We cannot look round us without being struck by the surprising variety and multiplicity of the sources of beauty of creation, produced by form, or by colour, or by both united. It is scarcely too much to say, that every object in nature, animate or inanimate, is in some manner beautiful: so largely has the Creator provided for our pleasures through the sense of sight. It is one of the revelations which the Creator has made of Himself to man. He was to be admired and loved: it was through the demonstrations of His character that we could alone see Him and judge of Him: and in thus inducing or compelling us to admire and love the visible works of His hand, He has taught us to love and adore Himself.

—Macculloch, 1773.

(431.) Never lose an opportunity of seeing anything beautiful. Beauty is God's handwriting—a wayside sacrament; welcome it in every fair face, every fair sky, every fair flower, and thank Him earnestly with your eyes. It is a charming draught, a cup of blessing.

2. The love of beauty.

—Lord Clarendon, 1608-1613.

3. Its moral uses.

powers? And if the beautiful is an educator; if it makes a man diviner, richer, sweeter; if at every point where he touches men it augments the volume of his moral influence; if it makes him a more potential advocate of truth in the world, then indulgence in it is part and parcel of that education which qualifies him to be most useful among his fellow-men.

Here is a man of the olden time that is about to go down to battle; and his Christian friends and associates say to him, "How can you waste your means in buying your helmet, and corselet, and arm-plates? How can you spend so much money for your sword and spear?" Why, his power as a warrior lies in these things. And a man that goes into life with all forms of coarseness, and selfishness, and wickedness, is like a warrior that goes into battle without his sword, and spear, and helmet, and corselets, and arm-plates; and what he acquires from books, from works of art, from his contact with the higher influences that surround him, fit him for a better discharge of the duties which devolve upon him; and his power to do good is to be measured by the amount that he has in him, as a result of the education which he has received by reason of these things. And if it is said, "How can you, while the whole world is lying in wickedness, indulge in beauty?" I say, The world being in wickedness, I am going to educate myself in beauty, that I may be the better fitted to elevate it out of that wickedness. The beautiful is one of the elements with which I am to familiarise myself, in order that I may the more successfully engage in this work. God educates men for labouring in His kingdom on earth by spreading out before them the beauties which He has created in the natural world. The beautiful, therefore, may be made a moral instructor, and it may make the soul of man powerful; so that indulgence in it, instead of being selfish, is a part of one's lawful education. —Becher.

II. PERSONAL BEAUTY.

1. Overrated.

(434.) I cannot understand the importance which certain people set upon outward beauty or plainness. I am of opinion that all true education, such at least as has a religious foundation, must infuse a noble calm, a wholesome coldness, an indifference, or whatever people may call it, towards such-like outward gifts, or the want of them. And who has not experienced of how little consequence they are in fact for the weal or woe of life? Who has not experienced how, on nearer acquaintance, plainness becomes beautified, and beauty loses its charm, exactly according to the quality of the heart and mind? And from this cause am I of opinion that the want of outward beauty never disquiets a noble nature or will be regarded as a misfortune. It never can prevent people from being amiable and beloved in the highest degree; and we have daily proof of this. —Frederika Bremer.

2. Not in itself a matter for pride.

(435.) Is it beauty that you are proud of? I have told you what sickness and death will do to that oefore. "When God rebuketh man for sin, He maketh his beauty to consume away as a moth; surely every man is vanity." And if your beauty would continue, how little good will it do you? and who but fools do look at the skin of a rational creature, when they would discern its worth? a fool, and a slave of lust, and Satan, may be beautiful. A sepulchre may be gilded that hath rottenness within. Will you choose the finest purse, or the fullest? Who but a child or a fool will value his book by the fineness of the cover, or gilding of the leaves; and not by the worth of the matter within? Absalom was beautiful, and what the better was he? "Favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain; but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised." —Baxter, 1615-1691.

3. Mere physical beauty is morally worthless.

(436.) A beautiful person without true grace, is but a fair stinking weed; you know the best of such a one, if you look on him furthest off; whereas a sincere heart, without this outward beauty to commend it, is like some sweet flower (not painted with such fine colours on the leaves) better in the hand than eye, to smell on, than look on; the nearer you come to the sincere soul, the better you find him. Outward uncomeliness to true grace, is but as some old mean buildings you sometimes see stand before a goodly stately house, which hide its glory only from the traveller that passeth by at some distance; but he that comes in, sees its beauty, and admires it. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

4. Transitory.

(437.) Beauty, what is it, but a dash of nature's tincture laid upon the skin, which is soon washed off with a little sickness? what, but a fair blossom which, with one hot sun-gleam, weltereth and falls? —Hall, 1574-1656.

BELIEF.

1. On what ground is it to rest?

(438.) If the opinions of others whom we think well of be a ground of assent, men have reason to be Heathens in Japan, Mahometans in Turkey, Papists in Spain, and Protestants in England. —Locke, 1632-1704.

2. By what it is determined.

(439.) It seems to be a law of the intellect, that belief necessarily follows the preponderance of apprehended proof, as the scale falls in which the weight is greatest. We can no more refuse to believe what is proved, or believe what is destitute of apparent proof, than the eye can reject or change the forms and colours thrown by external objects on the retina. —Jackson.

3. We are responsible for our belief.

(440.) Human consciousness, the judgment of mankind, and God, in all we know of Him, hold man responsible for his belief. Every man has within him an indestructible conviction of possessing a power over his opinions, and a sense of responsibility in reference to his beliefs. All men avow a readiness to change their opinions whenever they are furnished with a sufficient reason for so doing, and this avowal clearly implies the conviction on their part of a power in them to do so. As a matter of fact, all men are very sensitive about the light in which their opinions are regarded by others. They are ever ready to show dissatisfaction when charged with holding unworthy and erroneous opinions, and are prone to resent all such charges.

And why this displeasure and resentment if men are not conscious of possessing a power over their beliefs? An individual may wish to possess a different size of body or colour of skin, but he is not conscious of possessing a power over them as he knows he possesses over his opinions and beliefs. If an individual's colour or size subjects him to disadvantage, he feels the defects; but instead of expecting blame on account of the defects, he is rather an object of sympathy. But man does take shame to himself when charged with unworthy beliefs. —Cooper.

4. Importance of a correct belief.

(441.) Mind and heart will meet, though forbidden, like hidden lovers. —Bailey.

(442.) Does it make no difference what a man believes in respect to the character of God, the nature of the Divine government in this world, its claims upon us, and our obligations under it?

If a man believes that God sits above, indifferent to the affairs of this life and too quiescent to attend to the little disturbances of sin, and that He overlooks transgression, that man must inevitably come to a state of moral indifference. But if a man believes that God cannot possibly look upon sin with allowance, that He abhors iniquity, and that, unless we turn from our wicked ways, He will lay His hands on His sword, and set Himself forth as the maintainer of law, and justice, and integrity, that man cannot help being morally solicitous. Does it make no difference what a man believes on these subjects?

Go into New York, and in the sixth ward you will find two representative men, one says, "I voted for the judge, and helped to put him where he is, and he will wink at my crimes. I can drink as much as I please, on Sundays and on week-days, and he will not disturb me. He is easy and good-natured, and he is not going to be hard with me if I do break the laws a little." And the man, because he believes that the judge does not care for his wickedness, and will not punish him, grows bold and corrupt in transgression. But at length he is arraigned, he is brought before the court, and he finds there, instead of the bribed judge, a white-faced man—not red-faced; one of those men with a long head upward—not backward and downward; a man with a full sense of the value of justice and truth. The culprit begins his shuffling excuses. The justice listens to none of them; he reads the law, and says, "Your conduct is herein condemned," and sends him away to receive his just deserts. When the man has expiated his crime, he goes around in the same ward, and says, "You must walk straight hereafter. The judge that sits on the bench now is not the jolly old judge that used to sit there. If you go before him he will make you smart." Does it not make a difference what a man believes about a judge? If he believes that he is a lenient, conniving judge, does it not make him careless? and if he believes that he is a straightforward, just judge, does it not make him afraid of transgression?

Now lift up the judge's bench, and make it the judgment-seat; and take out the human judge, and put God Almighty there. If men believe Him to be an all-smiling God—a God all sunshine; an all-sympathising God—a God who is nothing but kindness, goodness, and gentleness, they say to themselves, "We will do as we have a mind to do."

Take away that miserable slander upon the revealed character of God, and lift up the august front of Justice, on whose brow love proudly sits, and let men see that there is a vast heart of love and gentleness indeed, but one that will by no means clear the guilty, and they will take more heed to their conduct. Does it, then, make no difference what a man believes about God's nature, and His manner of dealing with men? It makes all the difference between laxity and earnestness, between an endeavour to live truly and no endeavour at all in that direction; between right and wrong conduct.

Let us, then, look at this a little in the light of the experience of men in this world. In regard to the truths of the physical economy of the globe, does it make any difference what a man believes? Would it make any difference to a machinist whether he thought lead was as good for tools as steel? Would it make any difference to a man in respect to the industries of life if he thought that a triar gle was as good as a circular wheel in machinery? In respect to the quality of substance, the forms of substances, the combination of substances, and the nature of motive powers, does success depend upon sincere believing or on right believing? Suppose a man should think that it made no difference what he believed, and should say to himself, "I wish to raise corn, but I have not the seed; so I will take some ashes and plant them; and I believe sincerely that they are as good as corn"—would he have a crop of corn? What would his sincerity avail? The more sincere he was the worse it would be for him; for if he were not sincere he might slip away and get a little corn, and plant that. In all material things, the more sincere you are, if you are right, the better; but the more sincere you are if you are wrong, the worse. In the latter case, sincerity is the mallet that drives home the mischief.

How is it in respect to commercial matters? Just now a great many are manufacturing things for the army. Does it make no difference whether a man thinks that corn-stalks and sticks are as good as muskets? Does it make no difference whether a man thinks that cotton and wool; dust and sweepings, are as good for blankets as real wool? Does it make no difference with the sale of man's goods, whether they are manufactured of one material or another? If a business man believes right in respect to his business, he prospers; and if he believes wrong he does not prosper.

How is it in respect to navigation? Does any man say, "I have my own theories about astronomy, and I will sail my ship according to them? I do not believe the talk of the books on this subject; and it does not make much difference what a man believes respecting it." Does it make no difference what a man believes about charts? Suppose the shipmaster should say, "I know the chart says that here are three fathoms of water, that here are two, and that here is one, but I do not believe it; I know that my ship draws sixteen feet of water, but I believe that I can run it over a twelve-foot bar"—does it make no difference what he believes? It makes all the difference between shipwreck and safety.

Throughout the whole realm of physical truth, a man is bound to believe, not only sincerely, but correctly. In business, in manufacturing, in navigation, in all things that relate to the conduct of men in secular affairs, men must be right—not merely sincere.

Take one thing further. There are affectional and social truths. Does it make no difference what a man believes in respect to these? Is there no difference between pride, vanity, and selfishness, on the one hand, and tenderness, sympathy, and love, on the other? If a man has social intercourse, does it make no difference what view he takes of these things? Will it make no difference with his conduct if he thinks that pride and love are about the same thing, and that one is a proper substitute for the other? His sincerity makes the mischief worse, in such a case.

It is only when we come to moral grounds that men begin to urge this maxim with any considerable degree of confidence. They reject it in its application to material truths, to physical sciences, to business, to social intercourse in life, and hold the necessity of correct belief. It is not until they come to religious truths that men begin to say, "It does not make much difference what a man believes."

Let us take the lower forms of moral truth, and see if it is so in our daily intercourse. You go to church, and hear your minister preach about the necessity of believing certain great doctrines, and on your way home you say, "It is not of so much importance what a man believes, if he is only sincere in it." When you get home, you find that there is an altercation between the boy and the nurse. There is a lie between them somewhere. And the child calls back your theory, and says, in respect to the wrongfulness of lying, "Father, I do not think it makes much difference what one believes, if he is only sincere." What do you think about this theory now?

You are bringing up your children. You can bring them up to believe in truth and honesty, or otherwise. Do you not desire to bring them up to believe that honesty is the best policy? Do you not desire to bring them up to believe that purity stands connected with their prosperity in after life? Do you not feel the greatest solicitude about the teaching of their minds? Are you not determined that they shall be brought up to distinguish between truth and lies, honour and dishonour, purity and impurity, nobleness and vulgarity? How particular you are when it is moral truth applied to the reasoning of your children! How long would you keep a schoolmaster or a schoolmistress in a common school or an academy who held, in respect to these subjects, as you hold in respect to religious matters, that it does not make any difference what a person believes?

As it is with the lower forms of moral truth, so experience teaches us it is with the higher forms of moral truth. There is a definite and heaven-appointed connection between the things a man holds to be true, and the results that follow in that man's mind.

All truths are not indeed alike important, and all truths do not show the effects of being believed or rejected with equal rapidity. There are many truths which bear such a relation to our everyday life, that the fruit of believing or rejecting appears almost at once. These are spring truths, that come up and bear fruit early in the season. There are other truths that require time for working out their results. They are summer truths, and the fruit of belief or disbelief does not ripen till July or August. Other truths, in respect to showing the results of belief or disbelief, are like late autumnal fruits, that require the whole winter to develop their proper juices. But in these last the connection is just as certain, although it is longer in making itself appear, as in the first, where the distance between cause and effect is shortest and the development is most rapid.

—Becher.

5. As a matter of fact, our destiny depends on the correctness of our belief.

(443.) There is the way of salvation, and thou must trust Christ or perish; and there is nothing hard in it that thou shouldst perish if thou dost not. Here is a man out at sea; he has got a chart, and that chart, if well studied, will, with the help of the compass, guide him to his journey's end. The pole-star gleams out amidst the cloud-rifts, and that, too, will help him. "No," says he, "I will have nothing to do with your stars; I do not believe in the North Pole; I shall not attend to that little thing inside the box; one needle is as good as another needle; I do not believe in your rubbish, and I will have nothing to do with it; it is only a lot of nonsense got up by people on purpose to make money, and I will have nothing to do with it." The man does not get to shore anywhere; he drifts about, but never reaches port, and he says it is a very hard thing, a very hard thing. I do not think so. So some of you say, "Well I am not going to read your Bible; I am not going to listen to your talk about Jesus Christ; I do not believe in such things." You will be damned, then, sir! "That's very hard," say you. No, it is not. It is not more so than the fact that if you reject the compass and the pole-star you will not get to your journey's end. If a man will not do the thing that is necessary to a certain end I do not see how he can expect to gain that end. You have taken poison, and the physician brings an antidote, and says, "Take it quickly, or you will die; but if you take it quickly, I will guarantee that the poison will be neutralised." But you say, "No, doctor, I do not believe it; let everything take its course; let every tub stand on its own bottom; I will have nothing to do with you, doctor." "Well, sir, you will die, and when the coroner's inquest is held on your body, the verdict will be, 'Served him right!'" So will it be with you if, having heard the gospel of Jesus Christ, you say, "Oh! pooh-pooh! I am too much of a common-sense man to have anything to do with that, and I shall not attend to it." Then, when you perish, the verdict given by your conscience, which will sit upon the King's quest at last, will be a verdict of "Felo-de-se"—"he destroyed himself." So says the old Book—"O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself!" —Spurgeon.

BENEFICENCE.

1. Our duty.

(444.) The sun shines on the moon and stars, and they shine upon the earth; so doth God shine in goodness upon us, that we might shine in our extensions of goodness unto others, especially unto them of the household of faith. —Sidles, 1577-1635.

(445.) Faith, though it hath sometimes a trembling hand, it must not have a withered hand, but must stretch. —Watson, 1696.

2. God's rules for its exercise.

(446.) The measures that God marks out to thy charity are these: thy superfluities must give place to thy neighbour's great convenience; thy convenience must yield to thy neighbour's necessity ; and, lastly, thy very necessities must yield to thy neighbour's extremity.

—South, 1633-1716.

2. Its distastefulness to the insincere.

(447.) When men meet together at a tavern to drink or feast together, Nappy is that man, when the reckoning is brought, that can be rid of his money first : "I'll pay," says one ; "I'll pay," says another ; "You shall not pay a penny," says a third, "I'll pay all," &c. ; and so it grows sometimes near unto a quarrel, because one man cannot spend his money before another. Thus in merry-making, but come to a work of mercy, how is it then ? Is the money upon the table ? Is every man ready to throw down, and make it a leading case to the rest of the company ? No such matter ; one puts it off to another : "Alas ! I am in debt," says one ; "I have no money about me," says another ; then every finger is a thumb, and it is such a while before anything will be got out, that it would trouble any one to behold it. Then the question is not who shall be first, but who shall be last. A sad thing that, in way of courtesy, any man should be thus free, and when it comes to a work of mercy, thus bound up.
—Harris, 1578-1658.

(448.) Two pious sisters, Desire and Prayer, one day visited a certain personage by the name of Pocket.

The same was a member of a large and influential family of Pockets ; some of whom were of a most generous disposition, free in giving and liberal in every good cause that sought support ; whilst some others were remarkable for their narrowness of mind, and therefore indispotion toward any charity, however worthy, that asked for aid.

After a little conversation on general subjects, Prayer remarked on the interest she took in the state of the poor heathen, "perishing for lack of knowledge."

"Oh, that they might be saved !" breathed Desire.

"AMEN," said Pocket.

"I am longing for the day when 'the knowledge of our Lord shall cover the earth, as the waters cover the sea'" (Isa. ix. 9 ; Habk. ii. 14) ; remarked Desire with much fervency.

"Amen," said Pocket.

"And, seeing such glorious time will come, I felt encouraged to ask the King so to order events as to open the way in such direction," remarked Prayer.

"Amen," said Pocket.

"I have begged of the King to hear our daily petition, 'THY KINGDOM COME'" (Matt. xi. 10), said Prayer.

"Amen," said Pocket.

"It is promised, that through the Gospel, the Lord Jesus Christ 'shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth'" (Ps. lxxii. 8), observed Desire.

"Amen," said Pocket.

"How is it to be brought to pass?" asked Prayer ; to which Desire replied, "By the blessing of God on the united efforts of the Church, and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit ;—Oh, that the day were come !"

"Amen," said Pocket.

"Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession'" (Ps. li. 8), said Desire, in the words of promise unto Prayer.

"Amen," said Pocket.

"God alone can effect this mercy," said Desire ; "and that He may bless His Word preached to the perishing, in order 'that they may be saved,' we must send them men after God's own heart."

"Amen," said Pocket.

"Which good servants of the Lord must be sustained in their great work," observed Desire.

"Amen," said Pocket.

"They are men subject to human infirmities ; who require habitations ; who hunger and thirst, and need food and raiment : and I trust warm hearts and liberal friends will be found to administer according to their wants ; knowing 'the labourer is worthy of his hire'" (Luke x. 7).

"Amen," said Pocket.

"We are to-day making calls on the Benevolent to aid in this glorious work of the WORLD'S EVANGELISATION," remarked Desire and Prayer.

"Amen," said Pocket.

"We have therefore come to ask your contribution for the spread of the Gospel, the salvation of the heathen, and the glory of the Redeemer," said Desire.

"AHEN !" said Pocket.

"The work cannot be carried on without money," observed Desire.

No reply from Pocket.

"What amount shall we say for you, sir?" asked Desire very sweetly.

No answer from Pocket.

"You said Amen just now to all our matters of petition," remarked Desire and Prayer together. "The best proof of your love to the cause is in cheerfully assisting its support, and therefore giving as the Lord in His mercy has prospered yourself."

"Cannot afford it, really," at last Pocket answered, very anxious to get rid of his visitors.

"Then after all you wish us to understand, you leave the Lord's cause to the support of others, and to excuse yourself?"

"AMEN," said Pocket.

—Bowden.

3. Its wisdom.

(449.) It is a base thing to get goods to keep them. I see that God, who only is infinitely rich, holdeth nothing in His own hands, but gives all to His creatures. But, if we will needs lay up, where should we rather repose it, than in Christ's treasury ? The poor man's hand is the treasury of Christ. All my superfluity shall be there hoarded up, where I know it shall be safely kept, and surely returned me.
—Hall, 1574-1656.

(450.) The world teacheth me that it is madness to leave behind me those goods that I may carry with me. Christianity teacheth me that what I charitably give alive, I carry with me dead ; and experience teacheth me that what I leave behind, I lose. I will carry that treasure with me by giving it, which the worldling loseth by keeping it ; so, while his corpse shall carry nothing but a winding cloth to his grave, I shall be richer under the earth than I was above it.
—Hall, 1574-1656.

4. Its rewards.

(451.) To dispense our wealth liberally, is the best way to preserve it, and to continue masters thereof; what we give is not thrown away, but saved from danger; while we detain it at home (as it seems to us) it really is abroad, and at adventures; it is out at sea, sailing perilously in storms, near rocks and shelves, amongst pirates; nor can it ever be safe till it is brought into this port, or insured this way: when we have bestowed it on the poor, then we have lodged it in unquestionable safety; in a place where no rapine, no deceit, no mishap, no corruption can ever by any means come at it. All our doors and bars, all our forces and guards, all the circumspection and vigilancy we can use are no defence or security at all in comparison to this disposal thereof: the poor man's stomach is a granary for our corn which never can be exhausted; the poor man's back is a wardrobe for our clothes which never can be pillaged; the poor man's pocket is a bank for our money which never can disappoint or deceive us; all the rich traders in the world may decay and break; but the poor man can never fail, except God Himself turn bankrupt; for what we give to the poor we deliver and intrust in His hands, out of which no force can wring it, no craft can filch it; it is laid up in heaven, whither no thief can climb, and where no moth or rust do abide. In spite of all the fortune, of all the might, of all the malice in the world, the liberal man will ever be rich, for God's providence is his estate; God's wisdom and power are his defence; God's love and favour are his reward; God's Word is his assurance; who hath said it, that "He which giveth to the poor shall not lack," no vicissitude therefore of things can surprise Him, or find Him unfurnished; no disaster can impoverish Him; no adversity can overwhelm Him; He hath a certain reserve against all times and occasions; he that "denieth liberal things, by liberal things shall he stand."

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

(452.) You remember how, in the old legend, St. Brandan in his northward voyage saw a man sitting on an iceberg, and with horror recognised him to be the traitor Judas; and the traitor told him how, at Christmas time, amid the drench of the burning lake, an angel had touched his arm and bidden him one hour to cool his agony on an iceberg in the Arctic sea; and when he asked the cause of this mercy bade him recognise in him the leper to whom he gave a cloak for shelter from the wind in Joppa, and how for that kind deed this respite was allotted him. Let us reject the ghastly side of the legend and accept its truth, that charity is better than all burnt-offering and sacrifice.

—F. W. Farrar.

(453.) About twenty-five years ago, a young man from the State of Kentucky took a horse-back ride to Virginia where his father came from, and on his way he met a man and his family moving West, so poor that they were almost reduced to starvation. He had compassion on the wretched group and gave them a twenty-dollar bill with which to reach their journey's end. In about fifteen years the young man received a letter from the man he had befriended, saying he was now a prosperous merchant in Southern Kentucky, and enclosing a twenty-dollar bill to repay his loan. After another ten years, which included the great rebellion and its termination, he was elected to the lower house of Kentucky Legislature, and being a man of talent and influence, was chosen Speaker, during the contest for which, he had noticed that a stranger and one of the other party, was his strongest supporter. His curiosity was aroused by this, and he asked the man's motive, as he never had to his knowledge seen him before. "Sir," replied the member, "you will recall, when I mention it, a little scene that occurred when you were a boy on your way to Virginia. It was you who saved my wife from starvation. She has told me time and again that never did a morsel of food taste so sweet—so utterly delicious—as that you gave her then. She was but six years old at that time, but when she saw your name, during the late canvass, among the prominent probable candidates for the speakership, she laid down the law as to how I was to vote. This is all. Neither she nor her father and mother, brothers and sisters, nor myself, can ever forget you."

5. Beneficence toward man is true gratitude to God.

(454.) "Charge them that are rich in the world that they do good, that they be rich in good works." The poor man is, as it were, an altar; if we bring our alms and lay upon it, with such sacrifices God is well pleased.

—Watson, 1696.

(455.) A rich youth in Rome was suffering from a dangerous illness; at length he recovered, and regained his health. Then he went for the first time into the garden, feeling, as it were, born again; and he was full of joy, and praised God with a loud voice. He turned his face to heaven and said: "O Thou all-sufficient Creator, could man recompense Thee, how willingly would I give Thee all my possessions!"

Hermas, who was called the herdman, heard this, and said to the rich youth: "All good gifts come from above; thither thou canst send nothing. Come, follow me."

The youth followed the pious old man, who took him to a dark hut, where was nothing but misery and wretchedness. The father was stretched on a bed of sickness, the mother wept, the children were destitute of clothing, and crying for bread.

The youth was deeply touched. Hermas said: "See here an altar for thy sacrifice. See here the Lord's brethren and representatives."

Then the rich youth assisted them bountifully, and provided for the sick man's wants. And the poor people blessed him, and called him an angel of God.

Hermas smiled, and said: "Thus turn always thy grateful countenance first to heaven and then to earth."

—F. A. Krummacher.

6. It should be wisely directed.

(456.) There is perhaps no one quality that can produce a greater amount of mischief than may be done by thoughtless good-nature. For instance, if any one out of tenderness of heart and reluctance to punish, or to discard the criminal and worthless, lets loose on society, or advances to important offices, mischievous characters, he will have a doubtful benefit on a few, and do incalculable hurt to thousands. So also, to take one of the commonest and most obvious cases, that of charity to the poor,—a man of great wealth, by freely relieving all idle vagabonds, might go far towards ruining the industry, and the morality, and the prosperity, of a whole nation. "For there can be no doubt that careless, indiscriminate alms-giving does far more harm than good ; since it encourages idleness and improvidence, and also imposture. If you give freely to ragged and filthy street beggars, you are in fact luring people to dress themselves in filthy rags, and go about begging with fictitious tales of distress. If, on the contrary, you carefully inquire for and relieve honest and industrious persons who have fallen into distress through unavoidable misfortune, you are not only doing good to those objects, but also holding out an encouragement generally to honest industry.

"You may, however, meet with persons who say, 'As long as it is my intention to relieve real distress, my charity is equally virtuous, though the tale told me be a false one. The impostor alone is to be blamed who told it me ; I acted on what he said ; and if that is untrue, the fault is his, and not mine.'

"Now this is a fair plea, if any one is deceived after making careful inquiry : " but if he has not taken the trouble to do this, regarding it as no concern of his, you might ask him how he would act and judge in a case where he is thoroughly in earnest—that is, where his own interest is concerned. Suppose he employed a steward or other agent to buy for him a house, or a horse, or any other article, and this agent paid an exorbitant price for what was really worth little or nothing, giving just the same kind of excuse for allowing his employer to be thus cheated ; saying, "I made no careful inquiries, but took the seller's word ; " the employer would doubtless reply, "The seller indeed is to be condemned for cheating ; but so you are, for your carelessness in my interests. His being greatly in fault does not clear you ; and your merely intending to do what was right, is no excuse for your not taking pains to gain right information."

Now on such a principle we ought to act in our charities ; regarding ourselves as stewards of all that Providence has bestowed, and as bound to expend it in the best way possible, and not shelter our own faulty negligence under the misconduct of another.

It is now generally acknowledged that relief afforded to want, as mere want, tends to increase that want ; while the relief afforded to the sick, the infirm, and the disabled, has plainly no tendency to multiply its own objects. Now it is remarkable, that the Lord Jesus employed His miraculous power in healing the sick continually, but in feeding the hungry only twice ; while the power of multiplying food which He then manifested, as well as His directing the disciples to take care and gather up the fragments that remained that nothing might be lost, served to mark that the abstaining from any like procedure on other occasions was a deliberate design. In this, besides other objects, our Lord had probably in view to afford us some instruction, from this example, as to the mode of our charity. Certain it is, that the reasons for this distinction are now, and ever must be, the same as at that time. Now to those engaged in that important and inexhaustible subject of inquiry, the internal evidences of Christianity, it will be interesting to observe here one of the instances in which the superhuman wisdom of Jesus forestalled the discovery of an important principle, often overlooked, not only by the generality of men, but by the most experienced statesmen and the ablest philosophers, even in these later ages of extended human knowledge, and development of mental power.

(457.) Nothing seems much clearer than the natural direction of charity. Would we all but relieve, according to the measure of our means, those objects immediately within the range of our personal knowledge, how much of the worst evil of poverty might be alleviated ! Very poor people, who are known to us to have been decent, honest, and industrious, when industry was in their power, have a claim on us, founded on our knowledge, and on vicinity and neighbourhood, which have in themselves something sacred and endearing to every good heart. One cannot, surely, always pass by, in his walks for health, restoration, or delight, the lone wayside beggar, without occasionally giving him an alms. Old, care-worn, pale, drooping, and emaciated creatures, who pass us by without looking beseechingly at us, or even lifting up their eyes from the ground, cannot often be met with without exciting an interest in us for their silent and unobtrusive sufferings or privations. A hovel here and there round and about our own comfortable dwelling, attracts our eyes by some peculiar appearance of penury, and we look in, now and then, upon its inmates, cheering their cold gloom with some small benefaction. These are duties all men owe to distress : they are easily discharged ; and even such tender mercies are twice blessed.

—Chalmers, 1780-1847.

7. Should be prompt.

(458.) The benevolent Dr. Wilson, Bishop of Sodor and Man, once discovered a clergyman at Bath, who, he was informed, was ill, poor, and had a numerous family. In the evening he gave a friend £50, requesting that he would deliver it in the most delicate manner, and as from an unknown person. The friend replied :—"I will wait upon him early in the morning." "You will oblige me by calling directly," requested the kind-hearted prelate ; "think, sir, of what importance a good night's rest may be to the poor man."

8. Should not be ashamed or afraid to stoop.

(459.) In another walk he saw a poor man with a poorer horse, that was fallen under his load ; they were both in distress, and needed present help, which Mr. Herbert perceiving, put off his canonical coat and helped the poor man to unload, and after to load his horse. The poor man blessed him for it ; and he blessed the poor man ; and was so like the good Samaritan, that he gave him money to refresh both himself and his horse ; and told him that "if he loved himself, he should be merciful to his beast." Thus he left the poor man, and at his coming to the musical friends at Salisbury, they began to wonder that Mr. George Herbert, who used to be so trim and neat, came into that company so soiled and discomposed ; but he told them the occasion ; and when one of the company told him, "he had disparaged himself by so dirty an employment," his answer was, that "the thought of what he had done would prove music to him at midnight, and that the omission of it would have upraised and made discord in his conscience, whensoever he should pass by that place ; for if I be bound to pray for all that are in distress, I am sure that I am bound, so far as it is in my power, to practise what I pray for. And though I do not wish for the like occasion every day, yet, let me tell you, I would not willingly pass one day of my life without comforting a sad soul or showing mercy ; and I praise God for this occasion. And now let us tune our instruments." —Isaak Walton's Life of Herbert.

9. Should be unostentatious.

(460.) Those ostentatious benefactors that, like to hens which cannot lay an egg but they must cackle straight, give no alms but with trumpets, lose their thanks with God. Alms should be like oil, which, though it swim aloft when it is fallen, yet makes no noise in the falling; not like water, that still sounds where it lights.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(461.) Charity and fine dressing are very different things; but if men give alms for the same reasons that others dress fine, only to be seen and admired, charity is then but like the vanity of fine clothes.

—E. Cook.

10. True beneficence is unconscious of its rarity and worth.

(462.) It was a cold and severe winter. The little Minna, the only daughter of charitable parents, collected the crumbs and small pieces of bread, and kept them carefully. Twice a day she went into the garden, scattering the crumbs; and the birds came and picked them up; but the little girl's hands trembled with cold in the bitter air.

The parents watched her, and were glad at the lovely sight, and said: "Why are you doing that, Minna?"

"All is covered with ice and snow," answered Minna; "the little creatures cannot find anything; they are poor now. Therefore I feed them, as the rich people help and assist the poor."

Then the father said: "But you cannot provide for them all."

Little Minna answered: "Do not all children in the world do as I do, even as all rich men take care of the poor?"

Then the father looked at the mother of the little maiden, and said: "Oh, holy innocence!"

—F. A. Krummacher.

11. Is not to be restrained by ingratitude.

(463.) There are many who feel for the poor. They would gladly relieve their wants. They are pained to see these wretched mothers, and yet more wretched children; but having found their charity often misapplied and thrown away on the unworthy and ungrateful, they are afraid to give; and not seldom tempted, on discovering how they have been imposed upon, to say in their haste as David did his, All men are liars! But if charity often fails in its object, so do other things. The sun shines on many a fair blossom that never turns into fruit, and the clouds pour their bounties on fields that yield no harvest. But to leave figures for facts. Education as well as charity often fails: it is but a small portion of children that become ripe scholars. Moral training fails; how many parents, besides David, have had their hearts wounded and torn by wicked children! The labours of husbandry fail; it is but a proportion of the seed that springs; and a still less proportion that, reaching maturity, in golden sheaves rewards the farmer's toil. Physic fails; diseases rage, and patients die in spite of it. Even the pulpit fails; but what preacher thinks of abandoning it, because many of his sermons do no good; nay, like absurd charity, do positive harm—hardening those they fail to soften, and making people as indifferent to the most solemn things as a hoary sexton to the mouldering remnants of mortality; the skulls he tosses out of the grave.

Man is answerable for duty; but not for results. And as with faith in a promised blessing, we are always to preach, in season and out of season, to sow beside all waters, you are never to cease your charities. Let not the cold ingratitude of other hearts freeze your own.

—Guthrie.

12. The shame and guilt of abusing it.

(464.) An Arab possessed a horse so famous far and near for its beauty, gentleness, and matchless speed, that he had many tempting offers to part with her. He refused them all, and, in particular, the repeated solicitations of one who offered an enormous price. One day, as, with head wrapt in mantle and lance at rest, he was pressing homewards through the burning desert, his horse suddenly started; and there, right across the path, lay a poor traveller—alive, for he groaned; but exhausted, and apparently at the point of death. Like the good Samaritan—for, though fierce, these wild Bedouins have savage virtues, are hospitable and friendly—he dismounted, and finding the unfortunate traveller unable to walk or even to stand, set him on his own saddle. No sooner done than, as if the vigour of the steed had been imparted to its rider, the bowed and languid form became instantly erect; the horse suddenly wheeled round, sprang off to the stroke, and a laugh of triumph revealed the trick. The man who had offered him an enormous price for the horse was on her back. Assuming the guise of distress, he had taken advantage of the other's generous feelings, to steal what he could not buy. The injured man did not curse him; nor, fortified by the stoicism which the Mohammedans' belief in fate imparts, merely bowed his head to the misfortune. He soared above it to a height of moral grandeur which few reach. Calling on the other to halt, he said that he had one favour to ask; it was this, that he would never tell how he had won the horse, because, were that known, it might hinder some from receiving help in circumstances of danger not feigned, but real—and so doom the unfortunate to perish. It is but justice to human nature to add—what indeed shows that fine feelings may lie dormant in the worst of men—that the other was so touched by the unselfishness and nobility of this appeal, that he relented; and, riding up to the man he had wronged, gave him back his horse.

BENEVOLENCE.

1. Is a characteristic of every true Christian.

(465.) I do not believe in Christianity that is not Christ-like; and I no more believe in a profession of piety which is not associated with His pity than in a sun that sheds no light, in a fire that gives out no heat, in a rose that breathes no perfume; they are mere painting; life-like, but dead; clever, but cold. People may talk of such and such a man being godly; but none are godly but the god-like, God is the "Judge of the widow, and the Father of the fatherless in His holy habitation;" and he only is godlike who stands to widows in the room of the dead, and in whom orphans find both a father and a friend.

—Guthrie.

2. Must show itself in actions.

(466.) We read in our chronicles of king Oswald, that as he sat at table, when a fair silver dish full of regal delicacies was set before him, and he ready to fall to, hearing from his almoner that there were great store of poor at his gates, piteously crying out for some relief, did not fill them with words, as, "God help them!" "God relieve them!" "God comfort them!" &c., but commanded his steward presently to take the dish off the table and distribute the meat, then beat the dish all in pieces, and cast it among them. This was true charity. Words, be they never so adorned, clothe not the naked; be they never so delicate, feed not the hungry; be they never so zealous, warm not him that is starved with cold; be they never so oily, cure not the wounded; be they never so free, set not them free that are bound, visit not the sick or imprisoned.

—Holdsworth, 1630.

2. Posthumous benevolence.

(467.) What we employ in charitable uses during our lives is given away from ourselves: what we bequeath at our death is given from others only, as our nearest relations.

—Atterbury, 1662-1732.

BEREAVEMENT.

I. IS A COMMON EXPERIENCE.

(468.) Some time after Kisagotami gave birth to a son, but when the child was able to walk he died. The young girl went from house to house with the dead child in her bosom, asking for medicine, and they said she was mad; but a wise man said, "I cannot give you medicine; Buddha can."

So Kisagotami went to Buddha, and said, "Do you know any medicine that will be good for my boy?"

Buddha replied, "I do."

"And what do you require?"

"I want a handful of mustard-seed; but it must be taken from some house where no son, parent, husband, or slave has ever died."

The girl went, carrying the dead child on her hip, asking everywhere for mustard-seed from some house where death had not been. But one house answered, "We have lost a son;" another, "We have lost parents;" another, "We have lost a slave." At last, not being able to find a single house where one had not died, she began to think hers was not the only son who had suffered death; that everywhere children were dying and parents too.

So she was seized with fear, and, putting away affection for her dead child, she left him in the forest, went to Buddha and offered him homage.

He said to her, "Have you procured the handful of mustard-seed?"

"I have not, because the people of the village told me the living are few, but the dead are many."

Buddha replied, "You thought that you only had lost a son; but the law of death is that among all living creatures there is no permanence."

—A Buddhist Parable.

II. REVEALS THE POVERTY OF OUR FAITH.

(469.) How poor our heaven is! How little it draws us! How little there is that consoles us in the death of those whom we love! We put away our children in death, as one would hold his children out of a castle window at night, and let them drop. We know not where, on what rocks, or into what raging wave, they fall. When our children die, we drop them into the unknown, shuddering with fear. We know that they go out from us, and we stand, and pity and wonder. If we receive news that a hundred thousand dollars had been left them by some one dying, we should be thrown into an ecstasy of rejoicing; but when they have gone home to God, we stand, and mourn, and pine, and wonder at "the mystery of Providence." The mystery of Providence to me, is, that anybody is born. The mystery of Providence to me, is, that when we are born, if God loves us, as He does through Jesus Christ, He lets us stay away from Him so long. Dying is more desirable than living to Christian faith.

—Becher.

III. ITS DESIGN.

(470.) I am rich in heaven, in my children. Already I have sent thither many. Have I lost them? Not one of them. They are mire more than when I clasped them. They are nobler and more worthy of love than they were then. They have been saved for me better than I could have saved them for myself. I have laid them up; and I have verified the declaration, "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." How many, many times have men gone by their tears to the gate of heaven who never could have been drawn there by the mere presentation of truth. All that could be addressed to their conscience, to their fear, or to their reason, did not teach them the way to God's throne; and God took from them their brother, their sister, the companion of their life, or their child, and then they found that path themselves. As the kine went lowing with the ark, so the heart goes lowing toward heaven, seeking its own, and finding them, in hope, in imagination, and resting only when by faith it is brought again consciously near to them in the kingdom of the Eternal Father.

—Becher.

(471.) Every deceased friend is a magnet drawing us into another world.

—E. Cook.

IV. HOW IT SHOULD BE BORNE.

1. We should not sorrow as those who have no hope.

(472.) There be two manners of mourning for the dead. The heathen and unbelievers mourn without hope of the resurrection: their opinion is, that seeing their near friends are dead, there is no more of them, but that they have utterly lost them for ever. This heathenish sorrow will not St. Paul have of Christians.

The Christians mourn also, but with a living hope of the joyful resurrection. For like as God the Father left not Christ the Lord in death, but raised Him up again, and placed Him in eternal life; even so us that believe shall not He leave in death, but bring us out into everlasting life. For this cause doth the Apostle speak of the dead, as of those that sleep, which rest from all travail and labour, that they may rise again in better case.

Like as the flowers with all their virtue, smell, and beauty, lie all the winter in the root, sleeping and resting till they may be awaked with the pleasant time of May, when they come forth with all their beauty, smell, and virtue; even so ought not we to think that our friends which be departed are in any cumberance or sorrow, but their strength and virtue being drawn in, liveth in God and with God. They lie and rest till the last day, when they shall awake again, fair, beautiful, and glorious, in soul and body. Who will not rejoice at this comfort of Paul, and set aside all unprofitable sorrow, for this exceeding joy's sake?

—Wermullerus, 1557.

2. With thankfulness for the friends who have been taken from us.

(473.) A dear little girl had been taught to pray specially for her father. He had been suddenly taken away. Kneeling at her evening devotion, her voice faltered; and as her eyes met her mother's, she sobbed, "O mother! I cannot leave him all out. Let me say, thank God that I had a dear father once, so that I can keep him in my prayers." Many stricken hearts may learn a sweet lesson from this child. Let us remember to thank God for mercies past, as well as to ask for blessings for the future.

3. With thankfulness for the friends who are spared to us.

(474.) It were a very scornful thing, if when a man hath hurt one foot, he would therefore mar the other also; or if, when one part of his goods is stolen away, he would cast the rest into the sea, and say that he so bewaileth his adversity. No less foolishly do they, that enjoy not such goods as are present, and regard not their friends that be alive; but spoil and mar themselves, because their wives, children, or friends, be departed.

Though one of the husbandman's trees doth wither away, he heweth not down therefore all the other trees; but regardeth the others so much the more that they may win the thing again, which the others lost. Even so learn thou in adversity, with such goods as are left thee to comfort and refresh thyself again.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

7. CONSOLATIONS FOR THE BEREAVED.

—Evelyn, 1620-1706.

(476.) A little boy once went out in the early morn, and was greatly delighted with the little globes formed by the dew on the brambles. He hastened back, and led his father out to see those miniature worlds; but when the father and son arrived, the sun was up, and had drawn up in vapour, the globes that had hung on the brambles, and so displeased the child. The child cried, and said—"The angry sun has taken them all up." The father looked up, and saw the beautiful rainbow on the bosom of the cloud, and said—"There, my child, the sun has taken up the bramble globes, and they help to form that beautiful bow on the cloud." Ah! my friends, God has taken up some of our friends; and have we not murmured? But, where are they? Ah! do they not form the beautiful bow round the throne of God? —Beaumont.

(477.) The dead possess all the consciousness of the living, and much more. The dead are just out of our sight, round the corner of the temple of nature. We dwell in the suburbs of the eternal city, they are in the kingly metropolis. We are in abasement, they are in the royal chambers of state. We are under clouds, they are in a light so radiant that if it should fall upon us at midday, "the earth would seem to suffer an eclipse, and hang like a corpse in the midst of shadows."

—Townsend.

BIBLE, TIME.

1. THE NECESSITY OF A REVELATION IS OBVIOUS.

1. From the ignorance of man concerning himself.

(478.) Reason sees that man is ignorant, guilty, mortal, miserable, transported with vain passions, tormented with accusations of conscience, but it could not redeem those evils. Corrupt nature is like an imperfect building that lies in rubbish; the imperfection is visible, but not the way to finish it; for through the ignorance of the first design, every one follows his own fancy, whereas when the Architect comes to finish His own project, it appears regular and beautiful. Thus the various directions of philosophers to recover fallen man out of his ruins, and to raise him to his first state, were vain. Some glimmerings they had, that the happiness of a reasonable nature consisted in its union with God, but in order to this, they propounded such means as were not only ineffectual, but opposite. Such is the pride and folly of carnal wisdom, that to bring God and man together, it advances man, and degrades God.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

2. From the failure of all the philosophers to construct a complete and coherent religion.

(479.) A comparison of the theory of "the faith once delivered to the saints" with the facts of the past has shown that such a faith actually exists, and is in its substance identical with the faith of the apostles and prophets as contained in the canonical Scriptures. Its history is like the unbroken course of some stately river, ever flowing onwards from its first rise in the apostolic age towards the glorious ocean of the prophetic future, ever widening and deepening as it flows, and from every bright wave echoing the everlasting song, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace." But the history of speculation is totally different. It is a weary tale of ceaseless effort and of ceaseless failure. It is not one river, but many; a hundred streams, now wasted in the barren sands, now stagnating in the malarious marsh, now evaporating by simple inanition, earthenborn and earthy.

The progress of speculative thought has been like the conduct of a man bewildered in some dense and trackless forest. Brought to this present spot by some able and faithful guide, he has now in some way or another been deprived of his assistance, and is left to shift for himself. He has no knowledge whatever to begin with, for he was never here before, and having neither chart nor compass, is devoid of all data beyond what he can gain by his own consciousness. He proceeds after a while in search of a path of escape from the silent and solitary forest into the green meadows and smiling scenes of happy industry in the distance. From the dead level where he stands no glimpse of the distance can be gained. The tops of the tall trees close the boundary of the view on every side; and if he climbs them he but sees the depth and boundless extent of the mysterious circle wrapping him in on all sides. He is left face to face with himself and the problem of escape, with all his man's wants and weaknesses to urge him to a speedy solution of it. He therefore makes the attempt and penetrates some distance into the thick forest, till, through the matted and tangled labyrinth, or over the yawning fissure, or down the steep precipice, or across the over-hanging side of the barrier rock, he can advance no further. He therefore turns upon his steps, and following his steps backwards, finds his way to the point whence he started. Then he tries again with the same effort, and with the same failure. Over and over the same process goes on. But meantime the day advances and night draws nigh. Natural wants arise, and crave in vain for satisfaction. There is neither bread nor water in this lonely forest. He lies down amid the darkness, and tries to forget in sullen sleep his anxieties and despair. Another day brings another day's hopes, another day's efforts, and another day's failure; till like many an unhappy wretch in actual life, exhausted with effort, weak with hunger, and tormented with thirst, broken down by despair, and sick with fond dreams of the home he will never reach, he lays him down and dies.

Such has actually been the course of philosophic thought. A succession of new efforts from new ideas as starting-points have ended in a succession of failures, each effort like a faint wave that curls and breaks before it reaches the shore.

Thus the recognition of a personal and superintending Deity, traceable doubtfully in Thales, and distinctly taught by Anaxagoras, became again dubious in Archelaus. The affectionate morality and piety of Pythagoras degenerated into the superstitious mysticism of the later Pythagoreans, and his recognition of the immortality of the soul, and of rewards and punishment after death, into a coarse metempsychosis. The clear and lofty Theism of Socrates, his recognition of virtue, and his perception of the true dignity of human nature, passed through Plato into the disputative scepticism of the Academy. The emphatic protest of the Eleatic School against a gross and materialistic polytheism, and its distinct consciousness of the unity and spiritual nature of God, became secularised in Parmenides, and atheistic in the sceptical sophistry of Zeno and the ascetic dualism of Empedocles. The pleasure-loving school of Aristippus ended in the sullen discontent of Hegesias, the death-persuader. The recognition of the inductive basis of all human knowledge belonging to Euclid of Megara, evaporated in the idle sophisms of Eubulides and Diodorus, and the logical fallacies of Plato, with its Stilpo. The idealistic philosophy of Plato, with its strong resemblances to revealed doctrine on the subject of God, and the soul, and sin, and the other life, died out of Polemo and Crates in one direction, in the sceptical uncertainty of Archelaeus in a second, and in the probabilities and lax morality of Carneades in the third. The philosophy of Aristotle, pure if cold, and elevating if selfish, ended in the materialistic atheism of Strabo. The rigid self-control of Antisthenes became an extravagance in the severity of the Cynics and the sullen pride of Diogenes.

The natural virtue of Zeno passed into the subtle negations of Crysippus. The principle of Epicurus, that pleasure was to be found in virtue, was turned by a play of words into the principle which has made Epicurean a name of reproach throughout the world. The craving of the Alexandrian School after union with God was developed into the impious mysticism of Plotinus. Even the philosophy of Locke was perverted into the materialism of Hartley, Priestley, and Darwin, the sensationalism of Condillac, the selfishness of Helvetius, the fatalism of D'Holbach, and the naked atheism of the French Encyclopædists. Lastly, the idealism of Descartes prepared the way for the blasphemies of Schelling and Hegel.

Thus, throughout all human speculation, the same law has prevailed. Many great and noble ideas have been thrown out, fragments of revealed truth or sparks of heavenly light received, we know not how, through the mercy of that God who has, more or less, wrought in the loftier spirits of our race as they lived and died. But however they may have been acquired, two things are certain. It is indisputable that in the minds of the founders of philosophic schools they existed only dimly and darkly, and were never framed into a complete and coherent system. Equally certain it is that as soon as men began to reason upon them the fragments of truth themselves were refined away and lost. None of them ever retained permanent vitality. None of them exercised a controlling influence over mankind. The one fact is the explanation of the other. What is not able permanently to live is not likely electrically to act. The whole process has consisted of flashes of light for a moment illumining the darkness, like rays of divine sunlight shining from heaven, and then gradually dying away amid the ever-deepening shadows of human ignorance and misery.

—Gurbett.

II. IN THE BIBLE WE HAVE A REVELATION FROM GOD.

1. Nature of the evidence by which its inspiration is proved.

(480.) There is a vast difference between what is called mathematical, and what is called moral evidence; the difference consists not so much in the fact that mathematical proofs deal with subjects that come under the cognizance of the senses, but that mathematical evidence has no room for prejudice, or passion, or self-will, or an evil heart of unbelief, or an unholy appetite of sinful desire of any kind. If I am proving that any two sides of a triangle are greater than the third side, or that the square of the hypothenuse of a right-angled triangle is equal to the sum of the squares of the two sides, I am engaged in a sort of transcendental process, in this respect altogether out of the reach of passion. But when I am trying to prove to men the propositions that speak of what they are, and what they should be, and whither they will go if they do not turn round and come back, or if they persist in their present palatable but sinful course, then I have to deal, not only with an intellect that needs to be convinced, but with prejudices and passions innumerable, that thrust themselves forward, and try to prevent the clear, and logical, and triumphant conclusion, to which I should otherwise arrive. Such is the important distinction between the two. If men therefore ask for mathematical evidence upon this book, and upon religion, they demand what is impossible. It belongs to another province. But if you ask for and accept moral evidence, it will be found in itself triumphant. It is not a precarious or equivocal process. When a man is tried for his life, and when twelve respectable men hear the trial and proof, they come to the conclusion, he is or is not guilty. How rarely do we find a jury in error! almost never. Why? Because moral evidence has power—it does satisfy. And yet those twelve jurymen are not without feelings, sympathies, passions, constantly thrusting themselves up, trying to arrest their honest verdict; but they are able, notwithstanding, to keep all down, and come to an impartial conclusion; and reason overcomes every resistance. Men's lives are taken away by force of moral evidence, and all are satisfied it is right. If a physician come to me when I am ill, he cannot mathematically demonstrate my illness, he cannot mathematically convince me of it; but we do not ask mathematical evidence on such subjects; we are satisfied with moral. Take care, then, lest in the matters of Cæsar you daily accept moral evidence as all that is requisite; but in the matters of God and eternity, where the moral evidence is so magnificent, varied, and vast, you criminally reject it as incomplete, and unable to prove its end and object.

—Cumming.

2. The nature of its inspiration.*

(481.) It is never to be supposed that the divine pattern of the Scriptures should direct every word and every phrase by an extraordinary, immediate inspiration, for then it were impossible there should have been a diversity of style, but all the parts must have been in one and the same style. But there was that influx of the Divine Spirit that did most certainly guide the writers as to all the substance of what was to be written and recorded by them; which did attempt itself to the natural genius of those that were made use of as the penmen, so that the communication of the Holy Ghost, perceived by such and such men, of such and such a constitution, temper, and genius, comes to be diversified in that manner, as if one comes to pour a quantity of water into such and such a particular vessel; if the vessel be round, the water falls into a round figure; if the vessel be square, the water is formed into that figure unavoidably. And so the same communication of the Holy Ghost being poured into such a vessel as this or that man was, comes to be accordingly diversified. That very communication to such an one as Isaiah, for instance, receives one sort of figure there, and a communication to such an one as Micah receives another figure there; when yet all these communications are from one and the same fountain, and serve for one and the same common purpose.

—Salter, 1840.

(482.) You cannot dissect Inspiration into substance and form. As for thoughts being inspired, apart from the words which give them expression, you might as well talk of a tune without notes, or a sum without figures. No such dream can abide the daylight for a moment. No such theory of Inspira-

* It will be seen that these two illustrations are in elucidation of two differing theories of the nature of the Inspiration of the Scriptures. As illustrations they are equally good, and it does not seem to me to be necessary to indicate which of these theories I think to be the true one. On some other points concerning which Christian men differ, illustrations of their varying views will be given. R. A. B.

tion is even intelligible. It is as illogical as it is worthless; and cannot be too sternly put down.

—Burton.

3. Proofs that it is divinely inspired.

(1.) The marks it bears of a Divine origin.

(483.) You find by daily experience every ingenious author leaves an image and impress of his own spirit, the mark of his genius upon every work that he does. We can say of an exquisite painting, by some secret art in it, "This is the hand of such a great master." Now can it be imagined, that God should put His hand to any work and leave no signature or impress of it upon that work? It cannot be imagined, for it must be either because He could not, or because He would not. That God could not, cannot be said without blasphemy. Can men show the wisdom and learning they have attained to in every work, and cannot God, who is the Father of lights, and the Fountain of wisdom, insinuate such secret marks and notes of His wisdom and Divine authority into that writing He took care should be penned for the use and comfort of the world, that it might be known to be His? And that He would not, that cannot be believed neither.

—Manton, 1620-1657.

(484.) How are we to know whether the Scriptures be the Word of God? It shows itself, and evidences itself to be so; for it is a light that discovers itself, and all things else, without any other testimony. When the sun is up, there needs no witness and proof that it is light. Let the least child bring a candle into a room, and as it discovers other things, so it discovers itself: so the Word of God is that which discovers itself to us, yea, it has a self-evidencing light.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(485.) May a particular man be known from a thousand others by his face, voice, or handwriting? Certainly then it cannot seem strange that the God of heaven should be discerned from His sorry creature, by His voice and writing in the sacred Scriptures. Do we not see that He hath interwoven His glorious name so in the works of creation, that they speak His power and godhead, and call Him Maker in their thoughts, who never read the Bible, or heard of such a book? (so that they could not steal the notion thence, but had it from the dictate of their own consciences, extorting the acknowledgment of a Deity). And much more will an enlightened conscience and sanctified heart be commanded, by the overpowering evidence that shines forth in the Scriptures, to fall down and cry, "It is the voice of God, and not any creature that speaks in them."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(486.) I cannot look around me without being struck with the analogy observable in the works of God. I find the Bible written in the style of His other books of Creation and Providence. The pen seems in the same hand. I see it, indeed, write at times mysteriously in each of these books; but I know that mystery in the works of God is only another name for my ignorance. The moment, therefore, that I become humble, all becomes right.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(2.) The confidence of believers that it is from God.

(487.) The grand truths and chief notions found in the Scriptures, are so connatural to the principles of grace, which the same holy Spirit (who is the inditer of them) hath planted in the hearts of all the saints, that their souls even spring and leap at the reading and hearing of them, as the Babe did in Elizabeth's womb at the salutation of the Virgin Mary. The lamb doth not more certainly know its dam in the midst of a whole flock (at whose bleating it passeth by them all to come to be suckled by her) than the sheep of Christ know His voice in the saving truths of the Scriptures; the sincere milk whereof they desire, and are taught of God to taste and discern from all other.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(3.) Its distinctness from all other books.

(488.) I will confess that the majesty of the Scriptures strikes me with admiration, as the purity of the Gospel has its influence on my heart. Peruse the works of our philosophers, with all their pomp of diction; how contemptible are they, compared with the Scriptures! Is it possible that a book at once so simple and so sublime should be merely the work of man? Is it possible that the sacred Personage whose name it records should be Himself a mere man? What sweetness, what purity, in His manner! What sublimity in His maxims! What profound wisdom in His discourses! Where is the man, where the philosopher, who could so live and so die without weakness and without ostentation? If the life and death of Socrates were those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus were those of a God.

—J. J. Rousseau.

(489.) At a literary gathering at the house of the Baron von Holbach, where the most celebrated infidels of the age used to assemble, the gentlemen present were one day commenting on the absurd, foolish, and childish things with which the Holy Scriptures, as they maintained, abound. But the French philosopher and infidel Diderot, who had himself taken no small part in the conversation, suddenly put a period to it by saying, "But it is wonderful, gentlemen, it is wonderful! I know of no man in France who can write and speak with such ability. In spite of all the evil which we have said, and undoubtedly with good reason, of this book, I do not believe that you, or any of you, could compose a narrative so simple, and at the same time so elevated and so affecting as the narrative of the sufferings and death of Christ,—a narrative exerting so wide an influence and awakening such deep and universal feeling, and the power of which after so many hundred years would still be the same." This unlooked-for remark filled every one with astonishment, and was followed by a protracted silence.

(490.) I am heartily glad to witness your veneration for a Book which, to say nothing of its holiness or authority, contains more specimens of genius and taste than any other volume in existence.

—Landor.

(491.) To my mind there is no plainer proof of the Divine authority of the Bible, and that they who wrote these Gospels were moved by the Holy Ghost, than the calm, unimpassioned style in which His disciples tell the story of their Master's wrongs, without a flash of feeling; no sign that a tear ever dropped on the page, no sign that the pen ever trembled with indignation in their hands as they wrote it down. I cannot read the story so as they seem to have written it, no more than I could stand by to see a mother insulted, or have a father's memory blackened and traduced. When I read how my blessed Master was called an impostor, and a blasphemer, and a glutton, and a winebibber, I do not know when it is more difficult to be angry and not sin.

—Guthrie.

(492.) There is gold in the rocks which fringe the Pass of the Splügen, gold even in the stones which mend the roads, but there is too little of it to be worth extracting. Alas, how like too many books and sermons! Not so the Scriptures, they are much fine gold; their very dust is precious.

—Spurgeon.

(4.) Its adaptation to human need.

(493.) God made the present earth as the home of man, but had He meant it as a mere lodging a world less beautiful would have served the purpose. A big round island, half of it arable and half of it pasture, with a clump of trees in one corner and a magazine of fuel in another, might have held and fed ten millions of people, and a hundred islands all made in the same pattern, big and round, might have held and fed the population of the globe. But man is something more than the animal which wants lodging and food. He has a spirited nature, full of keen perceptions and deep sympathies. He has an eye for the sublime and the beautiful, and his kind Creator has provided man's abode with affluent materials for these nobler tastes.

God also made the Bible as the guide and oracle of man; but had He meant it as a mere lesson-book of duty, a volume less various and less attractive would have answered every end. A few plain paragraphs announcing God's own character and His disposition towards us sinners here on earth, mentioning the provision which He has made for our future happiness, and indicating the different duties which He would have us perform, a few simple sentences would have sufficed to tell what God is, and what He would have us to do. There was no need of the picturesque narrative and the majestic poem, no need of the proverb, the story, and the psalm. A chapter of theology and another of morals, a short account of the Incarnation and the great Atonement, and a few pages of rules and directions for the Christian life, might have contained the vital essence of Scripture, and have supplied us with a Bible of simplest meaning and smallest size. And in that case the Bible would have been consulted only by those rare and wistful spirits to whom the great Hereafter is a subject of anxiety, who are really anxious to know what God is, and how they themselves may please Him. But in giving that Bible its Divine Author had regard to the mind of man. He knew that man has more curiosity than piety, more taste than sanctity; and that more persons are anxious to hear some new, or read some beautiful, thing, than to read or hear about God and the great salvation. He knew that few would ever ask, What must I do to be saved? till they came in contact with the Bible itself, and therefore He made the Bible not only an instructive book, but an attractive one—not only true, but enticing. He filled it with marvellous incident and engaging history; with sunny pictures from old-world scenery, and affecting anecdotes from the patriarch times. He replenished it with stately argument and thrilling verse, and sprinkled it over with sententious wisdom and proverbial pungency. He made it a book of lofty thoughts and noble images, a book of heavenly doctrine, but withal of early adaptation. In preparing a guide for immortality Infinite Wisdom gave not a dictionary nor a grammar, but a Bible, a book which in trying to reach the heart of man should captivate his taste, and which in transforming his affections should also expand his intellect. The pearl is of great price; but even the casket is of exquisite beauty. The sword is of ethereal temper, and nothing cuts so keen as its double edge; but there are jewels on the hilt, an exquisite inlaying on the scabbard. The shekels are of the purest ore; but even the scrip which contains them is of a texture more curious than any which the artists of earth can fashion. The apples are gold, but even the basket is silver.

—Huntton, 1814-1867.

(494.) In the adaptation of the Word of God to intellects of all dimensions, it resembles the natural light, which is equally suited to the eye of the minutest insect and to the extended vision of man.

—N. B. Clulow.

(5.) The exhaustlessness of its interest.

(495.) The most learned, acute, and diligent student cannot, in the longest life, obtain an entire knowledge of this one volume. The more deeply he works the mine, the richer and more abundant he finds the ore; new light continually beams from this source of heavenly knowledge, to direct the conduct and illustrate the work of God and the ways of men; and he will at last leave the world confessing that the more he studied the Scriptures, the fuller conviction he had of his own ignorance, and of their inestimable value.

—Sir Walter Scott.

(496.) It is related of Dr. Kennicott, who spent thirty years in collating the Hebrew Scriptures, and resigned a valuable living because his studies prevented his residing on it, that his wife was accustomed to assist him in his preparations of his Polyglot Bible by reading to him, as they drove out for an airing, the portions to which his attention was called. When preparing for a drive the day after the great work was completed, she asked him what book she should now take. "Oh," exclaimed he, "let us begin the Bible."

(497.) The difference between the Holy Scriptures and other writings is much the same as that between the works of art and nature. The works of art appear to most advantage at first, but will not bear a nice and repeated examination; the more curiously we pry into them, the less we shall admire them. But the works of nature will bear a thousand reviews, and yet still be instructive and wonderful. In like manner the writings of mere men, though never so excellent in their kind, yet strike and surprise us most upon our first perusal of them; and then flatten upon our taste by degrees, as our familiarity with them increases. Whereas the word of Revelation is, like its Author, of an endless and unsearchable perfection, and the more reason still shall we find to admire and adore the wisdom of the great Revealer of it.

—Salter, 1840.

(498.) There was an eminent philosopher who had devoted a lifetime to the pursuits of science, and not, as he thought, in vain. She had crowned his brow with laurels, and inscribed his name in the temple of fame. In the evening of his days, at the eleventh hour, God was pleased to call him, open his eyes, convert him; and now, he who was deeply read in science and conversant with its loftiest speculations, as he bent his gray head over the Bible (the law spoken of in the text), declared that, if he had his life to live over again, he would spend it in the study of the Word of God. He felt like a miner, who, after toiling long and to little purpose in search of gold, with one stroke of his pickaxe lays open a vein of the precious metal and becomes rich at once—the owner of a vein that grows the richer the deeper the mine is driven. Such a treasure the Bible offers to those whose eyes God has opened to its wonders of grace and glory. It is inexhaustible. The farther, leaving the shore with its sounding beach and shallow waters, you go out to sea, the deeper it grows; the higher you climb a hill, the wider grows the prospect of rolling land and liquid plain; the deeper, at least in some instances, the shaft is sunk into the bowels of the earth, richer minerals reward your labour. Even so, the further and the longer we pursue our investigations into Divine truth, and study the Bible, the more it grows in interest and in value. The devout Christian discovers new beauties every day. We never tire of its pages; at every new reading we make new discoveries, and its truths are always as fresh as new-blown roses which nobody ever tires of smelling, as each morning brings them out blushing red and bathed in dew. Only let a man's eyes be opened, and such wondrous things will be seen in the Bible that he would part with all his books rather than with that, esteeming it better not only than any, but than all of them, and deeming those his best hours of study which were spent in exploring the mysteries and mercies of redeeming love.

—Guthrie.

(499.) The Bible is like an ever-flowing fountain. Take what we will, and as much as we will, we ever leave more than we take to satisfy the wants of others. Neither the writers nor the thinkers of any one age can exhaust its fulness. For nearly eighteen centuries men have thought and written upon that one book, and if for eighteen more centuries men so write, yet will there still remain much that calls for fresh examination and fuller inquiry: new knowledge to be won, old truths to be better and more fully understood. The books of men have their day, and then grow obsolete. God's Word is like Himself, "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Time passes over it, but it ages not. Its power is as fresh as if God spake it but yesterday.

(6.) The permanence of its value.

(500.) Whatever use man makes of this standard of truth, the standard itself remains fixed, tried, and unimpaired. When I take down a great author, such as Lord Bacon, I find that time has discovered many errors, and rendered obsolete many positions, to be found in that most comprehensive of human minds. But I see that time can take nothing from the Bible. I find it a living monitor. Like the sun, it is the same in its light and influence to man this day which it was ages ago. It can meet every present inquiry ; it can console under every present loss ; and it can become, in God's hand, a daily exciting cause of growth and comfort.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(501.) There is a substance which you must have noticed cast on the sea-shore—the medusa, or sea-nettle, as some sorts of it are called ; an object rather beautiful as its dome of amber quivers in the sun. And a goodly size it often is, so large at times that you could scarcely lift it ; but it is all a watery pulp ; and if you were carrying it home, or trying to preserve it, the whole mass would quickly trickle out of sight and leave you nothing but a few threads of substance. Now most books are like the marine medusa ; fresh stranded, newly published (as the expression is), they make a goodly show ; but when a few suns have shone on them, the crystal jelly melts, the glittering cupola has vanished, and a few meagre fibres in your memory are all the residue of the once popular authorship. If you ever tried it you must have been struck with the few solid thoughts, the few suggestive ideas, which survive from the perusal of the most brilliant of human books. Few of them can stand three readings, and of the memorabilia which you had marked in your first perusal, on reverting to them you find that many of them are not so striking or weighty or original as at first you fancied. But the Word of God is solid ; it will stand a thousand readings, and the man who has gone over it the most frequently and the most carefully is the surest of finding new wonders there.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(7.) Its unity.

(502.) We take the Bible into our hands, and examine diligently its different sections, delivered in different ages of mankind. There is a mighty growth in the discoveries of God's nature and will, as time rolls on from creation to redemption ; but as knowledge is increased, and brighter light thrown on the Divine purpose and dealings, there is never the point at which we are brought to a pause by the manifest contradiction of one part to another. It is the wonderful property of the Bible, though the authorship is spread over a long line of centuries, that it never withdraws any truth once advanced, and never adds new without giving fresh force to the old. In reading the Bible, we always look, as it were, on the same landscape ; the only difference being, as we take in more and more of its statements, that more and more of the mist is rolled away from the horizon, so that the eye includes a broader sweep of beauty. If we hold converse with Patriarchs occupying the earth whilst yet in its infancy, and then listen to Moses, as he legislates for Israel, to Prophets throwing open the future, and to Apostles as they publish the mysteries of a new dispensation, we find the discourse always bearing, with more or less distinctness, on one and the same subject : the latter speakers, if we may use such illustration, turn towards us a larger portion than the former of the illuminated hemisphere ; but, as the mighty globe revolves on its axis, we feel that the oceans and lands, which come successively into view, are but constituent parts of the same glorious world. There is the discovery of the new territories : but, as fast as discovered, the territories combine to make up one planet. There is the announcement of the new truths ; but, as fast as announced, they take their places as parts of one immutable system. Indeed, there is vast difference between the Epistles of St. Paul, and the Psalms of David, or the Prophecies of Isaiah. But it is the difference, as we have just said, between the landscape whilst the morning mist yet rests on half its villages and lakes, and that same range of scenery when the noontide irradiates every spire and every rivulet. It is the difference between the moon, as she turns towards us only a thin crescent of her illuminated disk, and when, in the fulness of her beauty, she walks our firmament, and scatters our night. It is no new landscape which opens on our gaze, as the town and forest emerge from the shadow, and fill up the blanks in the noble panorama. It is no new planet which comes travelling in its majesty, as the crescent swells into the circle, and the faint thread of light gives place to the rich globe of silver. And it is no fresh system of religion which is made known to the dwellers in this creation, as the brief notices given to patriarchs expand in the institutions of the law, and under the breathings of prophecy, till at length, in the days of Christ and His apostles, they burst into magnificence, and fill a world with redemption. It is throughout the same system for the rescue of human kind by the interference of a surety. And revelation has been nothing else but the gradual development of this system, the drawing up another fold of the veil from the landscape, the adding another stripe of light to the crescent, so that the early fathers of our race, and ourselves on whom "the ends of the world are come," look on the same arrangement for human deliverance, though to them there was nothing but a clouded expanse, with here and there a prominent landmark, whilst to us, through the horizon losing itself in the far-off eternity, every object of personal interest is exhibited in beauty and distinctness.

—Melville.

(503.) The Bible comes to us, not like a treatise consecutively composed by one man, or a symmetrical system of philosophy drawn out according to the requirements of modern thought. It is a cluster of separate growths, going on through ages, and yet, like some vast old oak, or cedar of Lebanon, all its additions, to the last and outermost twig, cohere around the one trunk, stand on the one root, and partake of the peculiar nature of the original. Its earliest scenes are the simplest histories of pastoral life ; its latest are the inciters of renowned civilisation. But whether it speak in the picture language of the early Hebrew, or in the language of Plato, its testimony to truth, virtue, goodness, and godliness, is grandly one. If the book itself has no literary structure of symmetry, it harmonises the moral sense of the ages, gives to the widely-separated periods of history one mind, one heart, and one interpretation of the universal aspiration.

—Becher.

(504.) Consider what, as a matter of fact, we have in this old book, or collection of books, men call the Bible. We have in its first chapters answers to the universal questions, Whence came the world and man ? Then we have memorials of the rise and fall of the proudest empires the earth has seen. We have the story of the development of the mightiest of moral forces, even this Christianity which we profess. We have some predictions such as those of the diffusion of the Gospel and the dispersion of the Jews, whose fulfilments are all around us. And its last book is in large measure devoted to the satisfying of that other universal human craving by which only is man's longing to know the secrets of the past transcended, even our desire to discern somewhat of the hidden future. Thus this Bible possesses rounded completeness. It begins by telling us how order was brought forth from the chaos, and it ends by revealing to us the new heavens and earth to which, in the glory of their redemption, no trace of the curse of sin by which they are marred shall cleave. Whence has come this singular perfectness? The Bible is not the production of one writer; it is no great epic or history conceived and consummated by one mighty human genius. For the harmony that characterises it, we might then reasonably have looked. But it is the production of many writers, of different nations, of varied tongues. It was commenced by Moses in the deserts of Arabia, and completed by John in the Island of Patmos. Between its commencement and its close entire phases of civilisation appeared and disappeared. To its earlier penmen the very speech of its later writers was unknown, and to the authors of its closing half the dialect of Moses and of David had become unintelligible. And yet this book, produced in such far removed times, such distant places, and by such varied instrumentality, is one, and forms a whole! Now is not this itself a proof of more than human origin? Was there ever a cathedral constructed by means of the building by one man of a wall, and by another of a window, and by another of an arch, and by a fourth of a doorway, and by a fifth of a spire, and so on through its countless parts, without concert, without a common plan, without an architect to supervise? What would you say to the man who should tell you that thus originated the minster of York, or St. Paul's in London, or that Abbey in which repose the ashes of England's noblest dead, or that mightier pile which is Rome's crowning glory? But shall we believe that this grander cathedral of truth, built through vaster space of time, serving nobler ends, glorious with completer perfectness, had no architect, that its many builders were not guided by any common plan, that its harmony is a mere accident and result of chance?

—R. A. Bertram.

(8.) Its scientific incorrectness.

(505.) The inspiration of the Bible is a large subject. I hold it to be inspired, not dictated. It is the Word of God—the words of man: as the former, perfect; as the latter, imperfect. God the Spirit, as a sanctifier, does not produce absolute perfection of human knowledge, nor has He given a perfect revelation; and for the same reason in both cases—the human element which is mixed up—else there could have been no progressive dispensations. Let us take a case—the history of the creation. Now I hold that a spiritual revelation from God must involve scientific incorrectness: it could not be from God unless it did. Suppose that the cosmogony had been given in terms which would satisfy our present scientific knowledge, or, say, rather the terms of absolute scientific truth: it is plain that, in this case, the men of that day would have rejected its authority; they would have said, "Here is a man who tells us the earth goes round the sun; and the sky, which we see to be a stereoma, fixed not far up, is infinite space, with no firmament at all, and so on. Can we trust one in matters unseen who is manifestly in error in things seen and level to the senses? Can we accept his revelation about God's nature and man's duty, when he is wrong in things like these?" Thus the faith of this and subsequent ages must have been purchased at the expense of the unbelief of all previous ages. I hold it, therefore, as a proof of the inspiration of the Bible, and Divinely wise to have given a spiritual revelation—i.e., a revelation concerning the truths of the soul and its relation to God—in popular and incorrect language. Do not mistake that word, incorrect; incorrect is one thing, false another. It is scientifically incorrect to say that the sun rose this morning; but it is not false, because it conveys all that is required, for the nonce, to be known about the fact, time, &c. And if God were giving a revelation in this present day, He would give it in modern phraseology, and the men He inspired would talk of sunrise, sunset, &c. Men of science smile at the futile attempts to reconcile Moses and geology. I give up the attempt at once, and say, the inspiration of the Bible remains intact for all that—nay, it would not have been inspired except on this condition of incorrectness.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

(9.) Its influence on character and conduct.

—Beattie, 1735-1803.

(507.) If there is any knowledge fully in our possession, it is certainly that which comes to us by experience. That a certain material will float in the water may be proved by a knowledge of its specific gravity; but we will feel fully more assured of the fact if we have seen it tried, and we will regard our answer to an objector, "I have seen it floating in water frequently," as simply sufficient to silence all objections. Ay, we will regard such a statement as fully more conclusive than, "It must float, for its specific gravity is lighter than water." On this same principle—and it is the principle of common sense—how fully we can prove that the Bible is the Word of God! Yes, every Christian carries the proof with him in his own experience. A poor Italian woman, a fruit-seller, had received the Word of God in her heart, and become persuaded of the truth of it. Seated at her modest stall at the head of a bridge, she made use of every moment in which she was unoccupied with her small traffic, in order to study the sacred volume. "What are you reading there, my good woman?" said a gentleman one day, as he came up to the stall to purchase some fruit. "It is the Word of God," replied the fruit-vendor. "The Word of God! Who told you that?" "He told me so Himself." "Have you ever spoken with Him, then?" The poor woman felt a little embarrassed, more especially as the gentleman insisted on her giving him some proof of what she believed. Unused to discussion, and feeling greatly at a loss for arguments, she at length exclaimed, looking upward, "Can you prove to me, sir, that there is a sun up in the sky?" "Prove it!" he replied. "Why the best proof is that it warms me, and that I can see its light." "So it is with me," she replied joyously, "the proof of this Book's being the Word of God is, that it warms and lights my soul."

(508.) The mother of a family was married to an infidel, who made a jest at religion in the presence of his own children; yet she succeeded in bringing them all up in the fear of the Lord. I one day asked how she preserved them from the influence of a father whose sentiments were so openly opposed to her own. This was her answer: "Because to the authority of a father I did not oppose the authority of a mother, but that of God. From their earlier years my children have always seen the Bible upon my table. This holy book has constituted the whole of their religious instruction. I was silent, that I might allow it to speak. Did they propose a question; did they commit any fault; did they perform any good action; I opened the Bible, and the Bible answered, reproof, or encouraged them. The constant reading of the Scriptures has alone wrought the prodigy which surprises you."

(509.) Many years ago, there was a little boy, named Alexander. He was the son of Nicholas, Emperor of Russia, in whose empire there were many millions of poor people, called serfs. These were kept in a state much resembling slavery, and were sold with the lands on which they lived. Many of them were poor and wretched; some few were prosperous and wealthy; but all were under the control of the lords on whose territories they dwelt.

One day, Nicholas noticed that little Alexander looked very sad and thoughtful, and asked him of what he was thinking.

"Of the poor serfs," replied the little boy; "and, when I become emperor, I will emancipate them."

This reply startled the emperor and his courtiers; for they were very much opposed to all such plans for the improvement of the condition of the poor. They asked little Alexander how he came to think of doing this, and what led him to feel so interested for the serfs. He replied, "From reading the Scriptures, and hearing them enforced, which teach that all men are brothers."

The emperor said very little to his boy on the subject, and it was hoped that the influences and opinions which prevailed in the royal court would gradually correct the boyish notions of the young prince; but this expectation was vain. The early impressions of the little boy grew deeper and stronger; and when at last the great Nicholas died, and Alexander was placed upon his father's throne, he called the wise statesmen of the land to his councils, and a plan of emancipation was formed; and the imperial decree went forth, which abolished serfdom throughout all the Russian Empire.

It is in this way that God works wonders by the power of His Word. The great fact, that God has "made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth," lodged like an incorruptible seed in the heart of the young prince, and growing with his growth, and strengthening with his strength, at last budded and blossomed, and brought forth the fruit of blessing for millions of the human race.

4. The doctrine of the inspiration of the Bible is not invalidated by the state of the sacred text.

(510.) You will perhaps be told that no one can maintain that the words of Scripture are inspired, because no one can tell for certain what the words of Scripture are; or something to that effect. Now I will not stop to expose the falsity of this charge against the text of Scripture (which is implied to be a very corrupt text, whereas, on the contrary, it is the best ascertained text of any ancient writing in the world). Rather let me remind you, once and for ever, how to refute this silly sophism. See you not that the state of the text of the Bible has no more to do with the inspiration of the Bible than the stains on yonder windows have to do with the light of God's sun? Let me illustrate the matter by supposing the question raised, Whether Livy did or did not write the history which goes under his name? You (suppose) are persuaded that he did,—I, that he did not, so far, we should both understand, and perhaps respect one another. But what if I were to go on to condemn your opinion as untenable, because of the corrupt state of Livy's text? Would you not reply that I mistook the question entirely: that you were speaking of the authorship of the work, not about the fate of the copies? —Burton.

(511.) These [interpolated] words, phrases, and passages are later additions to the text, either adopted into it upon an authoritative revision, such as that ascribed to Ezra, or, perhaps, accidentally introduced through the mistakes of copyists, who brought into the text what had been previously added by way of exegesis in the margin. Such additions constantly occur in the case of classical writers; and there is no reason to suppose that a special providence would interfere to prevent their occurrence in the sacred volume. We "have our treasure in earthen vessels." God gives us His Revelation, but leaves it to us to preserve it by the ordinary methods by which books are handed down to posterity. No doubt its transcendent value has caused the bestowal of especial care and attention on the transmission of the Sacred Volume; and the result is that no ancient collection has come down to us nearly so perfect, or with so few corruptions and interpolations; but to declare that there are none, is to make an assertion improbable, a priori, and at variance with the actual phenomena. The sober-minded in every age have allowed that the written Word, as it has come down to us, has these slight imperfections, which no more interfere with its value than the spots upon the sun detract from his brightness, or than a few marred and stunted forms destroy the harmony and beauty of nature. —Kaulinsson.

5. The doctrine of the Divine inspiration of the Scriptures is not essential to the authority of Christianity.

(512.) I would have these men consider, that though we doubt not but to prove that Scripture is God's full and infallible law, yet, if it were so that this could not be proved, this would not overthrow the Christian religion. If the Scriptures were but the writings of honest men, that were subject to mistakes and contradictions, in the manner and circumstances, yet they might afford us a full certainty of the substance of Christianity, and of the miracles wrought to confirm the doctrine. Tacitus, Suetonius, Livy, Florus, Lucan, &c., were all heathens, and very fallible; and yet their history affords us a certainty of the great substantial passages of the Roman affairs which they treat of, though not of all the smaller passages and circumstances. He that doubteth whether there was such a man as Julius Cæsar, or that he fought with Pompey and overcame him, &c., is scarcely reasonable, if he knew the histories; so though Matthew Paris, Malmesbury, Hoveden, Speed, Cambden, and our own parliaments that enacted our laws, were all fallible men, and mistaken in divers smaller things, yet they afford us a full certainty that there was such a man as William the Conqueror, William Rufus, &c.; that there were such parliaments, such lords, such fights and victories, &c. He that would not venture all that he hath on the truth of these, especially to gain a kingdom by the venture, were no better in this than mad. Now, if Scripture were but such common writings as these, especially joined with the uncontrolled tradition that hath since conveyed it to us, may it not yet give us a full certainty that Christ was in the flesh, and that He preached this doctrine for the substance, and wrought these miracles to confirm it, and enabled His followers to work the like, which will afford us an invincible argument for our Christianity? Therefore Grotius, &c., and so the old fathers, when they disputed with the heathens, did first prove the truth of Christian religion before they came to prove the Divine authority of the Scriptures; not that we are at any such uncertainty, or that any Christian should take up here, as if the Scriptures were not infallible and Divine; but being now speaking to another sort of men according to their capacity, I say, if it were otherwise, yet might we have certainty of our religion.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

6. Yet its inspiration gives authority to its utterances.

(513.) What, then, is the difference between things known to be true by the natural operation of the mind, and things known to be true by supernatural influence? In the quality of the things known there is no difference. Where a thing is known to be true, it is no more a truth because God said it than because a man said it. Truth is truth, whoever says it. But it makes a great difference, in my receiving truth, whether I receive it as accredited by the testimony of man, or as accredited by the testimony of God.

We have a familiar instance of the difference between a thing that is authoritative and one that is not. A private, in the midst of battle, says to the men of his regiment, "Look to that charge upon our flank: we ought to change front." Not a man in the ranks stirs. This private is right; but a private has no authority to speak. But a brigadier-general passing, and hearing the remark, and seeing the state of affairs, gives orders in exact accordance with it; and instantly he is obeyed. The truth is the same in the mouth of the private and in the mouth of the general; but one is authorised, and the other is not. And the truth is a thousand times more influential when spoken by a man who has a right to speak it than when spoken by a man who has no right to speak it.

Now, prophets and apostles had a right to speak truths; and when spoken, those truths had a claim upon the world which they would not have had if they had been spoken by persons that were not authenticated. They would have been as true in the one case as in the other, but they would not have had the same effect. Divinely attested truth is more powerful than truth that stands merely upon its own merits.

—Becher.

7. Although the Bible is Divinely inspired, its revelation is necessarily imperfect.

(514.) To suppose that human words and human ideas can be adequate exponents of Divine truths in their full perfectness is simply absurd. As certainly as a vessel can hold no more than its own measure, so certainly no being can understand anything higher than itself. The animals have no power of understanding those qualities in which man transcends the limits of their nature; man has no power of understanding those qualities in which angels excel us; the very angels and archangels have no power of comprehending God's infinities. For the finite, however large, can never comprehend the Infinite.

—R. Payne Smith.

8. An objection answered.

(515.) The infidel strikes his penknife through this Book because he says, If it were God's book, the whole world would have it. He says that it is not to be supposed that if God had anything to say to the world, he would say it only to the small part of the human race who actually possess the Bible. To this I reply, that the fact that only a part of the race receives anything is no ground for believing that God did not bestow it. Who made oranges and bananas? You say God. I ask, how can that be, when thousands of our race never saw an orange or a banana? If God were going to give such things, why did He not give them to all? The argument that the giving of the Bible to a part of the race would imply a wicked partiality on the part of God, and consequently that He did not give it at all, would prove that He did not give oranges and bananas to the people of the tropics; for that would be partiality. The fact is, that God has a right to do as He pleases; and He is constantly partial in a thousand things. He gives us a pleasant clime, while He gives earthquakes and tornadoes to Mexico. He gives incomputable harvests of wheat to Sicily, but scant berries, and polar bears, and the ungainly walrus to the arctic inhabitants. He gives one man two good eyes, and to another none. He gives you two feet; to another man, no feet at all. To you He gives perpetual health; to another man, coughing consumption, or piercing pleurisy, or stinging gout, or fiery erysipelas. He does not treat us all alike. If all the human race had the same climate, the same harvests, the same health, the same advantages, then you might by analogy argue that if He had a Bible at all, He would give it to the whole race at the same time. If you say to me that the fact that the Bible is now in the possession of only a small part of the human family is proof that He did not send the Bible, then I say that the fact that only a part of the world has peaches and apples proves that God never made peaches and apples; and the fact that a part of the world has a mild sunshiny climate proves conclusively that God does not make the climate. Indeed, I will carry on your argument until I can prove that God made nothing at all; for there is not one single physical or intellectual blessing that we possess that has not been denied some one else. No! No! Because God, in His sovereign mercy, has given us a book that some others do not possess, let us not be so ungrateful as to reject it—blowing out our own lantern because other people have not a light; rending off the splinters from our broken bone because other people have not been able to get a bandage: dashing our own ship on a rock because other vessels have not a compass; cutting up our own Bible with a penknife because other people have not a revelation.

III. ITS GENUINENESS.

(516.) Our certainty of the incorruption of the Scriptures, in all material points, may yet consist with some literal or verbal errors in the copies. For it is not an apostolical work to deliver down to posterity the writings or words which the apostles first wrote and spoke; but it is a human and Christian work: and, therefore, though God promised to His apostles His Spirit to lead them into all truth, and hath promised to be with ministers in preaching His Gospel to the end of the world; yet hath He not promised us the same exact infallibility or impeccability in preaching, as to every circumstance, as they had at first in speaking or writing; nor hath He promised so to guide every printer, or the hand of each transcriber of the Scriptures, that none of them shall err. But our religion or Scriptures is nevertheless certain in the doctrine for all this: for the doctrine depends not on these slips or questioned passages.

We have an infallible certainty of the printed statutes of this land, that they are not forged; yet may the printers commit some errors in the printing of them. And will you conclude, if you find a word misplaced, or false printed, that, therefore, it is uncertain whether ever the parliament made such a statute? The lawyers, also, and the judges themselves, may differ about the sense of some passages in those statutes, and some may be of one mind, and some of another; is the statute, therefore, counterfeit, or is it not obligatory to the subject? Cambden's or Lily's Grammar may be misprinted, or the writings of Cicero, Virgil, or Ovid, which were written before the Gospel, and yet we are past all doubt that the writings are not forged.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(517.) It is sometimes said that questions of genuineness are matters of mere idle curiosity, and that authenticity is alone of importance. In an historical work especially, what we want to know is, not by whom it is written, but whether the narrative which it contains is true. This last, no doubt, is our ultimate object; but it not unfrequently happens that, for the purpose of deciding it, we have to consider the other point; since the genuineness is often the best guarantee of the authenticity. How entirely would it change our estimate of Xenophon's "Anabasis," were we to find that it was composed under the name of Xenophon by a Greek of the time of the Antonines? No works are more valuable for history than autobiographies; and when we come upon a document claiming any such character, it is of great importance to see whether, upon examination, the character is sustained or no.

Given the genuineness of such a work, and the authenticity follows almost as a matter of course, unless it can be shown that the writer is unvarnished, and wished to deceive. Rationalists have not failed to perceive the force of this reasoning with respect to the Pentateuch; and hence their laborious efforts to disprove its genuineness.

—Rawlinson.

IV. ITS AUTHENTICITY.

(518.) The Papists receive the Scriptures on the authoritative, infallible judgment of their own church, that is, the Pope; and I receive it as God's perfect law, delivered down from hand to hand to this present age, and know it to be the same book which was written by the prophets and apostles, by an infallible testimony of rational men, friends and foes, in all ages. And for them that think that this lays all our faith on uncertainties, I answer, 1st, Let them give us more certain grounds. 2d, We have an undoubted, infallible certainty of the truth of this tradition, as I have often showed. He is mad that doubts of the certainty of William the Conqueror's reigning in England, because he hath but human testimony. We are certain that the statutes of this land were made by the same parliaments and kings that are mentioned to be the authors; and that these statutes which we have now in our books are the same which they made; for there were many copies dispersed. Men's lands and estates were still held by them. There were multitudes of lawyers and judges, whose calling lay in the continual use of them; and no one lawyer could corrupt them, but his antagonist would soon tell him of it, and a thousand would find it out. So that I do not think any man doubteth of the certainty of these Acts being the same as they pretend to be. And in our case about the Scriptures, we have much more certainty, as I have shown. These copies were dispersed all over the world, so that a combination to corrupt them in secret was impossible. Men judged their hopes of salvation to lie in them, and therefore would surely be careful to keep them from corruption, and to see that no other hand should do it. There were thousands of ministers whose office and daily work it was to preach those Scriptures to the world, and therefore they must needs look to the preserving of them; and God was pleased to suffer such abundance of heretics to arise, perhaps of purpose for this end, among others, that no one could corrupt the Scriptures, but all his adversaries would soon have caught him in it: for all parties, of each opinion, still pleaded the same Scriptures against all the rest, even as lawyers plead the law of the land at the bar against their adversaries. So that it is impossible that in any main matter it should be depraved. What it may be in a letter or a word, by the negligence of transcribers, is of no great moment.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(519.) Mr. Paine, after the example of many others, endeavours to discredit the Scriptures by representing the number of hands through which they have passed, and the uncertainty of the historical evidence by which they are supported.

"It is a matter altogether of uncertainty to us," he says, "whether such of the writings as now appear under the names of the Old and New Testament are in the same state in which those collectors say they found them; or whether they added, altered, abridged, or dressed them up." It is a good work which many writers have undertaken, to prove the validity of the Christian history, and to show that we have as good evidence for the truth of the great facts which it relates, as we have for the truth of any ancient events whatever. But if, in addition to this, it can be proved that the Scriptures contain internal characteristics of Divinity, or that they carry in them the evidence of their authenticity, this will at once answer all objections from the supposed uncertainty of historical evidence.

Historians inform us of a certain valuable medicine called Mithridate, an antidote to poison. It is said that this medicine was invented by Mithridates, king of Pontus; that the receipt of it was found in a cabinet, written with his own hand, and was carried to Rome by Pompey; that it was translated into verse by Damocrates, a famous physician; and that it was afterwards translated by Galen, from whom we have it. Now, supposing this medicine to be efficacious for its professed purpose, of what account would it be to object to the authenticity of its history? If a modern caviller should take it into his head to allege that the preparation has passed through so many hands, and that there is so much hearsay and uncertainty attending it, that no dependence can be placed upon it, and that it had better be rejected from our Materia Medica,—he would be asked, Has it not been tried, and found to be effectual; and that in a great variety of instances? Such are Mr. Paine's objections to the Bible, and such is the answer that may be given him.

(520.) I know that my learned antagonist, according to the policy of his communion, will call upon me to prove the genuineness and authenticity of the sacred Scriptures. He says we are indebted to Romanism for the sacred Scriptures, and that, if there had been no Roman Catholic Church, we should not have had the sacred Scriptures. Now, never be deceived by such gross fallacy. No man in this audience is likely to be deceived by subtleties and scholastic sophisms. There were many other Churches besides the Roman Catholic. There were the Waldenses; there were the Greek Churches; the Armenian, the Syrian Churches. There were many other Churches besides the Roman Catholic Church, the most corrupted of all churches of the world. Suppose now that there is at Hammersmith a water company. Suppose I was anxious to have my bucket filled with water, and made application; but suppose the water company came to me, and said, "Sir, you shall have no water from us; we refuse to give it you; or, if you do take our water, you must wear our livery, use our buckets, and observe that there is no water in the universe save with us." What would be my reply at the moment? "Why, gentlemen," I should naturally say, "there is the Grand Junction Company; there is the London Water Company; there is the Middlesex Water Company; there are five or six other companies, and I shall just take the liberty of dipping my bucket down into their streams, and fill it from them. So that I can turn away at once from you, if you keep to these terms, and yet shall be able to have abundance of water; I have only to go to the next water company, and I shall find an ample supply." Now, just so is it with the Bible and the Roman Catholic Church. My antagonist comes forward, and he says, You shall have no living waters from our company, the Roman Catholic hierarchy; we debar you from that privilege; or, if you do take them, you must just give us the credit of being infallible and unerrable, &c., &c. I will concede no such magnificent assumptions; I will just go to some other ecclesiastical water company contemporary with you, and I will fill my heart with living streams from them, and you shall not have the credit of having given me one particle.

—Cumming.

(521.) Take away the key-stone, and the arch will fall a heap of ruins. There will be the same stones there, but they will be scattered in confusion, and useless for any practical purpose. You may admire the Bible, you may praise its poetry, and you may say its precepts are truthful, loving, and good; but if you doubt its authenticity, you render it powerless for that for which it was given—namely, to save the souls of men.

—Aubrey Price.

V. AUTHORSHIP OF ITS BOOKS.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(523.) I meet men who do not believe John wrote John's Gospel. Well, what matters it whether he did or not? There is a forest in England, it is said, which William the Conqueror planted; but what do I care whether he planted it or not? If I can ride through it, why should I care who planted it? There are the trees, and there is the shade; and if I can only enjoy the benefits of them that is enough. Some men say that the Psalms of David are not inspired. I will not now dispute whether they are inspired or not; but I know that no other such hymns ever went sounding on through three thousand years of the world's history, developing power and sweetness as they went. They sang, and taught the world to sing. If they are not inspired they have an admirably good substitute for inspiration.

—Becher.

VI. VALUELESSNESS OF THE "HIGH CRITICISM" BY WHICH THE GENUINENESS AND AUTHENTICITY OF VARIOUS BOOKS OF SCRIPTURE ARE SOUGHT TO BE DISPROVED.

(524.) There is no point in which plain folks are more apt to be ridiculed by those coteries which give themselves fine literary airs than the judgment formed upon the works of great writers. To read the criticisms which constantly appear in periodicals of high literary authority, one might think that admiration is a faculty to be exercised only within certain limits fixed by these critical autocrats, and that any departure either to the right or to the left from the line of their ordinances, is a fault against good taste, and a proof of defective education. Nevertheless, it appears that critics cannot agree among themselves even upon such a question as, whether a certain poem is or is not in the manner of Milton, and is or is not a poem of merit. The other day, Professor Henry Morley wrote to the "Times" announcing that he had discovered an unpublished poem by the great Puritan bard, and sending the piece to be given to the world. It was found on a blank leaf of a volume of Milton's poems in the British Museum, and bore, as Mr. Morley avowed, the signature of "J. M." The Professor was delighted with his discovery, as professors are apt to be, and the critics began to express their opinions of it. One able, wary, and often severe literary censor laid emphasis upon the "subtle melody" pervading the lines, pointedly indicating that none but a great poet could have written them. Lord Winchelsea, however, himself a poet in a small way, boldly declared the poem to be rubbish, maintaining that Milton, unless actually in dotage, could not have composed it. Hereupon enters on the stage the assistant librarian of the British Museum, who affirms that the lines are not Milton's at all, that the signature is not "J. M.," but "P. M.," and that the handwriting is not Milton's. Professor Morley, with the warmth of a discoverer, holds to his point, and alleges the signature to be that of John Milton. Professor Masson, the biographer of Milton, writes to say that he has known the lines for years, but doubts whether they are Milton's. The controversy is of very slight importance, except as it brings out the perfect inability of critics to agree upon any standard whereby questions of literary merit may be tried. If you coin a sovereign in brass, every goldsmith in London will tell you that it is not gold. But when you go with a poem purporting to be Milton's to famous critics, one pronounces it melodious and beautiful, another declares that the man who wrote it must have lost his faculties, while a third affirms positively that the poet to whom it is imputed never saw it. And yet, though criticism is the vaguest and most vacillating of sciences—if it deserves to be in any sense called a science—no professor of chemistry, anatomy, or optics, dreams of taking so high and grand a tone as the literary critic. Each small critical Jove plays upon his own scannel pipe, and each imitates thunder. The moral of this debate is important. If English-speaking critics, the countrymen of Milton, sitting in judgment two hundred years after his death, cannot decide whether a certain poem is his or not, what likelihood is there that English or German critics, judging Greek writings composed eighteen centuries ago, are able to determine whether an apostle might or might not have used an expression which we now find in a Gospel or Epistle?

—Christian World, July 24th, 1868.

VII. TRANSLATIONS.

1. The Bible admits of translation.

(525.) Of all books the Bible loses least of its force and dignity and beauty from being translated into other languages, wherever the translation is not erroneous. One version may indeed excel another; in that its diction may be more expressive, or simple, or more majestic: but in every version the Bible contains the sublimest thoughts uttered in plain and fitting words. It was written for the whole world, not for any single nation or age; and though its thoughts are above common thoughts, they are so as coming from the primal Fountain of Truth, not as having been elaborated and piled up by the workings of abstraction and reflection.

—Guesses at Truth.

2. Their value and use.

(526.) Translation it is that opens the window, to let in the light; that breaks the shell, that we may eat the kernel; that puts aside the curtain, that we may look into the most holy place; that removes the cover of the well, that we may come by the water, even as Jacob rolled away the stone from the mouth of the well, by which means the flocks of Laban were watered. Indeed, without translation into the vulgar tongue, the unlearned are but like children at Jacob's well (which was deep) without a bucket or something to draw with; or as that person mentioned by Isaiah (xxix. 11) to whom when a sealed book was delivered with this motion, "Read this, I pray thee," he was fain to make this answer, "I cannot, for it is sealed."

The very meanest translation of the Bible in English contains the Word of God, nay, is the Word of God. As the king's speech, which he uttered in parliament, being translated into French, Dutch, Italian, and Latin, is still the king's speech, though it be not interpreted by every translator with the like grace, nor peradventure so fitly for phrase, nor so expressly for sense, everywhere.

—Translators of the English Version.

(527.) Bless God for the translation of the Scriptures. The Word is our sword; by being translated, the sword is drawn out of its scabbard. What use, alas, could a poor Christian that understands but one language, which his mother taught him, make of this sword when presented to him as it is sheathed in Greek and Hebrew? Truly, he might even fall a weeping with John at the sight of the sealed book, because he could not read in it (Rev. v. 4). Oh, bless God that hath sent, not angels, but men, furnished by the blessing of God on their indefatigable labours and studies, with ability to roll away the stone from the mouth of this Fountain!

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

3. Are valuable in spite of their inaccuracies and variations.

(528.) There are many texts cited in the New Testament from the Septuagint, where it differeth from the Hebrew; wherein it is utterly uncertain to us whether Christ and His apostles intended to justify absolutely the translation which they used, or only to make use of it as that which then was known and used for the sake of the sense which it contained. If they absolutely justify it, they seem to condemn the Hebrew, so far as it differeth. If not, why do they use it, and never blame it? It seemeth that Christ would hereby tell us, that the sense is the gold, and the words but as the purse; and we need not be over-curious about them, so we have the sense.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

4. Excellence of our English version.

(529.) No translation our own country ever yet produced hath come up to that of the Old and New Testament; and I am persuaded that the translators of the Bible were masters of an English style much fitter for that work than any we see in our present writings; the which is owing to the simplicity that runs through the whole.

—Swift.

(530.) The Bible is unquestionably the richest repository of thought and imagery, and the best model of pure style, that our language can boast. It would be difficult to discover in its pages a single instance of affected or bombastic phraseology; a circumstance probably arising from the subdued and chastened tone of feeling with which the translation was executed, and a remarkable specimen therefore of the influence exerted on diction by the moral qualities of the writer. Yet its very simplicity and unostentatious character are attributes which render it distasteful, in a critical point of view, to sophisticated and pretending minds. —W. B. Chulow.

(531.) Who will say that the uncommon beauty and marvellous English of the Protestant Bible is not one of the strongholds of heresy in this country? It lives on the ear like music that can never be forgotten, like the sound of church bells which the convert hardly knows how he can forego. Its felicities often seem to be almost things rather than mere words. It is part of the national mind, and the anchor of national seriousness. Nay, it is worshipped with a positive idolatry, in extenuation of whose gross fanaticism its intrinsic beauty pleads availingly with the man of letters and the scholar. The memory of the dead passes into it. The potent traditions of childhood are stereotyped in its phrases. The power of all the griefs and trials of a man is hidden beneath its words. It is the representative of his best moments; and all that there has been about him of soft, and gentle, and pure, and penitent, and good, speaks to him forever out of his English Bible. It is his sacred thing, which doubt has never dimmed and controversy never soiled. It has been to him all along as the silent, but oh, how intelligible, voice of his guardian angel; and in the length and breadth of the land there is not a Protestant with one spark of religiousness about him whose spiritual biography is not in his Saxon Bible.

—F. W. Faber (Roman Catholic): Quoted in "Dublin Review," June, 1853.

(532.) The peculiar genius, if such a word may be permitted, which breathes through it, the mingled tenderness and majesty, the Saxon simplicity, the preternatural grandeur, unequalled, unapproached, in the attempted improvements of modern scholars, —all are here, and bear the impress of the mind of one man, and that man William Tyndale.

—J. A. Froude: "History of England."

VIII. THE BIBLE AND OTHER AUTHORITIES.

1. The Church.

(533.) The Scripture is the sun; the Church is the clock, whose hands point us to and whose sound tells us the hours of the day. The sun we know to be sure, and regularly constant in his motion: the clock, as it may fall out, may go too fast or too slow. We are wont to look at, and listen to the clock, we know the time of the day; but, where we find the variation sensible, to believe the sun against the clock, not the clock against the sun. As, then, we would condemn him of much folly that should profess to trust the clock rather than the sun; so we cannot but justly tax the incredulity of those who will rather trust to the Church than to the Scripture. —Hall, 1574-1656.

(534.) He that cannot see this sun by its own light, may in vain think to go to find it with candle and lantern of human testimony and argument; not that these are wanting, or useless. The testimony of the Church is highly to be revered, because to it are these oracles of God delivered, to be kept as a sacred depositum and charge; yea, it is called the pillar and ground of truth (1 Tim. iii. 15), and the candlestick (Rev. i. 12), from whence the light of the Scriptures shines forth into the world; but who will say, that the proclamation of a prince hath its authenticity from the pillar it hangs on in the market cross? or that the candle hath its light from the candlestick it stands on? The office of the Church is ministerial, to publish and make known the Word of God; but not magisterial and absolute, to make it Scripture, or unmake it, as she is pleased to allow or deny her stamp. This were to send God to man for His hand and seal; and to do by the Scriptures, as Tertullian saith in his Apology the heathens did with their gods, who were to pass the senate, and gain their good-will before they might be esteemed deities by the people.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. Conscience.

(535.) Scripture, being the Word of God, has sometimes directly, sometimes almost unconsciously, but still really, been recognised by the Church in all ages throughout all Christendom as the guide of life. This office Scripture holds, not as the rival, but as the instructor and assistant of the conscience and the reason. God's other lights are not extinguished, but made to burn all the brighter, and give a truer guidance to man, when quickened by the Word. The written Word is like the stream of pure oxygen causing the dim natural light on which it is poured to burn up with a brightness and clearness which seems almost supernatural. The office, then, of the Word of God, is to make the conscience an enlightened Christian conscience—the reason an enlightened Christian reason. —Tait.

(536.) "The distinct uses of Holy Scripture, in all that relates to morals and of natural conscience, may be illustrated by the comparison of a sun-dial and a clock. The clock has the advantage of being always at hand, to be consulted at any hour of the day or night; but then the clock is liable to go wrong, and vary from the true time. And it has no power in itself of correcting its own errors, so that these may go on increasing to any extent, unless it be from time to time regulated by the dial, which is alone the unerring guide. Thus our consciences are liable to deceive us even to the greatest extent, or to give wrong judgment, if they are not continually corrected by a reference to the Word of God, which alone, like His sun in the natural world, affords an infallible guide."

3. Reason.

(537.) The telescope, we know, brings within the sphere of our own vision much that would be undiscoverable by the naked eye; but we must not the less employ our eyes in making use of it, and we must watch and calculate the motions and reason on the appearances of the heavenly bodies, which are visible only through the telescope, with the same care we employ in respect to those seen by the naked eye. And an analogous procedure is requisite if we would derive the intended benefit from the pages of inspiration, which were designed, not to save us the trouble of inquiring and reflecting, but to enable us on some points to inquire and reflect to better purpose; not to supersede the use of our reason, but to supply its deficiencies.

—Whately.

4. Modern science.

(538.) It may be said that as space is the sphere in which Divine power is displayed, time is the sphere for displaying Divine wisdom. And as power demands vast depths of space, immense fields where suns and stars may be spread out in their mighty masses and movements, so wisdom demands lengthened eras of time to unfold its plans in all their gradual developments and wonderful combinations. Over all these developments the mind of Christ presides. He is the God of history, and His wisdom is especially seen in the way in which the truths of His Word open out with a light suited to the requirements of every period. We do not speak of prophecies which meet their fulfilment, but of principles which spring forth to guide men, as the star came kindling out of the sky to point the way to those whose hearts were feeling after the world's Redeemer.

No crisis has ever yet appeared when Christ's Word was not ready to take the van of human movement. The truths in their particular application may have lain unmarked, or revealed themselves only to a few sentinels watching for the dawn, till some great turn in the life of humanity comes, and then the principles of freedom and right, and universal charity shine out so clear and undoubted, that men wonder at their past blindness. They were there centred in the life and death of the Son of God, and His wisdom is seen both in having deposited them ages ago, and in bringing them out to view at the fitting season. When so it is, we need not fear any want of harmony between the word of Christ and the progress of science. It is a subject that troubles not a few, but, if they would only wait in calmness, the wisdom of Christ will appear in this also, and God's revelation will be seen to step across the burning shares in its path, without the seeming consciousness of an ordeal. It was never Christ's intention to reveal scientific truth in His Word; but He has left ample verge and scope for it. The indentations of the two revolving wheels will be found to fit, whenever they really come into contact; and the only thing broken will be the premature human harmonisings which are thrust in between them.

—Ker.

(539.) One wonders how the men who now assail our faith can hope for success where Hobbes and Bolingbroke, Voltaire and Rousseau, David Hume and Gibbon, giants in genius and in intellect, totally failed. Christians, possessing their souls in patience and peace, may calmly contemplate the puny assaults of modern infidelity. There is little in these to fill our camp with alarm, or to make us tremble for the ark of God. Assailing the faith from new ground, infidelity undertakes to prove the Bible false from its alleged discrepancy with the phenomena of nature and the discoveries of science. But a few years, we doubt not, will show that though she has changed her ground, she has not changed her doom. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh, and the Lord shall have them in derision. Science may, as science has already done, guide us to a sounder understanding of some things in the Word of God. While she corrects any mistake into which the interpreters of Scripture have fallen, there is nothing to dread. Why do the heathen rage? The only result of using the facts of science to undermine the foundations of religion, will resemble that wrought by some angry torrent when, sweeping away soil, and sand, and rubbish, it lays bare, and thereby makes more plain, the solid rock on which the house stands, unmoved and unmovable.

—Guthrie.

IX. ITS FUNCTION AND PURPOSE.

(540.) It is never forgotten that we are moral agents; that we have powers to be disciplined and cultivated, and that our grand business here is not to gratify our curiosity, but to secure our salvation. Would not all the essential purposes of a revelation be answered, if it would enable us to secure the salvation of our souls? Should it be a serious objection to it if, while it did this, it did not also cast light on a thousand other points, however interesting and important they might be? And should we reject it, and spurn it, because there are many things which it leaves in the dark; many questions which are unanswered? Revelation to us is not like the broad and clear sun that sheds down its rays on the spread-out landscape, covered with smiling fields, and flocks, and hamlets; disclosing each tree, and hill, and house, and the winding course of each rivulet; it is, to use an illustration suggested by another, like the lighthouse that gleams on a dark and stormy coast, to reveal the haven to the ocean-tossed mariner. "It shines afar over the stormy ocean, only penetrating a darkness which it was never intended to expel." The mariner can see that light clearly. It guides him. It cheers him when the tempest beats around him, and when the waves roll high. It shows him where the port is. It assures him that if he reaches that spot, he is safe. It is all that he wants from that shore now, amid the darkness of the night, to guide him. True, it is not a sun; it does not dissipate all the darkness; "it is a mere star, showing nothing but itself, perhaps not even its own reflection on the waters." But it is enough. There it stands, despite the storm and the darkness, to tell the mariner just what he wishes to know, and no more. It has saved many a richly-freighted bark, and all that he needs is that it will save his own. It tells him there is a haven there, and that is all he wants; though it leaves him all uninformed about everything else. Beyond the distance where it throws its beams, all is midnight. On a thousand questions, on which curiosity might be excited, it casts no light whatever. "The cities, the towns, the green fields, the thousand happy homes, which spread along the shores, to which it invites him, it does not reveal." On a calmer sea, curiosity would be glad to know all about that land on which that light stands, and to anticipate the time when, safe from danger, the feet might range over those fields, "beyond the swelling flood." And so, too, all is dark in reference to that stormy expanse over which the mariner has sailed, and all around him, as well as on the land to which he goes; but shall he therefore reject the aid of that light because it discloses no more? shall he refuse its assistance in guiding his vessel into port, because it does not disclose to him all that is in that land, or shed a flood of day on the heavens above him, and on all that stormy ocean on which he is embarked?

So is it in respect to the Gospel. Man too is on a stormy ocean—the ocean of life, and night is very dark. There are tempests that beat around us; under-currents that would drift us into unknown seas; rocks that make our voyage perilous. The Gospel is a light “standing on the dark shore of eternity, just simply guiding us there.” It reveals to us almost nothing of the land to which we go, but only the way to reach it. It does nothing to answer the thousand questions which we would ask about the world, but it tells how we may see it with our own eyes. It does not tell us all about the past—the vast ocean of eternity that rolled on countless ages before we had a beginning; about the government of God; about our own mysterious being; but it would guide us to God’s “holy hill and tabernacle,” where in His “light we may see the light,” and when what is now obscure may become as clear as noonday. If these are correct views, then it follows that the Bible, as a revelation from God, was not designed to give us all the information which we might desire, nor to solve all the questions about which the human mind is perplexed, but to impart enough to be a safe guide to the haven of eternal rest.
—Barnes, 1798–1870.

(541.) Formerly the Bible was regarded as an encyclopædia—as a guide to all knowledge. Devout men have sought for authority in texts for every phase of conduct. The impression has prevailed that there was no element in life for which there was not some authoritative direction in the Word of God. It is true that indirectly the Bible touches every human interest, but it is not an encyclopædia, nor a universal text-book of knowledge. By enlightening the understanding, purifying the conscience, and changing the heart, truth prepares men for every function and department of life. But the Bible only attempts to touch the master-spring of character, and so to set men right with God, with themselves, and with their fellow-men. Having done that, it leaves them to work out the details of the various departments of life themselves.

Its office may be compared to a key which winds up a machine that has run down. It undertakes to bring man where he shall be qualified for all the duties of life. It does not undertake to teach everything that men do in the light; it merely furnishes the light to do what their circumstances and necessities require to be done. The Word of God is bread. Bread does not undertake to reap the harvest, or plough the field, or blast the rock, or delve in the mine, or fish in the sea, but it makes a man strong, so that he can do it.

“That is narrowing the Bible, and bringing it within a very small compass.” I beg your pardon; it is not narrowing it at all. Is not the key that winds the clock the most important thing that you can bring to the clock? Is not the clock helpless without it? It is a little thing, it goes into a small hole, and in turning it makes but little noise; but, after all, it controls the whole economy of the clock. The clock is wound up by it. Now the Bible is the key that winds up, and sets in motion, and regulates all human life and conduct. —Becher.

(542.) I hold that the Word of God as a guide in the formation of dispositions, in the regulation of conduct and character, in the founding of hope for this life and for the life which is to come, is a reliable guide, is a sufficient instructor, about which all honest men do in the main agree. But if you undertake to erect a cosmogony, and to say that the Bible lays down a perfect system, a complete scheme of philosophy; if you go beyond that, and claim that it prescribes a definite plan for a church, a church order, and a church government; and if you include in its economy moral philosophy in the form of theology, I say that the Word of God is not sufficient for these things; and men disagree about the Bible because they are undertaking to do with it what it was never intended to effect. Everything to its own function. A lancet for the vein—not for digging the soil; a telescope for the eye—not for sound; a cap for the head—not for the hands or feet. A table of logarithms in the sphere of morals would be a poor substitute for the Ten Commandments, but not worse than the Ten Commandments in navigation. Is an anchor not good because it will not travel like a carriage? Is a treatise on medicine not useful because it affords no instruction in geography or history?

—Becher.

X. A PERFECT AND PLAIN RULE OF LIFE.

(543.) If the Scriptures be an infallible rule, and “profitable for doctrine and instruction in righteousness;” i. e., to teach us to believe and do; it follows of necessity that they are sufficiently plain in all things necessary to faith and a good life, otherwise they could not be useful “for doctrine and instruction in righteousness;” for a rule that is not plain to us in these things, in which it is necessary for us to be directed by it, is of no use to us; that is, in truth, it is no rule. For a rule must have these two properties; it must be perfect, and it must be plain. The Scriptures are a perfect rule, because the writers of them, being Divinely inspired, were infallible. And they must likewise be plain; otherwise though they be never so perfect, they can be of no more use to direct our faith and practice, than a sun-dial in a dark room is to tell us the hour of the day; for though it be never so exactly made, unless the sun shine clearly upon it, we had as good be without it. A rule that is not plain to us, whatever it may be in itself, is of no use at all to us, till it be made plain and we understand it. . . .

It is not necessary that a rule should be so plain that we should perfectly understand it at first sight; it is sufficient, if it be so plain that those of better capacity may, with due diligence, come to a true knowledge of it, and those of a more ordinary capacity by the help of a teacher. Euclid’s “Elements” is a book sufficiently plain to teach a man geometry; but yet not so plain that any man at first reading should understand it perfectly; but that, by diligent reading, and steady attention of mind, a man of extraordinary sagacity may come to understand the principles and demonstrations of it; and those of a more ordinary capacity, with the help of a teacher, may come to the knowledge of it. So, when we say that the Scriptures are plain in all things necessary to faith and a good life, we do not mean that every man, at first hearing or reading of these things in it, shall perfectly understand them; but, by diligent reading and consideration, if he be of good apprehension and capacity, he may come to a sufficient knowledge of them; and if he be of a meaner capacity, and be willing to learn, he may, by the help of a teacher, be brought to understand them without any great pains; and such teachers

God hath appointed in His Church for this very purpose, and a succession of them to continue to the end of the world.

In a word, when we say the Scriptures are plain to all capacities in all things necessary, we mean, that any man of ordinary capacity, by his own diligence and care, in conjunction with the helps and advantages which God hath appointed, and in the due use of them, may attain to the knowledge of everything necessary to his salvation; and that there is no book in the world better fitted to teach a man any art or science, than the Bible is to instruct men in the way to heaven; and it is every man's fault if he be ignorant of anything necessary for him to believe, or do, in order to his eternal happiness.

—Tillotson, 1620-1694.

XL ITS INTERPRETATION.

(544.) In the waters of life, the Divine Scriptures, there are shallows, and there are deeps; shallows where the lamb may wade; and deeps where the elephant may swim. If we be not wise to distinguish, we may easily miscarry; he that can wade over the ford, cannot swim through the deep; and, if he mistake the passage, he drowns. What infinite mischief hath arisen to the Church of God from the presumption of ignorant and unlettered men, that have taken upon them to interpret the most obscure Scriptures, and pertinaciously defend their own sense! How contrary is this to all practice, in whatsoever vocation! In the tailor's trade, every man can stitch a seam, but every man cannot cut out a garment; in the sailor's art every one may be able to pull at a cable, but every one cannot guide the helm; in the physician's profession, every gossip can give some ordinary receipts upon common experience, but to find the nature of the disease, and to prescribe proper remedies from the just grounds of art, is proper to the professor of that science, and we think it absurd and dangerous to allow every ignorant mountebank to practise; in matters of law, every plain countryman knows what belongs to distraining, impounding, replevying, but, to give sound counsel to a client in a point of difficulty, to draw conveyances, to plead effectually, and to give sound judgment in the hardest cases, is for none but barristers and benchers; and shall we think it safe, that in divinity which is the mistress of all science, and in matters which may concern the eternal safety of the soul, every man should take upon him to shape his own coat, to steer his own way, to give his own dose, to put and adjudge his own case? The old word was, That artists are worthy to be trusted in their own trade. Wherefore hath God given to men skill in arts and tongues? Wherefore do the aptest wits spend their time and studies from their infancy upon these sacred employments, if men altogether inexpert in all the grounds, both of art and language, can be able to pass as sound a judgment in the depths of theological truths, as they? How happy were it, if we could all learn, according to that word of the apostle, to keep ourselves within our own line!

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(545.) Compare Scripture with Scripture. False doctrines, like false witnesses, agree not among themselves.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(546.) The Scripture is to be its own interpreter, or rather the Spirit speaking in it; nothing can cut the diamond but the diamond; nothing can interpret Scripture but Scripture.

—Watson, 1696.

(547.) An over-subtle scrutiny of the words of a sentence sometimes impairs our perception of its force. Nor are the inspired sentences of Holy Scripture exceptions to this rule. As by dissecting a dead body in an anatomy school you could gain no notion of the contour, general bearing, and power of the living body; as by bringing a microscope to bear upon the vein of an insect's wing you could form no just conception of that insect, as it disports itself in the summer sun; so by entering with too great minuteness into the language of Holy Scripture, it is possible to miss (or at least to apprehend but feebly) its great purport.

—Goulburn.

(548.) As many locks, whose wards differ, are opened with equal care by one master-key, so there is a certain comprehensive view of Scriptural truth which opens hard places, solves objections, and happily reconciles, illustrates, and harmonises many texts, which to those who have not this master-key, frequently styled "the analogy of faith," appear little less than contradictory to each other. When we obtain this key, we shall be sure to obtain the right sense.

—Leifchild.

(549.) There are many parts of Scripture that are, as it were, locks, and that are never opened except by some special key. We may read them, and read them again, just as a man may turn a padlock in his hand over and over, but it is not until some precise mood comes, it is not until definite experience is given to us, it is not until we pierce the Scripture with some particular line of thought, that it opens to us, and a passage that before has seemed simple and of no remarkable significance, is disclosed to us with such richness and with such wondrous beauty, that we are filled with surprise. It required just that peculiar train of experience. No other would have fitted the lock. A hundred keys may be brought to a door, but only one of all is good for anything. The others are keys, but they will not open that lock or that door. You may go with a hundred moods to different parts of Scripture, and there shall be but one that is fit to at all interpret any particular part.

—Becher.

(550.) There are thousands of men who enter the Word of God, the library of Divine knowledge, and find nothing. They bring nothing, and therefore they cannot find anything. This interprets the mystic saying, "Unto every one which hath shall be given; and from him that hath not, even that he hath shall be taken away." A man may be able to read, and there may be wondrous stores, and yet to him there may be nothing, if he is looking for something besides that which is provided. If he is looking for amusing tales, or for literature that shall stimulate a low taste, and give it gratification, when he comes out, he will know almost nothing of the treasures within. So men read the Bible, and think it a dry book. It is not a book opened to them. That is, they are not opened up to it. With strange wonder children behold the grandmother and grandfather who sit lost and rejoicing in a kind of rapture over God's Word; and stealthily they look to see what it is, and where it is; and when the grandfather or grandmother is gone, they open the book to the right page, and read the contents, and marvel that there is nothing there. The father reads it, and tears run down his cheek : the child reads it, and no tear runs down its cheek. There are psalms over which they that have walked through trouble hang in perpetual rejoicing ; others go to those same psalms, and to whom they are as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. There be men that find in God's Word all stores for the heart ; and there be other men that, looking into that Word, find nothing at all. Men find what they bring—that, the interpretation of which they have within themselves.

—Becker.

XII. TO BE READ BY ALL.

1. Because it is addressed to all.

(551.) Suppose a letter were addressed to a son in a far-distant land by his anxious father resident in this country, what would that son understand by such a letter? He would, at once, understand by it that it was a communication of his father's sentiments, and feelings, and anxieties, to him ; and that it was his immediate duty, as well as privilege, to peruse the letter, that by it he might learn and understand all the feelings and desires his parent cherished concerning him. This Book is a letter on a larger scale, sent down from the archives of heaven by God, our Gracious Father, beaming with the majesty of truth and paternal love. It is addressed, not to priests, nor to popes, nor to bishops, as such, but it is addressed to "all the faithful who are in Christ, to Greek also, and barbarian, Jews, and Gentiles, saints and sinners," and every one, without distinction of rank, of riches, possession, or of character. Every eye is called upon to read it, and every ear to hear, and every heart to feel, and all flesh to search, that all may find everlasting life. Let not priests plunder you, my Roman Catholic brethren, of the boon of the Eternal.

—Cumming.

2. Because its saving truths are comprehensible by all.

(552.) Only by long and tedious study can we see in all their wonderful fulness the harmony and order of God's works in the vegetable kingdom. None but the highly educated man of science can appreciate, as it is possible for the human mind to appreciate, the marvellous oneness in variety displayed by the creative wisdom of God in the world of botany. But it is by no means necessary to be skilled in science, in order to make use of the plants which grow at our feet and to see their beauty. It is not in the least needful for a man to know the terminology and classifications of botany, in order to learn that plants are nourishing as food and beautiful to the eye. The peasant who is totally ignorant of all science does not the less benefit from the use, whether for medicine or food, of those vegetable productions which God has caused the earth to yield for his good. Though a man know not the Latin name of a single plant, yet a flower garden may be to him a scene of the most exquisite enjoyment ; a woody dell, scent-laden with violet and hyacinth, may convey to his mind the most exalted notion of the wisdom and love of his Maker.

Exactly the same principle holds good in respect to revealed religion. Only the man of culture, who has gone through a laborious course of study, who has pursued his investigations to their source, can fully trace out and understand the detailed harmony of the various parts of the Word of God. In order to grasp a complete system of theology, much learning and still more labour in investigation are necessary. But, blessed be God, not the least learning, not the slightest superiority of intellect, is needful to discover and appropriate the leading truths of the Gospel. The way of salvation is so simple and easy that none need miss it. The road to God, through faith in Jesus Christ, and repentance for sin, is so plain that the most unlearned and ignorant may find it.

—Hooper.

3. And notwithstanding that some wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction.

(553.) It is too true, some wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction ; and so do some, for want of care in eating, choke themselves with their bread ; must all therefore starve for fear of being choked? Some hurt themselves and friends with their weapons, must therefore the whole army be disarmed, and only a few chief officers be allowed to wear a sword by their sides? Truly, if this be argument enough to seal up the Bible from being read, we must not only deny it to the meaner and more unlearned sort, but also to the great rabbis and doctors of the chair ; for the grossest heresies have bred in the finest wits. Prodigious errors have been as much beholden to the sophistry of Arrius, as the ignorance of Aëtius : so that the upshot of all will be this : the unlearned must not read the Scriptures, because they may pervert them through ignorance ; nor the learned, because they may wrest them by their subtlety. Thus we see when proud men will be wiser than God ; their foolish minds darken, till they lose the reason and understanding of men.

—Gurnall, 1617-1667.

(554.) The Romish Church alleges, as an excuse for withholding the Bible from the people, that it is liable to be dangerously perverted by the ignorant and by heretics. The example of Jesus demolishes this excuse. What course did He take when Satan had cunningly perverted the holy text? Did He abstain from further quotation of Scripture? What would be thought of a military commander who, because the enemy had stolen from him two or three pieces of ordnance, and was now firing them at him, should desist on that account from all further use of his artillery? The fact that the enemy was in possession of those pieces, would only excite him to redouble his exertions with the guns which remained to him. In imitation of Jesus, Satan had presumed to take into his hands that mighty sword of the faithful, the Word of the Lord ; but our Saviour did not on that account cast His sword away. This would have given the adversary an advantage indeed. Satan abused and perverted Scripture : but Jesus did not therefore cease to appeal to Scripture ; He set us the example of meeting and curing the abuse of Scripture by the right use of it :—"It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God."

—L. H. Wiseman.

XIII. HOW IT IS TO BE READ.

1. Frequently.

(555.) Surely, if men had the spirit of the apostles, or of those blessed angels which desire to pry into the gospel of Christ, they would not misspend so much precious time in petty and fruitless studies, nor waste away that lamp of reason in their bosom in empty and unnourishing blazes; but would set more hours apart to look into the patent of their salvation (which is the book of God), and to acquaint themselves with Christ beforehand, that when they come into His presence, they might have the entertainment of friends, and not of strangers. Men that intend to travel into foreign kingdoms with any advantage to their parts, or improvement of their experience, do, beforehand, season and prepare themselves with the language, with some topographical observations of the country, with some general notions of the manners, forms, civilities, governments of the natives there. In the Gospel of Christ we have, as it were, a map, a topographical delineation of those glorious mansions which in heaven are prepared for the Church; we have some rudiments of the heavenly language; in one word, we have abundantly enough, not only to prepare us for it, but to inflame all the desires of our soul unto it, even as exiles and captives desire to return to their native country. Now, then, if we no way regard to study it, or acquaint ourselves with it: if when we might have a sight of Christ in heaven, and every day have a blessed view of His face in the glass of His Gospel, we turn away our eyes and regard it not, we do as good as proclaim to all the world, that either our hopes of heaven are very slender, or our care thereof little or none at all.

(556.) Though the Scriptures were dictated by the Holy Spirit, and hold the lamp to knowledge and happiness, how many cast the precious charter behind their backs, or even trample it under their feet! "Though," as one expresses it, "God Himself has vouchsafed to commence author, how few will so much as give His work the reading!" The renowned Scipio Africanus hardly ever had Xenophon's writings out of his hand. Alexander the Great made Homer's poems his constant companion. St. Chrysostom was so fond of Aristophanes' comedies, that he even laid them under his pillow when he slept. Our matchless Alfred constantly carried "Boethius de Consol. Phil." in a fold of his robe. Tamerlane (if I rightly remember) always carried about with him the "History of Cyrus." Bishop Jewel could recite all "Horace," and Bishop Sanderson all "Tully's Offices." The Italians are said to be such admirers of "Tasso," that the very peasants sing him by heart as they pursue their country labours. The famous Leibnitz could repeat, even in extreme old age, the greatest part of "Virgil;" and one of the popes is said to have learned English, purely for the sake of reading the "Spectator" in its original language. How warmly does Horace recommend the study of the Greek writers to the Roman youth! Nocturnæ versate manu, versate diurnâ. How, then, ought Christians to study the Book of God? Beza, at upwards of eighty years of age, could repeat the whole of St. Paul's Epistles in the original Greek, and all the Psalms in Hebrew; and even more lately, the learned Witsius, at a very advanced period of life, could recite almost any passage of Scripture in its proper Hebrew or Greek, together with the contexts and criticisms of the best commentators. How will such persons rise in judgment against the negligent professors, the many superficial divines, and the flimsy infidels of the present day! Time has been, when the Word of the Lord was precious in this land, so precious that in the reign of Henry VIII. an honest farmer once gave a cart-load of hay for one leaf of St. James's Epistle in English. Now, indeed, through the goodness of God, the manna of His Word lies in abundance round our tents. But what is the consequence? Most of us are for reading any book, except that which can make us wise to salvation. We disrelish even the bread of life: I almost said we spurn it away with our feet. Hence our spiritual declensions. May we not address the generality of Christians, so called, in the words of Mr. Boston? "The dust on one hand, or the finery on the other, about your Bibles, is a witness now, and will at the last day be a witness, of the enmity of your hearts against Christ as a prophet."

2. Not merely as a duty, but as a necessity.

(557.) To read the Word is no ordinary duty, but the mother of all duty, enlightening the eyes and converting the soul, and creating that very conscience to which we would subject it. We take our meat, not by duty—the body must go down to dust without it—therefore we persevere, because we love to exist. So also the Word of God is the bread of life, the good of all spiritual action, without which the soul will go down—if not to instant annihilation—to the wretched abyss of spiritual and eternal death.

—Irving.

3. Not for controversial purposes, but for personal profit.

(558.) There are many persons, of combative tendencies, who read for ammunition, and dig out of the Bible iron for balls. They read, and they find nitre and charcoal and sulphur for powder. They read, and they find cannon. They read, and they make port-holes and embrasures. And if a man does not believe as they do they look upon him as an enemy, and let fly the Bible at him to demolish him. So men turn the Word of God into a vast arsenal, filled with all manner of weapons, offensive and defensive.

—Becher.

(559.) The Bible is God's chart for you to steer by, to keep you from the bottom of the sea, and to show you where the harbour is, and how to reach it without running on rocks or bars.

If you have been reading it to gratify curiosity; or to see if you could not catch a universalist; or to find a knife with which to cut up a unitarian; or for the purpose of setting up or taking down a bishop; or to establish or overthrow any sect—if you have been reading it so, then stop. It is God's medicine-book. You are sick. You are mortally struck through with disease. There is no human remedy for your trouble. But here is God's medicine-book. If you read it for life, for growth in righteousness, then blessed is your reading; but if you read it for disputation and dialectical ingenuities, it is no more to you than Bacon's "Novum Organum" would be.

—Becher.

(560.) I say to every young man, "If you read from mere curiosity, or simply to construct a system, you do not know anything about the Bible. Nobody knows anything about it until it is to him what a chart is on a voyage, or what a medicine-box is in actual sickness." When a doctor is called to the bedside of his own sick child, he looks at his medical book with a very different spirit from that with which he studied it when he sat in the academy of science, and listened to lectures, and heard about the relations of certain parts of the human body, and the effects of such and such medical agents, and the significance of such and such symptoms. These were all abstract matters then; but now that sickness has come into his own house, a practical question presents itself to him—namely, “How shall I meet this tide of fever? What shall I do?” He is in the wilderness, and there is no counsellor nor friend near. He has nothing to consult but his book. And how differently he goes to that book from what he did when he was simply studying medicine. It is his child; and if there is any succour he must find it. Now he reads for a purpose; and how sharply he reads, lest he may commit a mistake! And when he has cured her, with what confidence he goes to his neighbour’s children when they are sick of the same disease! And after he has succeeded in curing them also by following the same directions, he says, “Talk against that book of medicine? I tell you it has carried me through many difficult places.” It is the medicating power of the Bible that gives it its value. I do not ignore its beautiful historical statements; these things are admirable; but it is in the wisdom and power of God to the salvation of a man’s innermost self, that its worth consists. It is its secret power on conscience and faith and hope. Men know about the Bible; they have felt it; and that is clear evidence, and evidence that cannot be taken away from them. —Becher.

4. As a letter from our heavenly Father.

(561.) Read the Scripture, not only as a history, but as a love-letter sent to you from God, which may affect your hearts. —Watson, 1696.

5. With a consciousness and constant remembrance of our great need of it.

(562.) If any of you have hitherto been reading the Word of God as a book of curiosity, I beseech you to remember that it is not made known to you for the purpose of curiosity. It is made known to you to be your guide from sin, from sorrow, from earthly trouble, toward immortality, and toward glory. “All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.”

Ah! the way a man reads the Bible—how much that depends upon his necessity! I have unrolled the chart of the coast many and many a time, particularly in these latter days, since there has been so much interest attached to it. I have gone along down my finger, and followed the shoals and depths in and out of this harbour and that, and imagined a lighthouse here and a lighthouse there, that were marked on the chart, and have looked at the inland country lining the shore, and it has been a matter of interest to me to be sure. But suppose I had been in that equinoctial gale that blew with such violence, and had had the command of a ship off the coast of Cape Hatteras, and the lighthouse had not been in sight, and my spars had been split, and my rigging had been disarranged, and my sails had been blown away, and I had had all I could do to keep the ship out of a trough of the sea, and I had been trying to make some harbour, how would I have enrolled the chart, and with two men to help me to hold it, on account of the rolling and staggering of the vessel, looked at all the signs and endeavoured to find out where I was.

Now when I sit in my house, where there is no gale, and with no ship, and read my chart out of curiosity, I read it as you sometimes read your Bible. You say, “Here is the headland of depravity, and there is a lighthouse—‘Born again;’ and here is the channel of duty.” And yet every one of you has charge of a ship—the human soul. Evil passions are fierce winds that are driving it. This Bible is God’s chart for you to steer by, to keep you from the bottom of the sea, and to show you where the harbour is, and how to reach it without running on rocks or bars.

It is the book of life; it is the book of everlasting life; so take heed how you read it. In reading it, see that you have the truth, and not the mere semblance of it. You cannot live without it. You die for ever unless you have it to teach you what are your relations to God and eternity. May God guide you away from all cunning appearances of truth set to deceive men, and make you love the real truth! Above all other things, may God make you honest in interpreting it, and applying it to your daily life and disposition! —Becher.

6. With reverent docility.

(563.) Open the Bible with holy reverence as the Book of God, indited by the Holy Ghost. Remember that the doctrine of the New Testament was revealed by the Son of God, who was purposely sent from heaven to be the light of the world, and to make known to men the will of God, and the matters of their salvation. Bethink you well, if God should but send a book or letter to you by an angel, how reverently you would receive it! How carefully you would peruse it; and regard it above all the books in the world! And how much rather should you do so, by that book which is indited by the Holy Ghost, and recorleth the doctrine of Christ Himself, whose authority is greater than the angels! Read it not therefore as a common book, with a common and irreverent heart; but in the dread and love of God the author.

Remember that it is the will and testament of your Lord, and the covenant of most full and gracious promises; which all your comforts, and all your hopes of pardon and everlasting life are built upon. Read it, therefore, with love and great delight. Value it a thousandfold more than you would do the letters of your dearest friend, or the deeds by which you hold your lands; or anything else of low concernment. If the law were sweeter to David than honey, and better than thousands of gold and silver, and was his delight and meditation all the day; oh, what should be the sweet and precious Gospel to us!

Remember that it is a doctrine of unseen things, and of the greatest mysteries; and therefore come not to it with arrogance as a judge, but with humility as a learner or disciple: and if anything seem difficult or improbable to you, suspect your own unfurnished understanding, and not the sacred Word of God. If a learner in any art or science, will suspect his teacher and his books, whenever he is stalled, or meeteth with that which seemeth unlikely to him, his pride would keep possession for his ignorance, and his folly were like to be unenviable. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(564.) One way of reading the Bible with advantage is to pay it great homage; so that when we come to any part which we cannot connect with other passages, we must conclude that this arises from our ignorance, but that the seeming contrarieties are in themselves quite reconcilable.

—Cecil, 1740-1810.

(565.) When we read the Bible we must always remember that, like the holy waters seen by Ezekiel (chap. xlvii.), it is in some places up "to the ankles," in others, up "to the knees, in others," up "to the loins;" and in some, "a river" too deep to be fathomed, and that "cannot be passed over." There is light enough to guide the humble and teachable to heaven, and obscurity enough to confound the unbeliever.

—Cecil, 1740-1810.

(566.) The Bible scorns to be treated scientifically. After all your accurate statements it will leave you aground. The Bible does not come round and ask our opinion of its contents. It proposes to us a constitution of grace, which we are to receive though we do not wholly comprehend it. Numberless questions may be started on the various parts of this constitution. Much of it I cannot understand, even of what respects myself; but I am called to act on it. And this is agreeable to analogy. My child will ask me questions on the fitness or unfitness of what I enjoin, but I silence him:—"You are not yet able to comprehend this; your business is to believe me, and obey me." —Cecil, 1740-1810.

(567.) The system of reasoning from our own conjectures as to the necessity of the Most High doing so and so, tends to lead a man to proceed from the rejection of his own form of Christianity to a rejection of revelation altogether. But does it stop here? Does not the same system lead naturally to Atheism also? Experience shows that that consequence, which reason might have anticipated, does often actually take place.

—It hutely.

7. Comprehensively and continuously.

(568.) Walk all up and down this Bible domain. Try every path. Plunge in at the prophecies and come out at the epistles. Go with the patriarchs, until you meet the evangelists. Rummage and ransack, as children who are not satisfied when they come to a new house, until they know what is in every room, and into what every door opens. Open every jewel-casket. Examine the skylights. For ever be asking questions. Put to a higher use than was intended the Oriental proverb, "Hold all the skirts of thy mantle extended when heaven is raining gold."

Passing from Cologne to Bonn on the Rhine, the scenery is comparatively tame. But from Bonn to Mayence it is enchanting. You sit on deck, and feel as if this last flash of beauty must exhaust the scene; but in a moment there is a turn of the river, which covers up the former view with more luxuriant vineyards, and more defiant castles, and bolder bluffs, vine-wreathed, and grapes so ripe that if the hills be touched they would bleed their rich life away into the bowels of Bingen and Hockheimer. Here and there there are streams of water melting into the river, like smaller joys swallowed in the bosom of a great gladness. And when night begins to throw its black mantle over the shoulder of the hills, and you are approaching disembarkation at Mayence, the lights along the shore fairly bewitch the scene with their beauty, giving one a thrill that he feels but once, yet that lasts him for ever. So this river of God's Word is not a straight stream, but a winding splendour—at every turn new wonders to attract, still riper vintage pressing to the brink, and crowded with castles of strength—Stolzenfels and Johannisberger as nothing compared with the strong tower into which the righteous run and are saved—and our disembarkation at last, in the evening, amid the lights that gleam from the shore of heaven. The trouble is that the vast majority of Bible voyagers stop at Cologne, where the chief glories begin.

The sea of God's Word is not like Gennesaret, twelve miles by six, but boundless; and in any one direction you can sail on for ever. Why then confine yourself to a short psalm, or to a few verses of an epistle? The largest fish are not near the shore. Hoist all sail to the winds of heaven. Take hold of both oars and pull away. Be like some of the whalers that go off from New Bedford or Portsmouth to be gone for two or three years. Yea, calculate on a lifetime voyage. You do not want to land until you land in heaven. Sail away, O ye mariners, for eternity. Launch out into the deep.

—Ialmage.

(569.) A man of little leisure like the shepherd of Salisbury Plain may be glad to snatch for his morning meal a promise or a proverb, the verse of a psalm or a sentence from a gospel. But even the busiest man will find occasional opportunities for more extensive reading; and on some quiet evening or in the seclusion of the Sabbath, you could not do better than sit down to the Bible as you would to a theological treatise or a volume of Christian biography, with your mind made up to a deliberate and straightforward perusal. With this view you may select the history of Joseph, or Samson, or David, or Solomon; the Journeys of the Israelites; the Missionary Excursions of St. Paul; or you may resolve to master a century of Hebrew history, connecting with recorded events the contemporary prophecies, or you may determine to read right through a Gospel Narrative, or the whole writings of some apostle. And just as you find the charms of continuity and completeness enhance all the other attractions of an ordinary book—so, in perfect harmony with devout and reverential feelings, will the course of the narrative, the development of the leading ideas, the progress of the argument, enlist your interest and quicken your perceptive powers. Indeed, there are many of the inspired writings with which it is hardly fair to deal otherwise. To take the analogous case,—when you have only a minute to spare, you may run your eye over a hymn of Cowper or a "Thought" of Pascal, and at once glean something memorable, but you would hardly think it justice to a Sermon of Horsley, or a Biography of Walton, or a Drama of Racine, to read it at the rate of two pages a day; yet this is the treatment usually given to the kindred compositions contained in the Sacred Volume.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

8. With prayerful meditation.

ing its graceful activity, for it is plainly getting over a great deal of ground. But, in the same field there is another worker, whose brown vest and business-like straightforward flight may not have arrested your eye. His fluttering neighbour darts down here and there, and sips elegantly wherever he can find a drop of ready nectar; but this dingy plodder makes a point of alighting everywhere, and wherever he alights he either finds honey or makes it. If the flower-cup be deep, he goes down to the bottom; if its dragon-mouth be shut, he thrusts its lips asunder; and if the nectar be peculiar or recondite, he explores all about till he discovers it, and then having ascertained the knack of it, joyful as one who has found great spoil, he sings his way down into its luscious recesses. His rival, of the painted velvet wing, has no patience for such dull and long-winded details. But what is the end? Why, the one died last October along with the flowers; the other is warm in his hive to-night, amidst the fragrant stores which he gathered beneath the bright beams of summer.

Reader, to which do you belong?—the butterflies or bees? Do you search the Scriptures, or do you only skim them? Do you dwell on a passage till you bring out some meaning, or till you can carry away some memorable truth or immediate lesson? or do you flit along on heedless wing, only on the lookout for novelty, and too frivolous to explore or ponder the Scriptures? Does the Word of God dwell in you so richly, that in the vigils of a restless night, or in the bookless solitude of a sick room, or in the winter of old age or exclusion from ordinances, its treasured truths would perpetuate summer round you, and give you meat to eat which the world knows not of? —Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(571.) I think as there are always among violets some that are very much sweeter to us than others, so among texts there are some that are more precious to us than others. When I go to the Bible, it is not once in a hundred times that I ever read a whole chapter for my own devotions. I turn to Isaiah, for instance, and run my eye down, and, like one that goes out into the field to rest, I do not take the first spot that presents itself, but wait till I find a nook where the mosses are right, and the flowers are right, and the shrubs are right, and then sit down and feast my eyes on the beauties around me, and take great comfort. I wander along till I come to a passage which, though I cannot tell why, I read over, and over, and over again. One or two verses or sentences, perhaps, will linger in my head all day, like some sweet passage in a letter, or like some felicitous word spoken by a friend, coming and going, coming and going, all the time. I find often that one single text, taking possession of the mind in the morning, and ringing through it during the whole day, does me more good than the reading of a whole chapter. Sometimes, when I am hungry for Scripture reading, I go over one, or two, or three chapters; but it is because I want to, and I do it without thinking of doing it. But generally I am not inclined to take in so much. Frequently some one thing that Christ said fixes itself in my mind, and remains there from morning till night.

You may over-read. Persons want to be vigorous and strong, and they say, "To eat is the way to become so;" and they gorge their stomachs with food, and overlay their powers, and make themselves weak and stupid by excessive eating. And you may eat too much Bible as well as too much bread.

—Becher.

9. With appropriating faith.

(572.) Job uses the language of appropriation. He says, "My Redeemer." And all that we know, or hear, or speak of Him, will avail us but little, unless we are really and personally interested in Him as our Redeemer. A cold speculative knowledge of the Gospel, such as a lawyer has of a will or a deed, which he reads with no further design than to understand the tenor and import of the writing, will neither save nor comfort the soul. The believer reads it, as the will is read by the heir, who finds his own name in it, and is warranted by it to call the estate and all the particulars specified his own. He appropriates the privileges to himself, and says, the promises are mine; the pardon, the peace, the heaven, of which I read, are all mine. This is the will and testament of the Redeemer, of my Redeemer. The great Testator remembered me in His will, which is confirmed, and rendered valid by His death (Heb. ix. 16), and therefore I humbly claim, and assuredly expect, the benefit of all that He has bequeathed.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

XIV. IN WHAT SPIRIT IT IS TO BE CONSULTED.

(573.) When thou consultest with the Word, take heed thou comest not with a judgment pre-engaged to any party and opinion. He is not like to hold the scales even whose judgment is bribed beforehand. A distempered eye sees the object of that colour with which itself is affected; and a mind prepossessed, will be ready to impose its own sense upon the Word, and so loseth the truth by an overweening conceit of his own opinion. Too many, alas, read the Scriptures not so much to be informed by them, as confirmed in what already they have taken up. They choose opinions, as Samson his wife, because they please them, and then come to gain the Scriptures' consent.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(574.) The attitude of the human mind toward revelation should be precisely the same as toward nature. The naturalist does not attempt to mould the mountains to his patterns; and the theologian must not strive to pre-figure the Scriptures to his private opinions. The mountain is an object positive, fixed, and entirely independent of the eye that looks upon it; and that mass of truth which is contained in the Christian Scriptures is also an object, positive, fixed, and entirely independent of the individual mind that contemplates it. The crystalline humour of the eye is confessedly passive in relation to the mountain mass that looms up before it in majesty and in glory. It receives an impression and experiences a sensation, not mechanically or chemically indeed, as wax melts before fire, or as an alkali effervesces under an acid, yet inevitably and in accordance with the real and independent nature of the mountain. And the moral mind of man, in relation to the moral truth of God which is set over against it in revelation, should in like manner be recipient, and take an impression that issues inevitably from the nature and qualities of fixed and eternal truth. Neither in the instance of the eye nor of the mind is the function that of authorship or origination; it is that of living reciprocity and acquiescence. In the presence of both nature and revelation, man, as Lord Bacon phrases it, is a minister and interpreter, and not a creator and lord.

—Shedd.

XV. HOW IT IS TO BE TREATED BY US.

1. It must be loved for its purity.

(575.) "Thy Word is very pure, therefore Thy servant loveth it." Hypocrites will now and then relish the comfort of the Gospel, be affected with the Word, because it speaks such good things to poor sinners: but God's children love the Word for its purity. 'Tis not comfort only must draw our love, but holiness. This argues the life and power of grace, when we would not have the law of God less strict than it is, but love it for this very reason, because it is strict and holy. You would not think a beggar loves you, because he likes your alms, but is loth to stay with you for your service, and live under the orderly government of your family. Most men's love to the Word is such, they delight in the comfort of it as an alms, but hate the duty of it as a task; they had rather let the duties of it alone; if it could be without danger. Oh, but when your heart consents to the purity of the law, and you would choose that life which it points out to you, rather than any life in the world, or the most absolute freedom that the heart of man can imagine, so that you love your Master the more because He has appointed such work; this is true affection to God and His Word.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

2. It must be diligently studied.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(577.) "Search the Scriptures." Indeed were there not such an express word for this duty, yet the very penning of them, with the end for which they are writ considered, would impose the duty upon us. When a law is enacted by a prince or state, for their subjects to obey, the very promulgation of it is enough to oblige the people to take notice of it. Neither will it serve a subject's turn that breaks this law, to say he was ignorant of any such law being in force: the publication of it bound him to inquire after it. What other end have lawgivers in divulging their Acts, but that their people might know their duty?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(578.) But you will say, "If we had so much time to spare as others, we would not be so unacquainted with the Scriptures: but alas, we have so much business to do, and our hands so full with our worldly callings, that we hope God will excuse us, though we have not so much knowledge of His word as others."

Is this thy plea that thou indeed meanest to use when thou comest to the bar, and art called to give thy answer to Christ thy Judge upon this matter? This is so far from mending the matter, that thou dost but cover one sin with another. Who gave thee leave thus to overlade thyself with the incumbrance of the world? Is not God the Lord of thy time? Is it not given by Him, to be laid out for Him? He allows thee indeed a fair portion thereof for the lower employments of this life; but did He ever intend to turn Himself out of all? This is as if the mariners, who are allowed by the merchant some trivial adventure for themselves, should fill the ship, and leave no stowage for his goods that pays the freight. Will it suffice him to say, There is no room left for his commodities? Or as if a servant, when his master asks why he neglected such a business committed to his care for dispatch, should answer, He was drunk, and therefore could not do it. "Why did you not read my Word, and meditate thereon?" will Christ say at that day. Darest thou then be so impudent as to say, "Lord, I was overcharged with the cares, and drunk with the love of the world, and therefore I could not?" Well, if this be the thief that robs thee of thy time, get out of his hands as soon as thou canst, lest it also rob thee of thy soul. The devil can desire no greater advantage against thee; he hath thee sure enough in his trap. He may better boast over thee, than Pharaoh could over Israel, "He is entangled, he is entangled in the Wilderness of the World, and shall not escape my hands."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(579.) Did men believe the Scripture to be the Word of God, and to contain matters of the highest importance to our everlasting happiness, would they neglect it and lay it aside, and study it no more than a man would do an almanack out of date, or than a man, who believes the attaining a philosopher's stone to be impossible, would study those books that treat of it? If men did believe that it contains plain and easy directions for the attaining of eternal happiness, and escaping eternal misery, they would converse much with it, make it their companion and their counsellor, "meditate in it day and night," read it with all diligence, and put in practice the directions of it.

So that whatever men pretend, it is plain, that those who neglect God and religion, and contradict the precepts of His Word by their lives, they do not firmly believe there is a God, nor that this book is the Word of God.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(580.) Not unfrequently the most precious things are the most difficult to attain. Iron, and coal, and gold, do not lie on the surface of the ground; they have to be sought for carefully, and with great trouble. The earth does not yield her choicest life-giving products—her corn, her wine, her oil—without much painstaking skill on the part of the husbandman. So with the Bible. Some of its highest truths by no means lie on the surface. They are there most certainly, and they are to be found; but they need patient investigation, and humble, prayerful thought, in order that they may be discovered.

—Hooper.

3. Must be used by us, as well as diffused.

(581.) Much praiseworthy zeal is expended in societies which have undertaken the business of enlightening the Gentile world; but is it not to be feared that while we are engaged, some in making, some in hearing, speeches on the subject of sending the Bible to the heathen; and while we are contributing our money and our influence to the promotion of so blessed an object, we may be suffering the page of God's life-giving Word to remain unread in our own homes? To participate in giving the blessing to others while we refuse to appropriate it also to ourselves, is as though the adventurous traveller, plunging into a deep, dark cavern, should place in another's hand the torch on which his own safety and his own life depended, and should take his separate way heedless of the unseen danger which he might encounter, the subterranean river on the one hand, or the precipitous abyss on the other. The madness of such a one would be sense and reason compared with the insane folly of those who, while they minister the Word of God to the heathen, suffer not its rays to fall upon their own dark path.

—Salter, 1840.

XVI. ITS MYSTERIES, OBSCURITIES, AND DIFFICULTIES.

1. Are not to be denied.

(582.) Those huge boulders which lie along the valley of Storo in the Tyrol, are of a granite unknown in the neighbourhood; they must have come from a great distance. Now it might be hard to explain the method by which they arrived in the valley, but it would be absurd to deny that they are there. Most unaccountable is the fact, but a very strong and stubborn fact it is, for there they lie, huge as houses, and yet perfectly alien to the country. There are truths in Scripture which puzzle us, we cannot understand their relation to other portions of revelation, they are mysteries, apparently alien to the spirit of other passages. What then? Suppose we cannot account for them, that does not alter the fact that there they are, and it would be extreme folly to deny their existence because they puzzle us. Rather let us find room for adoring faith where reason is lost in wonder.

—Spurgeon.

2. Do not extend to anything essential for us to know.

(583.) God has revealed great mysteries sufficient for saving faith, though not to satisfy rash curiosity. There is a knowledge of curiosity and discourse, and a knowledge of doing and performance. The art of navigation requires a knowledge how to govern a ship, and what seas are safe, what are dangerous by rocks and sands, and tempests, that often surprise those who sail to them: but the knowledge of the causes of the ebbing and flowing of the sea is not necessary. The mariner must be instructed in the nature and use of the compass, but a knowledge of the mysterious nature of the loadstone is not required of him. So, to believe savingly in Christ, we must know that He is the living and true God, and true man, that died for our redemption; but 'tis not necessary that we should know the manner of the union of His two natures. The discovery of the manner of Divine mysteries is not suitable to the nature of faith, for 'tis the evidence of things not seen; the obscurity of the object is consistent with the certainty of the assent to it; and 'tis contrary to the end of revelation; which is to humble us in the modest ignorance of Divine mysteries which we cannot comprehend, and to enlighten us in those things which are necessary to be known. The light of faith is as much below the light of glory, as 'tis above the light of nature.

3. To what they are due.

(1.) To our ignorance.

(584.) It is merely through our ignorance that the Scriptures seem contradictory. I thought myself once that some places were hardly reconcilable, which now I see do very plainly agree; plainly, I say, to them that understand the true meaning of the words. There are no human writings, but lie open to such conceptions of the ignorant. It is rather a wonder that the Scriptures seem not to you more self-contradicting, if you consider:—

1st. That they are written in another language, and must needs lose much in the translation, there being few words to be found in any language which have not divers significations.

2d. That it being the language also of another country, to men that know not the customs, the situation of places, the proverbial speeches and phrases of that country, it is impossible but many words should seem dark or contradictory.

3d. Also, that the Scriptures are of so exceeding antiquity, as no books else in the world are like them. Now, who knows not that in all countries in the world, customs and proverbial speeches and phrases alter; which must needs make words seem dark, even to men of the same country and language that live so long after. We have many English proverbs, which, if in after ages they should cease to be proverbs, and men finding them in our writings shall construe them as plain speeches, they would seem to be either false or ridiculous nonsense. The like may be said of alteration of phrases. He that reads but Chaucer, much more elder writers, will see that English is scarcely the same thing now as it was then.

Though the sacred languages have had no such great alterations, yet by this it may appear, that it is no wonder if to the ignorant they seem contrary or difficult. Do not mathematics and all sciences seem full of contradictions and impossibilities to the ignorant, which are all resolved and cleared to those that understand them? It is a very foolish audacious thing, that novices in divinity should expect to have all difficulties resolved presently, or else they will censure the Scriptures, and speak evil of the things they know not, instead of censuring themselves; when yet these men know, that in the easiest science, yea, or basest manufacture, they must have time to learn the reasons of them. It is usual with raw scholars in all kinds of studies, to say as Nicodemus did at first of regeneration, "How can these things be?" Methinks such frail and shallow creatures, as all men are, should rather be so sensible of their own incapacity and ignorance, as to be readier to take the blame to themselves than to quarrel with the truth.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(585.) What abundance of seeming contradictions in Scripture do rise up in the eyes of an ignorant infidel; as strange apparitions do to a distracted man, or as many colours before the inflamed or distempered eye. These self-conceited, ignorant souls do imagine all to be impossible which exceedeth their knowledge; and because they cannot see the sweet consent of Scripture, and how those places do suit and fortify each other, which to them seem to contradict each other, therefore they think no one else can see it; no, not God Himself. They are like an ignorant fellow in a watchmaker's shop, that thinks nobody can set all the loose pieces together, and make a watch of them, because he cannot : when he hath tried many ways, and cannot hit it, he casts all by, and concludeth that it is impossible.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(2.) To our prejudices.

(586.) The Bible never promises truth to the undevout and unbelieving. This being the case, we need not be surprised that he who opens it in a cavilling hypercritical spirit finds no beauty and sees no glory in it. We have read somewhere of an astronomer, who fancied one day he had made an extraordinary discovery. Looking at the sun through a telescope, he distinctly noticed a huge black body of some kind which seemed to overspread a large portion of its surface. Nor was that all. The mysterious object moved, and with something like awful rapidity. What could it be? Had some sudden and dreadful calamity befallen the orb of day? Was it being destroyed? The good man was alarmed and puzzled for a while. At last it struck him that it might be as well to examine his instrument. This he did, and the investigation soon proved fatal to the wonderful discovery. He found an insect on the glass! In like manner the difficulties which sceptics find in the Bible are very often in themselves. Let them examine the medium through which they look at the "Sun of Righteousness." The blots are on it, not in Him.
—T. R. Stevenson.

(3.) To our presumption.

(587.) I feel no disposition to stumble at the mysteries of Revelation till I forget myself. He who ventures beyond his depth must be drowned. There are some truths in my own affairs which, however I state them to my children, must appear to them strange and incredible; could they be presented to the intellect of a fly, they must appear much more so. There is, however, some proportion between the intellect of a man and that of a fly, but no proportion at all between that which is finite and that which is infinite. In viewing, therefore, the scheme of redemption, I seem like one viewing a vast and complicated machine of exquisite contrivance: what I comprehend of it is wonderful, what I do not, is, perhaps, more so still.
—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(4.) To our indolence.

(588.) There is also much diligence necessary, as well as time and patience, before men can come to so much understanding in the heavenly mysteries, as to be able to resolve the difficulties that occur. If you stay never so long in Christ's school, and yet be truants and loiterers, and will not take pains, no wonder if you remain ignorant. And yet these men will expect that they should know all things, and be satisfied in the answer of every objection, or else they will suspect the truth of Christ. Will sitting still in Christ's school help you to learning? Do you look that He should teach you, when you will not take pains to learn what He teacheth? You know in law, in physic, in the knowledge of any of the sciences, or languages, no man can come to understand them, much less to defend them against all opposers, and to resolve all objections, without so long diligence and painstaking in his studies as the greatness of the work requires; and shall every young lazy student in theology, or every dull, unlearned professor, think to see through all Scripture difficulties so easily, or else will he suspect the truth which he should learn?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

4. Why they are permitted.

(589.) Many people say, "Why does not the Bible settle a great many points which are perplexing to men?" They have an idea that a book which is inspired of God is to be a guide for the settlement of any moral questions that may arise in the lives of men, so that they shall not have the trouble of making inquiries on any subject which concerns their higher interests. You might as well say, "Why did not God make a garden behind every man's house, where all desirable plants should come up of their own accord, where weeds should be banished, and where everything should be in perfect order, without giving the owner any trouble?" It might as well be asked, "Why is not fruit provided with wings like birds, so that it might fly in through the window and set itself down on people's laps?" It would be just as reasonable to say, "What was the use of making things so that we should have to work in order to get them?" Many have the idea that, while things in this world were being made, they might just as well have been made plain to us as have been made obscure. But that is not God's creative idea. God meant that man should be for ever building himself, by thought, by feeling, by evolution; adapting himself to circumstances; sharpening this faculty and strengthening that faculty; lifting up and pulling down. It was the Divine intention that by an active process of education we should be developed from a lower to a higher state of being. In a world which is made on purpose to kill lazy folks, and to build up industrious people, in a world which has been made like a vast grinding-stone on which to polish and sharpen men by attritions, do you suppose God, in giving us the Bible, has given us a book that settles everything? Instead of being such a book, it is one which stirs men up, and requires them to form judgments of their own.
—Becher.

5. How to deal with them.

(590.) Common reason tells us that we must first have a general proof that Scripture is God's Word, and argue thence to the verity of the parts, and not begin with a particular proof of each part. It seems that you would argue thus: This and that text of Scripture are true, therefore they are God's Word. But reason telleth you that you should argue thus: This is God's Word, therefore it is true. If you set a boy at school to learn his grammar, will you allow him to be so foolish as to stay till he can reconcile every seeming contradiction in it, before he believe it to be a grammar, or submit to learn, and use its rules? Or, will you not expect that he first know it to be a grammar, and then make it his business to learn to understand it, and therein to learn to reconcile all seeming contradictions? And should he not in modesty and reason think that his master can reconcile that which may seem irreconcilable to him, and such unlearned novices as he is?

For my part I am fully resolved, that if my reason could reach to none of the matters revealed in Scripture, so as to see them in the evidence of the thing, yet if I once see the evidence of Divine revelation, I may well be assured that it is wholly true, how far so ever it may transcend my reason ; for I have reason to believe all that God revealeth and asserteth ; and I have reason to acknowledge the imbecility of my reason, and its incompetency to censure the wisdom of God.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(591.) Consider, how easily God can evince the verity of those passages which you so confidently reject, and open your eyes to see that as plain as the highway, which now seems to you so contradictory or improbable ; and then what will you have to say for your unbelief and arrogance, but to confess your folly and sit down in shame ? You know when any difficult case is propounded to you in any other matter, which you can see no probable way to resolve, yet, when another hath resolved it to your hands in a few words, it is presently quite plain to you, and you wonder that you could not see it before. You are as one who wearie himself with studying to unfold a riddle, and when he hath given it over as impossible, another openeth it to him in a word ; or, as I have seen boys at play with a pair of tarrying irons, when one hath spent many hours in trying to undo them, and casts them away as if it could not be done, another presently and easily opens them before his face ; so when you have puzzled your brains in searching out the reasons of God's ways, and seeking to reconcile the seeming contradictions of His Word and say, "How can these things be?" in a moment can God show you how they can be, and make all plain to you, and make you even wonder that you saw it not sooner, and ashamed that you opened your mouth in unbelief. How plain is that to a man of knowledge, which to the ignorant seems impossible ! If the certain event did not convince them, you should never persuade the ignorant vulgar, that learned men know so much of the motions of the planets, and can so long before tell the eclipse of sun or moon to a minute ; but when they see it come to pass, they are convinced : thus can God convince thee of the verity of His Word, either by a merciful illumination, or by a terrible execution ; for there is not a soul in hell but doth believe the truth of the threatenings of God, and the devils themselves believe, that would draw thee to unbelief.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

6. Are not to deter us from its study.

(592.) Many times when men do but hear, read, or think of some objection against the truth of God's revelations, which they cannot tell how to answer themselves, they presently begin to stagger at the whole truth, and question it on every such slight occasion. If any new difficulty arise in their way, they are in the case of Nicodemus ; saying, "How can these things be?"

If men were as foolish and incredulous in the matters of the world, their folly would easily appear to all men. When a man hath studied physic seven years, or twenty years, he shall meet with many new difficulties and doubtful cases, and many old difficulties will never be overcome ; and yet he will not, therefore, throw away all, and forsake his study or profession. Will a student in law give over all his study, upon every occurring difficulty or seeming contradiction in the laws ? If any students in the universities should follow this example, and doubt of all that they have learned upon every objection which they are unable to answer, they would be ill proficients ; or if every apprentice that is learning his trade, will forsake it every time that he is stalled and at a loss, he would be a long time before he set up shop ; on this course, all men should lose all their time, lives, and labour, by doing all in vain, and undoing again, by going forward and backward, and so know nothing, nor resolve of any thing.

It is most certain that all men are very imperfect in knowledge, and especially in the highest mysteries ; and there is none so high as those in theology about God, and man's soul, and our redemption, and our everlasting state ; and, doubtless, where men are so defective in knowledge, there must still be difficulties in their way, and many knots which they cannot untie.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

7. Are not to hinder us from exercising faith in Christ.

(593.) Many hesitate to yield themselves to Christ, because they cannot understand all that the Bible contains.

It admits not of question that there are in the Scriptures some "things hard to be understood"—deep and inscrutable problems which no human intellect can solve. This results necessarily from the weakness of our faculties, and the infinite nature of the subjects of which Revelation treats. It is to be expected that our feeble reason, which meets a thousand enigmas even in the affairs of this life, should find itself baffled and confounded whenever it attempts to grasp the mighty secrets of eternity. But "what is that to thee?" These mysteries belong only to the field of speculative truth—to those recondite matters of the celestial world which are wholly dis severed from thy present wants and duties. All that is practical, all that relates to the condition of man as a sinner, to the method of his recovery by the atoning death and justifying righteousness of Christ, and to the obligations which press upon him in these circumstances, is entirely plain and simple. How irrational is it for men to reject blessings of which they have a conscious need, and to disregard commands which they know and can comprehend, because there may be other points connected with them which their limited powers cannot fully explore ! You would ridicule the folly of him who should refuse necessary food until he could trace out all the hidden processes of digestion and nutrition. Not less absurd are you in refusing to become religious because you cannot unravel all the mysteries of religion. Whatever obscurity may appear to your dim vision to hang over the higher realms of truth, the fact of salvation by faith in Christ is clear and intelligible to the weakest capacity. What madness, then, is it to turn away from the gracious offers of the Gospel, from the plain duties that are vital to your happiness, because the scheme of redemption which propounds those offers, and prescribes those duties, may involve other topics too vast for your comprehension ! —G. B. Ide.

(594.) An emigrant is journeying across the great American desert to the land of gold and the clime of the sun. He is perishing with thirst. The scanty supply of water which he took with him has long been exhausted, and for many weary miles no spring or brook, and not even a stagnant pool left from the winter snows, has met the eye. At length, just as he is about to abandon all further effort, and lie down in despair to die, his ear, rendered acute by suffering, catches the low, faint murmur of a distant stream. Hope and the love of life revive at the sound, and with all his remaining strength he hurries towards it. But just as he is on the point of quenching his thirst, he stops and says to himself: "Whence does this water come? Is it from rain falling on the mountain top, percolating down through the fissures in the rocks, and bubbling out in the stream which I see? Or does its birthplace lie in some secret fountain deep in the heart of the earth? I do not know, and I will not drink of it till I do know." And so he turns away to encounter again the horrors of the dry and burning desert.

Do you tell me that satiety so monstrous is impossible? In relation to the supply of bodily wants it may be, but not in relation to the needs of the soul. Your own conduct is the strict moral parallel of the case I have supposed. You are in peril of dying from spiritual thirst. The necessities of your immortal nature cannot be met by anything within yourself, or in the world around you. But God has opened a Fountain. Christ has said: "If any man thirst, let him come to Me and drink." The waters of Salvation, welling forth from the Mercy-seat above, have descended into copious floods to refresh and bless the earth. And will you refuse to drink of the River of Life which flows full and free before you, proffering health and gladness to your famished soul, because you cannot discover everything pertaining to its source far, far away in the recesses of the Eternal Mind? —G. B. Ide.

(595.) In one of those financial convulsions which so often sweep over the land, you have lost your all. Dig you cannot, for there is none to hire you. To beg is useless, for there is none to give to you. Famine, gaunt and inexorable, stares you in the face. In this hour of your utmost need, an old friend meets you, and looking pitifully into your dim eye, lays his hand on your shoulder, and says: "Come home with me to dinner." You go with him to a splendid mansion. You enter a large and richly furnished dining hall. You see before you a long table loaded with food in every variety, from the plainest to the most luxurious. At the lower end, where you stand, the dishes are all simple, nutritious, solid, precisely such as your famishing state demands. And every dish is open, showing its contents at a glance. But, farther on, towards the head of the board, there are dishes of a more complicated character, reserved for a later stage of the feast; and these are covered, some with covers of tin, some with covers of silver, and some with covers of gold. Your host bids you welcome, and presses you most affectionately to sit down at once and satisfy your hunger. But instead of thankfully accepting his offer, you look along the table, and ask: "What is under the covers yonder?" Your friend replies that those dishes are not suited to your present necessities, that they belong to the dessert; and that when you get to them he will take the covers off. And again he urges you to partake of his bounty. But you draw yourself up haughtily, wrap your ragged garments about you, and exclaiming, "I'll not sit down to a table of mysteries," walk out into the cold, dark street, amid the howling storm, alone with your pride and your starvation. —G. B. Ide.

(596.) Let me impress this point by yet another illustration). A man falls into a deep well in the cellar of a lofty building, and without help must inevitably be drowned. From the ceiling above a rope is let down to him through the hatchway, and friendly voices call to him to seize hold of it, while strong arms are ready to draw him out. But instead of doing this, he complains that he cannot see the upper end of the rope, and does not know how it is secured. Those who are trying to rescue him tell him not to trouble himself about the upper end; they will take care of that; they have it fast to a beam in the roof; his business is to make sure of the lower end. Then he stops to ask, with what kind of a knot the rope is fastened, and what sort of timber the beam is made of to which it is attached. Thus, while neglecting the rope, he continues to cry, "How is it tied? How is it tied?" till the waters close over him, and his vain questions are smothered in death! Do you say that such a man would be a fool? Take heed that thou be not a greater fool. Thou hast fallen into a deep and loathsome well—"the horrible pit and miry clay" of impenitence and sin; and thou art in danger every moment of sinking down for ever into the "bottomless pit" of hell beneath. God has flung out from heaven the golden cord, the threefold cord, of the Covenant of Mercy. He has made one end of it fast to the pillars of His throne, while the other reaches to thee; and He bids thee lay hold of it, and He will draw thee up out of the slough of thy pollutions to the purity and bliss of His own presence. Dost thou answer, that the upper part of the cord is above thy sight, and that thou canst not perceive all the processes by which it has been secured?" "What is that to thee?" Enough for thee to know that the rope is fast, that the rope is strong, able to bear thy weight, and that of millions like thee. O sinner! grasp the rope—lay hold of it by faith—cling to it by prayer and thou shalt mount up, as on angel's wings, to the Paradise of God; and there, safe from the yawning abyss, thou mayest ponder through eternity the strength of the rope, and the infinite wisdom displayed in the mysteries of its adjustment. —G. B. Ide.

3. To whom they are unveiled.

(597.) As a merchant that is skilful in his profession will not show his costly merchandise unto those whom he well knoweth will not buy them, who come into his warehouse either as curious persons or as crafty spies, not with any purpose to buy, but to do some evil, but calleth unto him only those whom he knoweth to be willing to buy; even so it is the Lord's manner not to open the deep secrets of His Word unto them whom He seeth plainly to seek after them curiously, or with a corrupted purpose, to the end they may trample them under their feet, but doth instruct them only whom He is sure will profit themselves and others thereby.

—Cawdrey, 1598-1664.

(598.) Books in the arts and sciences may be said to be full of mysteries to those who have not a suitable capacity and taste for them; or who do not apply themselves to study them with diligence, and patiently submit to learn gradually one thing after another. If you put a treatise on mathematics, or a system of music, into the hands of the ploughman, you will not be surprised to find that he cannot understand a single page. Shall the works of a Sir Isaac Newton, or of a Handel, be thus inexplicable to one person, while another peruses them with admiration and delight? Shall these require a certain turn of mind, and a close attention? and can it be reasonably supposed, that the Bible is the only book that requires no peculiar disposition, or degree of application, to be understood, though it is designed to make us acquainted with the deep things of God? (1 Cor. ii. 10). In one respect, indeed, there is an encouraging difference. Divine truths lie thus far equally open to all, that though none can learn them unless they are taught of God, yet all who are sensible of their own weakness may expect His teaching, if they humbly seek it by prayer. Many people are, perhaps, incapable of being mathematicians. They have not a genius for the science. But there is none who teacheth like God. He can give not only light, but sight; not only lessons, but the capacity necessary for their reception. And while His mysteries are hidden from the wise and prudent, who are too proud to wait upon Him for instruction, He reveals them unto babes.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(599.) If an insolent coxcomb had been of opinion that Sir Isaac Newton was a mere ignoramus in philosophy, and had gone into his company that he might catechise, and afterwards, as occasion should offer, expose him; it is not unlikely that this great writer, perceiving his arrogance, would have suffered him to depart without answering his questions, even though he might know at the time that his unfavourable opinion of him would thereby be the more confirmed. Let us but come to the Scriptures in a proper spirit, and we shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God; but if we approach them in a cavilling humour, we may expect not only to remain in ignorance, but to be hardened more and more in unbelief.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

(600.) The preaching of the Apostle Paul was rejected by numbers in the cultivated town of Corinth. It was not wise enough, nor eloquent enough; nor was it sustained by miracles. The man of taste found it barbarous; the Jew missed the signs and wonders which he looked for in a new dispensation; and the rhetorician missed the convincing arguments of the schools. To all which the Apostle was content to reply, that his judges were incompetent to try the question. The princes of this world might judge in a matter of politics; the leaders in the world of literature were qualified to pronounce on a point of taste; the counsellors of this world to weigh an amount of evidence. But in matters spiritual, they were as unfit to judge as a man without ear is to decide respecting harmony; or a man judging alone by sensation, to supersede the higher truth of science by an appeal to his own estimate of appearances. The world, to sense, seems stationary. To the eye of reason it moves with lightning speed, and the cultivation of reason alone can qualify for an opinion on the matter. The judgment of the senses is worth nothing in such matters. For every kind of truth a special capacity or preparation is indispensable.

For a revelation of spiritual facts, two things are needed:—First, a Divine truth; next, a spirit which can receive it.

Therefore the Apostle's whole defence resolved itself into this:—The natural man receiveth not the things which are of the Spirit of God. The world by wisdom knew not God. And his vindication of his teaching was—These revealed truths cannot be seen by the eye, heard by the ear, or guessed by the heart; they are visible, audible, imaginable, only to the spirit. By the spiritually prepared they are recognised as beautiful, though they be folly to all the world beside.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

9. Disappear under a comprehensive criticism.

(601.) We are confident that the careful and minute study of the evangelists, in the light of grammar, of philology, and of history, results in the unassailable conviction of their trustworthiness. The process is one of those profound and unconscious ones which bring us to the goal before we are aware. The conviction that the four Gospels are organically connected, and constitute one living and perfect harmony, cannot be violently and quickly forced upon the mind. At first sight, the objections and difficulties fill the foreground; particularly when protruded and pressed upon the notice by the dexterity of the biassed and hostile critic. But as when we look upon a grand painting, in which there are a great variety and complexity and apparent contrariety of elements, it requires some little time for the eye to settle gradually and unconsciously into the point from which the whole shapes itself into harmony and beauty, so it requires wise delay, and the slow penetration of scholarship and meditation, to reach that centre from which all the parts of the evangelical biography arrange themselves harmoniously, and all contradiction disappears for ever. And when this centre is once reached, and the intrinsic, natural, artless harmony is once perceived, there is repose, and there is boldness, and there is authority. He who speaks of Christ out of this intuition, speaks with freedom, with enthusiasm, with love, and with power. Objections which at first sight seemed acute, now look puerile. The piecemeal criticism which, like the fly, scans only the edge of a plinth in the great edifice upon which it crawls, disappears under a criticism that is all-comprehending and all-surveying.

—Shedd.

XVII. ITS PROHIBITIONS AND THREATENINGS.

(602.) A single prohibition is so planted by God in the Scriptures, that, like a piece of ordnance, it may be said to enfilade and sweep a whole territory of sin; nothing can come within its range without challenging its thunder, and courting death. A single rule is said to contain laws for an indefinite number of actions; for all the possible cases of the class described which can ever occur. Like the few imaginary circles by which geography circumscribes the earth, he has by a few sentences described, and distributed into sections the whole globe of duty; so that wherever we may be on it, we find ourselves encompassed by some comprehensive maxims; and in whatever direction we may move, we have only to reflect, in order to perceive that we are receding from, or approaching to, some line of morality.

—Harris.

(603.) Though heaven be so rich a jewel that it needs no foil to set off its lustre to those who are clear sighted to behold it; yet in a merciful compassion to man the Gospel reveals what will be the recompense of wilful, continued disobedience—an eternal hell, wherein the justice and power of God are terribly glorified. And what is more powerful to excite the sensual and secure who despise the blessed hope, than the fear of an immortal death?

—Bates, 1625-1699.

(604.) They fall like thunderbolts, but where? I have read how a ship that rode the waters, armed with a broadside of cannon enough to sink any common craft, when in chase of another vessel, pointed her guns so as to send the shot crashing through the other's rigging, or leaping on the deep before her bows. Her purpose, not to sink the flying sail, but wing her; and compelling her to bring to, make her captive. She might have sunk the enemy; but in so thundering she sought to save her, and make a prize of her. And just so does a long-suffering God with those that madly flee from Him. Therefore the Bible threatens and thunders; not otherwise. But why flee? Vain the flight where God pursues; and worse than vain! He is willing to forgive; and what folly, what madness, to fly till, Divine patience at length exhausted, He ceases to follow! What then? The bolt, at first sent in love and mercy wide of the range, is shot right to the mark. Judgment, long delayed, overtakes us; and we learn, but learn too late, that whither He threatens or promises, as a God of truth, His word shall stand for ever. "Oh, that men were wise, that they would consider this in the day of their visitation!"

—Guthrie.

(605.) The Bible all through presses men with threatenings of punishment, and holds out to them promises of happiness to lead them to a new life. But this is to be remembered, that it begins its work with men who are sunk in sin, and that the essence of sin is selfishness. It must arrest and raise them by motives adapted to their condition, provided that these motives are not wrong, and enlightened self-interest, that is, self-interest which is consistent with the good of others, is not wrong. The Bible is too broad and human not to bring all fair motives into exercise. It is too philosophical to lose itself in the over-refinements of some modern philosophies which touch fallen human nature as a needle might a coat of mail. It has its still small voice, but it has its thunder before it. The sleeper must be roused to listen; and before the Gospel, and even with it, we must have Sinai's word, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." All through in the Old Testament, and also in the New, we have the principle, "If thou art wise, thou art wise for thyself." "Behold, I have set before thee death and life." We have every one of us felt the power of such appeals, and perhaps there is no stage in the Christian life when a man is entirely away from them. The Apostle Paul was fearful, "Lest by any means he himself should be a castaway."

But to affirm that this is the final, or even the prevailing, motive of the new life, is to mistake or misrepresent the Bible. If I rouse a man from the stupor of an opiate by force, and prevent him for a while from recurring to it by fear, it is that I may have an opportunity of going on to use reason, and the persuasion of love. By these ultimate weapons, and by the spirit which, with God's help, is at last breathed into man, my plan is to be judged. The Bible is constantly advancing from the domain of threatening and outward promise to that of free and unselfish love. Its strength of appeal from the very beginning lies in the mercy of God pardoning unconditionally,—a mercy which, when the clouds are severed, is seen to be the face of the Son of God, and the Man of Sorrows devoting Himself for those who had no claim on Him, but that of guilt and misery. He comes from a throne to a cross for them, and we see written on it, "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that God loved us." This love comes from a Divine Fountain through a human heart, that human hearts may feel the responsive throb, "We love Him who first loved us."

—Aker.

(606.) The Bible is a warm letter of affection from a parent to a child; and yet there are many who see chiefly the severer passages. As there may be fifty or sixty nights of gentle dew in one summer, that will not cause as much remark as one hailstorm of half an hour; so there are those who are more struck by these passages of the Bible that announce the indignation of God than by those that announce His affection. There may come to an household twenty or fifty letters of affection during the year, and they will not make as much excitement in that home as one sheriff's writ. And so there are people who are more attentive to those passages which announce the wrath of God than to those which announce His mercy and His favour. God is a Lion, John says in the Book of Revelation. God is a Breaker, Micah announces in his prophecy. God is a Rock. God is a King. But hear also that God is Love. A father and his child are walking out in the fields on a summer's day, and there comes up a thunder-storm, and there is a flash of lightning that startles the child, and the father says, "My dear, that is God's eye." There comes a peal of thunder, and the father says, "My dear, that is God's voice." But the clouds go over the sky, and the storm is gone, and light floods the heavens and floods the landscape, and the father forgets to say, "That is God's smile."

—Talmage.

XVIII. IS NEITHER INTERESTING TO NOR COMPREHENSIBLE BY ALL MEN.

(607.) [On a pair of spectacles.] I look upon these, not as objects, but as helps: not as meaning that my sight should rest in them, but pass through them, and by their aid discern some other things which I desire to see.

Many such glasses my soul hath, and useth. I look through the glass of the creatures at the power and wisdom of their Maker: I look through the glass of the Scriptures at the great mystery of redemption, and the glory of a heavenly inheritance; I look through God's favours at His infinite mercy; through His judgment at His incomprehensible justice. But as these spectacles of mine presuppose a faculty in the eye, and cannot give me sight when I want it, but only clear that sight which I have; no more can these glasses of the creatures, of Scripture, of favours, and judgment, enable me to apprehend those blessed objects, except I have an eye of faith whereto they may be presented. These helps to an unbelieving man are but as spectacles to the blind. As the natural eyes, so the spiritual, have their degrees of dimness. But I have ill improved my age, if, as my natural eyes decay, my spiritual eye be not cleared and confirmed; but at my best, I shall never but need spectacles, till I come to see as I am seen.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(608.) In another apartment of this great building of God is a room of titles and evidences of property. It is filled with legal documents. A lawyer going in, is filled with delight. "The very things I wanted," he says to himself. "Now I shall have light on mooted points." With what exultation does he take down and peruse the old, musty, dusty documents! Now he can trace the dim way of evidence. Now he can find missing links. Now he shall get the history of things whose origin eludes investigation. Hearing the lawyer's enthusiastic account of what the room contains, a neighbour thinks he will go in and have a good time. He goes, and takes down the black-letter documents, and yawns and gapes over what to him are dry and unintelligible hieroglyphics, and in disgust retires, saying, "There is nothing there for me." No, for him there is not. He does not want what is there; or, he has not in him that which makes it instruction to him. And so there are in God's Word chambers of evidence. One man finds there a title of immortality. He finds there proof that he is God's. He finds there the deed of an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away. But another man goes to the same place and finds nothing. There is neither proof, nor title, nor deed there to him. He is not prepared to improve the advantages that the room affords.

In some sky-looking room in this same mansion, you shall find astronomical instruments. An Airey, or a Mitchel, would make for this room at once, and would be filled with gladness. For here are those wonderful reading instruments by which the lore of the sky may be interpreted. Another man shall go there, and he will see only strange machines; and as they will not grind his axe, nor cut his meat, nor mow his grass, nor extract stumps, nor haul stones, nor answer the purpose of fighting, he will say, "What are all these machines good for?" You cannot make him understand that they are of any importance. If you tell him, "These are to gaze upon the sky with," his reply will be, "I can gaze on the sky without them." If you tell him that they reveal wondrous things to which the natural eye cannot pierce, and he attempts to use them, he cannot use them to any purpose. He does not understand them. Now, there are many truths of the highest grandeur that are in the Word of God just what these instruments are in this imaginary dwelling. To some they are the wisdom of God and of salvation. They disclose the eternal power and godhead of God. They reveal the mystery of the love of Christ Jesus. They open to the minds of those who know how to employ them the teachings of God's Holy Spirit. There are mysterious realms of which men learn by the use of God's spiritual astronomy. To others these truths are foolishness, because they do not discern them spiritually. It is the man that determines the value of these things. They are worthless to one whose understanding is not opened so that he can comprehend them; and to one who can comprehend them, they are invaluable.

Take another room filled with maps and charts. A common man looking at these things only sees pale lines, and dots, and figures. It is the repository of the military maps of the charts of the coast survey. All the hydrographic charts are there. But the man says, "They are neither printing nor pictures, and they are good for nothing." There are thousands of men that go into God's Word, and into that department which contains the map of the way to virtue and vice, to eternal life and eternal death, to whom it is nothing. But send there one who is waked up in earnest to make the voyage, and the moment he sees its relation to the thing which he is going to do, he says, "I would give all the world for that." One does not care for it, and therefore it is nothing to him: the other does, and therefore it is all-important to him. —Becher.

(609.) Unsanctified men cannot read the Bible to profit. If you bring me a basket full of minerals from California, and I take them and look at them, I shall know that this specimen has gold in it because I see there little points of yellow gold, but I shall not know what the white and the dark points are that I see. But let a metallurgist look at it, and he will see that it contains not only gold, but silver, and lead, and iron, and he will single them out. To me it is a mere stone, with only here and there a hint of gold; but to him it is a combination of various metals. Now take the Word of God; that is filled with precious stones and metals, and let one instructed in spiritual insight go through it, and he will discover all these treasures; while if you let a man uninstructed in spiritual insight go through it, he will discover those things that are outside and apparent, but things that make God and man friends, and that have to do with the immortality of the soul in heaven, will escape his notice. No man can know these things unless the Spirit of God has taught him to discern them. The Bible alone will not bring any soul to heaven. Shut up a child in a great ship; shove him out on the ocean; tell him to bring himself to some distant port. Can the little child, because he is in a staunch ship, steer her? Will he know the latitudes and longitudes? Can he take her to her destination? But if you put a pilot at the wheel to steer her, the little child will make a safe voyage, and go safely to the port that he seeks. Now, God's Word is an ark that is able to bear the whole world to the haven above; but there must be something to steer if it is to do this, and that is God's Spirit. Before men can avail themselves of the advantages of the Bible, the power of the Holy Ghost must teach them what is the meaning of the things that it contains; it must acquaint them with all the calculations, and reckonings, and methods of calculation spiritual.

—Becher.

XIX. IS PRECIOUS TO THE BELIEVER.

(610.) The Scripture is not only an armour, but also a whole armoury of weapons, both offensive and defensive, whereby we may save ourselves, and put the enemy to flight. It is not an herb, but a tree, or rather a whole paradise of trees of life, which bring forth fruit every month, and the fruit thereof is for meat, and the leaves for medicine. It is not a pot of manna, or a cruse of oil, which were for memory only, or for a meal's meat or two, but as it were a shower of heavenly bread sufficient for a whole host, be it never so great, and as it were a whole cellar full of oil vessels, whereby all our necessities may be provided for, and our debts discharged. In a word, it is a panary of wholesome food, against fenowed traditions; a physician's shop (St. Basil calls it) of preservatives against poisoned heresies; a pandect of profitable laws, against rebellious spirits; a treasury of costly jewels, against beggarly rudiments; finally, a fountain of most pure water springing up to everlasting life. And what marvel? The original thereof being from heaven, not from earth; the author being God, not man; the inditer, the Holy Spirit, not the wit of the apostles or prophets; the penmen, such as were sanctified from the womb and endued with a principal portion of God's Spirit; the matter verity, piety, purity, uprightness; the form, God's Word, God's testimony, God's oracles, the word of truth, the word of salvation, &c.; the effects, light of understanding, stableness of persuasion, repentance from dead works, newness of life, holiness, peace, joy in the Holy Ghost; lastly, the end and reward of the study thereof, fellowship with the saints, participation of the heavenly nature, fruition of an inheritance immortal, undefiled, and that shall never fade away. Happy is the man that delighteth in the Scripture, and thrice happy that meditateth in it day and night.

—Translators of the English Version.

(611.) Let a man live in awe of the Word, and make it his business to maintain communion with God; for this will show him the necessity of His Word for to comfort and strengthen him upon all occasions. A lively Christian that in good earnest minds his work, must have the Word by him for his strength and support, as he that labours must have his meals, otherwise he will faint. Painted fire needs no fuel, and when we content ourselves with a loose and careless profession, then we will not so delight ourselves in God's Book, and run to it for support of our souls. But when we make it our business, then naturally we will be carried out in love to the Word.

—Manton, 1620-1677.

(612.) The believing poor feel the use and worth of the Scriptures as an illiterate mariner feels the use and worth of his compass. The mariner, perhaps, has neither curiosity nor capacity enough to inquire why his needle takes a polar direction, or what the learned have to say on its observed variations in different parts of the globe; he knows nothing of the laws of magnetism, why iron and not lead should be the recipient of it, when or by whom it was discovered, or to what variety of purposes it may be applied; but this man knows, illiterate as he is, that it is by this needle only that he finds his way through a trackless ocean; he knows that by this alone he has escaped many dangers, and obtained many deliverances; he knows he can proceed safely only as he is directed by it, or take rest only as he attends to it; and that it will bring him home to his family and friends at last. Thus the poor take the benefit of Revelation, though they are not able accurately to maintain theories, nor answer questions respecting it, as a scholar might.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(613.) Like other books the charm of the Bible will very much depend on the frame of mind in which it is studied. To an earnest reader it will always be interesting; to a docile reader it will always be new and surprising. If you intend to visit the lands where gold is gathered you will peruse with avidity the publications which describe them, and which tell you what equipments to provide. Or if you are fond of some science, you will spend half the night devouring a treatise which expounds its principles, and you will feel richly rewarded in your fresh information or your new intellectual mastery.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(614.) The lifeboat may have a tasteful bend and beautiful decoration, but these are not the qualities for which I prize it; it was my salvation from the howling sea! So the interest which a regenerate soul takes in the Bible, is founded on a personal application to the heart of the saving truth which it contains. If there is no taste for this truth, there can be no relish for the Scriptures.

—J. W. Alexander.

(615.) We could not afford to dispense with a verse of Holy Writ. The removal of a single text, like the erasure of a line of a great epic, would mar the completeness and connection of the whole. As well pluck a gem from the high-priest's breastplate as erase a line of revelation.

—Spurgeon.

(616.) How full of blessed associations this dear Book is! I walked through the old streets of London, where every other house has a history such that one might well pause before it, and ponder for hours. I walked along the fields where many a grand scene had been enacted. At Winchester I visited the old cathedral. I went through it. I would live in it a month, if I could. The wide interior was filled with unimagined beauty and glory. That cathedral was built in successive ages; so that every part of the architecture, by the harmony of the varied materials of which it was composed, fitly represented how all forms of religious thought may be harmonised in one great community of the true Christian Church. I saw the tombs of the old kings. Greater than they were the three great architects who had constructed this mighty cathedral. It was a museum of antiquity. It was full of life. I trembled with sensibility. And the impression will never die out of my mind.

But what is that cathedral compared with this silent cathedral, the Bible, in whose aisles have sounded the footsteps, not only of kings and emperors, but, from generation to generation, the footsteps of the little child, and the mother and father of the household; and the footsteps of multitudes upon multitudes of worthies of the Church, all the way back, a hundred years, five hundred years, ten hundred years, fifteen hundred years; and the footsteps of uncounted heroes who have gone up to heaven consoled and enlightened by the pages of the Word of God?

XX. ITS HELP ALWAYS NEEDFUL AND AVAILABLE.

(617.) This is not a Book to be read by the lowest form in Christ's school only, but beseeching the highest scholar that seems most fit for a remove to Heaven's academy. It is not only of use to make a Christian by conversion, but to make him perfect also (2 Tim. iii. 15). It is like the architect's rule and line, as necessary to lay the top-stone of the building at the end of his life, as the foundation at his conversion. They therefore are like to prove foolish builders, that throw away their line before the house be finished.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(618.) Do you ever think, as you pass along the chapters of the Bible, that they are now like the king's highways; that more saints than tongac could count have walked along these pages towards heaven; that each verse has been a bosom like a mother's to some child in Christ; that each verse has had in it blessings for multitude of souls; that these passages of hope and joy have made melody for thrice ten million struggling souls; that these Scriptures are a sublime renewal of the miracle of the loaf which increases by using, and which feeds without diminution? These unwasting chapters have supplied armies, and multitudes of faint and hungry saints, but there is not a particle gone. There is as much yet for the famishing soul as when first they were set forth. To the end the loaf shall be broken, and shall yield a liberal abundance for every human want; and to the end the undiminished whole shall remain a witness and a miracle of the Divine spiritual bounty.

—Bescher.

XXI. FULL OF CHRIST.

(619.) Brethren, Scripture is full of Christ. From Genesis to Revelation everything breathes of Him, not every letter of every sentence, but the spirit of every chapter. It is full of Christ, but not in the way that some suppose; for there is nothing more miserable, as specimens of perverted ingenuity, than the attempts of certain commentators and preachers, to find remote, and reconдите, and intended allusions to Christ everyt.here. For example, they chance to find in the construction of the temple the fusion of two metals, and this they conceive is meant to show the union of Divinity with Humanity in Christ. If they read the coverings of the tabernacle, they find implied the doctrine of imputed righteousness. If it chance that one of the curtains of the tabernacle be red, they see in that a prophecy of the blood of Christ. If they are told that the kingdom of heaven is a pearl of great price, they will see in it the allusion—that, as a pearl is the production of animal suffering, so the kingdom of heaven is produced by the sufferings of the Redeemer. I mention this perverted mode of comment, because it is not merely harmless, idle, and useless; it is positively dangerous. This is to make the Holy Spirit speak riddles and conundrums, and the interpretation of Scripture but clever riddle-guessing. Putting aside all this childishness, we say that the Bible is full of Christ. Every unfulfilled aspiration of humanity in the past; all partial representation of perfect character; all sacrifices, nay, even those of idolatry, point to the fulfilment of what we want, the answer to every longing—the type of perfect humanity, the Lord Jesus Christ.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

XXII. PROFUNDITY OF ITS MEANING.

(620.) For my part, I do not like to see religious truths too logically defined; to define them, you must squeeze the life out of them; to analyse them, you must kill them. That is why I do not think it advisable to bind Christian instruction too much to catechisms; that is why I do not like to read too many works upon systematic theology. System is finite, whilst religion is infinite; and once I am in the sphere of systems, I am out of the sphere of worship. Let Christianity alone, shrouded in its own infinitude. For this reason I love the Bible so much; it leaves the impress, the stamp of the Infinite on all subjects; it does not attempt to define truth, to formulate doctrine; its words stretch forth till they are lost in realms far away. You walk the road and see a pool of water two inches deep; you clearly see the bottom. You look the second time and see a second depth, not two inches deep, but deep as the blue heaven above you; besides showing its own depth, it reveals to you the depth of the sky. In that little pool you can see the white, fleecy cloud, as far from you down in the water as it is high above you in the sky. The first depth is only two inches; but the second depth is commensurate with the altitude of the firmament. And, as we read the Bible, we are conscious of a double depth; the first shows you the immediate meaning of the writer; the depth of the verse is just the measure of his understanding. But look again, and you will discover a second depth, a second thought, a second meaning; it is deep as the soul of God, infinite as His reason, past finding out as His understanding. The Bible awakes the sense of the Infinite in the heart, and thus prepares for worship.

—J. C. Jones.

(621.) Texts such as have been thus selected from the inexhaustible mine of truth remind us of those singular formations which often occur in rocks, called Druse Cavities. You pick up a rough, ordinary looking stone, of a somewhat round shape; there is nothing specially attractive or interesting about it. You split it open with a hammer, and what a marvellous sight is displayed! The common-place boulder is a hollow sphere, lined with the most beautiful crystals, amethysts purple with a dawn that never was on land or sea. And so it is with many a familiar Bible text, when we examine it prayerfully and diligently. Its interior aspect, when broken up by study and experience, is widely different from the appearance which it presents outside to the careless superficial reader.

—Macmillan.

XXIII. OUR NEED OF THE SPIRIT'S HELP IN ITS STUDY.

(622.) The Bible is like a wide and beautiful landscape seen afar off, dim and confused; but a good telescope will bring it near, and spread out all its rocks, and trees, and flowers, and verdant fields, and winding rivers at one's very feet. That telescope is the Spirit's teaching.

—Chalmers, 1780-1847.

(623.) We can't tell it all. A little boy was born blind. At last an operation was performed—the light was let in slowly. When one day his mother led him out of doors, and uncovered his eyes, and for the first time he saw the sky and the earth, "O mother!" he cried, "why didn't you tell me it was so beautiful?" She burst into tears, and said, "I tried to tell you, dear, but you could not understand me." So it is when we try to tell what is in the Bible. Unless the spiritual sight is opened we cannot understand. In the light of this fact how blessed, how to be desired, is the work of the Holy Spirit! Ask, and receive.

XXIV. IN WHAT KNOWLEDGE OF IT CONSISTS.

(624.) Knowledge of the Scriptures seems to consist in two things, so essentially united, however, that I scarcely like to separate them even in thought: the one I will call the knowledge of the contents of the Scriptures in themselves; the other the knowledge of their application to us, and our own times and circumstances.
—Arnold, 1795-1842.

XXV. HOW FAITH IN IT IS PROVED.

(625.) Influenced by the unanswerable arguments for the Divine authority of the Bible, men often profess to believe it, but they do not yield themselves up to its influence—they do not appropriate its truths to themselves. When a man believes that the house above his head is wrapped in flames, he acts with promptness and energy; how can he then really believe the declarations of the Bible that he is exposed to the wrath and curse of God due to him for sin, when he makes no effort to escape, though the Scriptures that so plainly declare him guilty and condemned, point out with equal plainness the way of salvation freely offered in the Gospel?

(626.) The celebrated John Locke has a remark to this effect: the understanding, like the eye, while it discovers all other things, does not see itself, and it requires art and pains to see it at a distance, and make it become its own object. By looking, however, into a mirror, the curious and useful eye is represented to itself; and by attentively gazing at the Word of God, the mind may become acquainted with its own character, and behold its true portrait. And as the true use of a mirror is to represent those parts which cannot otherwise be seen, and to enable a person to correct and adjust whatever may require correction or adjustment; just so the Word of God is intended to expose us to ourselves, and to enable us to make those improvements which are necessary. With too many, alas! the discoveries which this Word makes are unattended to, and all its impressions forgotten. With others, however, the views it affords, and the directions it bestows, are carefully preserved and diligently followed.
—Salter, 1840.

XXVI. SYMBOLICAL DESCRIPTIONS OF THE BIBLE.

1. It is the sword of the Spirit.

(627.) "The sword of the Spirit." The sword was ever esteemed a most necessary part of the soldier's furniture, and therefore hath obtained a more general use in all ages and among all nations than any other weapon. Most nations have some particular weapons proper to themselves; but few or none come into the field without a sword. A pilot without his chart, a scholar without his book, and a soldier without his sword, are alike ridiculous. But above all these, absurd is it for one to think of being a Christian, without knowledge of the Word of God, and some skill to use this weapon. The usual name in Scripture for war, is the sword, "I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth," i.e., I will send war. And this because the sword is the weapon of most universal use in war, and also that whereby the greatest execution is done in the battle. Now such a weapon is the Word of God in the Christian's hand. By the edge of this his enemies fall, and his great exploits are done:—"They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb and the word of their testimony."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. It is a light to the feet.

(629.) To apply ourselves to the writings of the wisest heathens in order to our happiness, and to neglect the Scriptures, is to be guilty of worse folly than the barbarous Indians at Mexico, who though their woods abounded with wax, the labour of the bees, yet only made use of brands that afforded a little light with a great deal of smoke. Upon the most impartial inquiry, and exact search, reason will conclude, either there is no blessed end for which man was designed by his Maker, or the Gospel only has revealed it, and the effectual means to obtain it.
—Bates, 1625-1699.

(630.) A father and a son were on a journey. It was late in the afternoon, but still clear day when they came to a cottage by the roadside and the father went in and borrowed a lighted lantern. The young man was exceedingly amused, and perhaps he was a little vexed. If any one should meet them carrying a lamp in the sunshine it would look so absurd; and what in the world was the use of it? But the older traveller took the young man's gibes good-humouredly, and only answered, "The night cometh." And it did come. They passed no more cottages, but they got into a thick forest where the daylight faded so rapidly, that the lantern already shone a welcome companion. Not only was the sun gone down, but the last streak of twilight had vanished. It was dreadfully dark; but the good little lantern spread a cloth of gold before the steps of the travellers, and did not let one shadow or phantom come near them. At last the road divided. "Straight on!" cried the youth. "Not so fast," said the elder; for though the path to the right was less trodden, perhaps it was the one they should take; when fortunately they espied a finger-post, and holding the lamp as high as they could, they read the direction, and found that they would have gone utterly wrong had they not taken the narrow and neglected footway. Rejoicing at their escape they pushed on merrily; and by and by with his frisky spirits the youngster went ahead, and was far in advance of the lantern when the old man heard a plash and a shout, and running up was just in time to help ashore his impetuous boy who had soused into a stagnant pool, and who crawled up the bank pale and shivering, with the leeches and duckweed clinging to his garments. "You see the road was not through this pool but round it. You should walk in the light;" and so they again set out together. As the stillness deepened they sometimes heard a rustle in the bushy undergrowth, and distant howlings or a sharp snarl near-hand warned them that the beasts of the forest were abroad; and once or twice they could see a pair of fiery opals glaring at them, but as soon as they turned the full flame of the lantern in that direction the goblin retreated. We need not tell the whole adventures of the night; but at last they came to a place where a heavy moan arrested them, and searching in the copse they found a man stretched on the ground and badly hurt. He had either received a blow on the head or he had inhaled some stupefying ether, for at first he talked very incoherently. It turned out that as he had been coming along, a gentleman in black had prevailed on him to cast his lantern into the ditch, and that soon after some footpad had knocked him down, and dragged him off the road and robbed him of all his money. As soon as he was somewhat restored, they set him on his beast and journeyed together. The day was breaking, and the forest was thinning off on the margin of a magnificent domain. They looked forth on vine-clad hills and a shining river; and though the palace itself could be described but dimly,—it was so far up in the dazzling sunrise,—they could easily make out many mansions. "I am home," cried the old man; and the full morning was reflected from his face as he added, "Mine eyes shall see the King in His beauty; they shall behold the land that is very far off." And as he embraced his comrades he handed over the lantern to his son, and said, "Keep this as a light unto your feet and a lamp unto your path." The youth prized the keepsake. He found constant occasion for it. He brightened up the four windows, by which it sent its light backward and forward, and on either side; and with the point of a diamond he traced these mottoes on them:—

"Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto according to Thy Word."

"When thou goest it shall lead thee, when thou sleepest it shall keep thee; and when thou awakest it shall talk with thee; for the commandment is a lamp, and the law is light."

"We have also a more sure word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn and the day-star arise in your hearts."

"If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another; and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin."

—Hamilton.

2. It is a garden.

(631.) The Bible resembles an extensive and highly cultivated garden, where there is a vast variety and profusion of fruits and flowers, some of which are more essential or more splendid than others; but there is not a blade suffered to grow in it which has not its use and beauty in the system. Salvation for sinners is the grand truth presented everywhere, and in all points of light; but "the pure in heart" sees a thousand traits of the Divine character, of himself, and of the world—some striking and bold, others cast as it were into the shade, and designed to be searched for and examined—some direct, others by way of intimation or inference.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

XXVII. THE ROOT OF CHRISTIAN LITERATURE.

(632.) A son of one of the priests of Mysore, who had been aroused by reading a tract to deep anxiety for the salvation of his soul, travelled nearly two hundred miles to visit a missionary, in order to learn the way of God more perfectly. On one occasion he was much interested in reading Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." He said several times to the missionary who had taught him and given him the book, that it was better than the Bible. The missionary pointed him to the scene before him, and said:

"Do you see that beautiful mango-tree there?"

"Yes," was the reply.

"Don't you see the beautiful fruit which drops its nectar on the ground?"

"Yes."

"Don't you eat the fruit and enjoy its sweetness?"

"Yes."

"And where would that tree be if there was no root to it?"

"Oh," said the man, "now I see what you mean; the Bible is the root, and all the other good books in the world are produced from it."

The lesson was a timely one, and probably was never forgotten. Nor should we ever forget, while enjoying the sweetness of some work which the Christian press sends forth, that the Bible is the root from which it springs. Plant that blessed root in any soil, and by and by the luscious fruit of Christian literature will spring forth. Fail to plant the Bible, and we shall look in vain for all the sweet and refreshing fruits.

XXVIII. MUST BE ACCEPTED OR REJECTED AS A WHOLE.

(633.) Is all Scripture of Divine inspiration? It condemns the Antinomians, that lay aside the Old Testament as useless and out of date. God hath stamped a Divine majesty upon both Testaments; and till they can show me where God hath given a repeal to the Old, it stands in force. The two Testaments are the two wells of salvation; the Antinomians would stop up one of these wells, they would dry up one of the breasts of Scripture. There is much gospel in the Old Testament; the comforts of the gospel in the New Testament have their rise from the Old. The great promise of the Messiah is in the Old Testament, "A virgin shall conceive and bear a son." Nay, I say more, the moral law, in some parts of it, speaks gospel, "I am the Lord thy God;" here is the pure wine of the gospel. The Saint's great charter, where God promised to "sprinkle clean water upon them, and put His Spirit within them," is to be found primarily in the Old Testament (Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 26). So that they who take away the Old Testament, do as Samson, pull down the pillars: they would take away the pillars of a Christian's comfort.

—Watson, 1690.

(634.) The Old and New Testaments contain but one scheme of religion. Neither part of this scheme can be understood without the other; and, therefore, great errors have arisen from separating them. They are like the rolls on which they were anciently written, before books of the present form were invented. It is but one subject and one system from beginning to end; but the view which we obtain of it grows clearer and clearer as we unwind the roll that contains it. —Caill, 1748-1810.

(635.) We have often visited the ruins of a famous castle Heidelberg, with which no doubt many of our readers are well acquainted. Long ago it was captured, and that it might never be a stronghold to the patriots of Germany again, the enemy burnt it and blew up the walls. But in the weedy fosse there is a huge fragment of a tower which, when exploded, alighted there; and in the goodly joining of its stones and the hardening of its ancient mortar such a rocky mass had it become, that when lifted from its base, instead of descending in a shower of rubbish it came down superbly a tower still. And like that massy keep, the books we have been considering are so knit together in their exquisite accuracy, the histories are so riveted to one another, and the epistles so morticed into the histories, and the very substance of epistles and histories alike is so penetrated by that cement of all-pervasive reality, that the whole now forms an indissoluble concrete. Such a book has God made the Bible, that whatever theories wax popular or whatever systems explode, "the Scripture cannot be broken."

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

XXIX. ITS PRACTICAL VALUE NOT AFFECTED BY CONTROVERSIES CONCERNING IT.

(636.) But you say, "the natural sciences are all certain; theology is all conflict and confusion." Let us understand one another. If you say that the phenomena of nature are patent and explicit, we reply, And so are the sayings of Scripture. If candour and ingenuousness can interpret the one, they may equally expound the other. But if you say that, unlike the Word of God, His works have never been misunderstood, you surely forgot that the "History of the Inductive Sciences" is just a history of erroneous interpretations replaced by interpretations less erroneous, and destined to be succeeded by interpretations still more exhaustive and true. If you smile at the Hutchisonian or Cocceian systems of exegesis; if you quote the hostile theories which still linger in the field of polemics, we ask, Is this peculiar to theology? Have you forgotten how the abhorers of a vacuum abhorred Torricelli and Pascal? Have you forgotten how the old physiologists were vexed at Harvey for discovering the circulation of the blood? Do you not remember how the Stahlian chemists, like a burnt-out family, long lingered around the ashes of phlogiston, and denounced the wilful fire-rising of Lavoisier and oxygen? In early youth have you never seen a disciple of Werner, and pitied the affectionate tenacity with which he clung to the last plank of the fair Neptunian theory? Or would every world-maker forgive Lord Rosse's telescope if it swept from the firmament all trace of the nebular hypothesis? Or, because there is still an emissary as well as an undulatory theory of light, must we deny that optics is a science, and must we hold that the laws of refraction and reflexion are mere matters of opinion? Nature is no liar, although her "minister and interpreter" has often mistaken her meaning; and, notwithstanding the errors which have received a temporary sanction from the learned, there is, after all, nothing but truth in the material universe, and, so far as man has sagacity or sincerity to collect that truth, he has got a true science, a true astronomy, a true chemistry, a true physiology, as the case may be. And even so, whatsoever vagaries particular persons may indulge, or whatsoever false systems may receive a transient support, there is, after all, nothing but truth in the Bible, and so far as we have sincerity and sagacity to collect the Bible-truth, we have got a true religion. Nay, the most important facts and statements in that Word speak for themselves, and require no theory. And just as a mariner might safely avail himself of Jupiter's satellites, though Copernicus had never existed; just as the gunner must allow for the earth's attractions, whatever becomes of Newtonian philosophy; just as the apothecary would continue to mix his salts and acids in definite proportions, even although some mishap befell the atomic theory; just as we ourselves do not close our eyes and dispense with light, until the partisans of rays shall have made it up with the advocates of ether—so the Scriptures abound in statements and facts on which we may safely proceed, whatever becomes of human theories. "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." "If any man be in Christ Jesus, he is a new creature:" so far as it is founded on such sayings as these, religion is not only the simplest, but, being immediately from God, it is the most secure of all the sciences.

XXX. HOW ITS TRUTH IS TO BE TESTED.

(637.) A society of learned men caused a ship to be built, and resolved to make a voyage to discover the wonderful nature and properties of the magnetic needle. When the ship was ready to sail, they went on board, taking with them a great number of books and all kinds of instruments; then they set a magnetic needle in the midst, and examined and observed it. Thus they sailed to and fro, looking at the needle, and each had his own opinion concerning the hidden power which moved the needle.

Some called this secret power a stream, others a breath, others again, a spirit; some asserted that it moved from the south to the north, others said from the north to the south. So a violent contest arose among the learned men, and they sailed to and fro on the ocean, quarrelling with each other. Suddenly they felt a rude shock, and a violent crash was heard. The ship had struck on a rock and split, and the waves were rushing impetuously in. Then the learned men were all seized with great terror and confusion; they left the needle, jumped overboard, and saved themselves on the rocks. The ship was buried in the waves.

Now, as they sat on the barren rocks, wet through with salt water, they cried out to one another that there was no dependence to be placed in the magnetic needle!

—Krummacher.

XXXI. FOLLY AND GUILT OF THOSE WHO REJECT IT.

(638.) God revealed truth to the world through the lives of men who formulated in their own minds great moral problems. and identified themselves therewith. And the results they were inspired to record and to teach. But if the Scripture were disowned, or if it were thrown away, it would not change the truth a whit—though your competency to find it out might be changed.

If a man in the night, by the light of a lamp, is trying to make out his chart, and there is storm in the heaven, and storm upon the sea, and some one knocks that lamp out of his hand, what is done? The storm is above, and the storm is below; and the chart lies dark, so that he cannot find it out—that is all. If it were daylight he could see the chart well enough; but there being no light, and the lamp on which he depended for light being knocked out of his hand, he cannot avail himself of that which is before him.

And the same is true concerning much of the Bible. It is an interpreter. It is a lamp to our feet and a light to our path. And those truths which have their exposition in the Bible, and which are a revelation of the structure of the world, and of the Divine nature and government, do not depend for their truth upon the Bible itself. They are only interpreted and made plain by it. If the world disbelieved Scripture, they would simply deprive themselves of moral eyesight.

—Becher.

(639.) Suppose you were to have an insurrection against doctors? Suppose, one by one, you should throw them out of the community? Suppose you should do the work so thoroughly that there should not be a shred left of these despotic men going round and telling people that they must take this, that, or the other hateful drug? Suppose you should not only send these men away, but burn their books and their medicine? When the doctors were gone, and the apothecary shops with all their contents were destroyed, and there was nothing left but neuralgia, and rheumatisms, and dropsies, and fevers, would you be any better off than you are now?

Here is God's medicine-book, full of wondrous remedies, full of blessed compounds, for the cure of the diseases of the human soul, and you would get rid of it; you would throw it away; you would destroy it. But do you thus take away depravity? Do you care unbelief? Do you remove the animal that is in you—the tiger, the bear, the monkey, the serpent, whose nature and spots appear here and there? Do you turn out all this cage full of unclean beasts that are in the heart, when you cast the Bible from you? Oh no; you only turn out their keepers. These, that have had the power of restraining and controlling the fierce animals that ramp and rage within you, you put out of the way; but the animals themselves remain to torment you still! You have given up the Bible; but the evils which it was sent to cure—the crying need, the down-sagging trouble, the yearning aspiration, the lifting up of the soul when touched by the divine light and influence—where is your solution and your help for these?

—Becher.

(640.) A child was in the habit of going to an upper room or loft where there was a store of apples; but as she went from time to time to steal these apples, she met with something that greatly troubled her, for there happened to have been placed in that store-room an old oil-painting. It was a large face, the eyes of which, go to what part of the room the little girl might, seemed to follow her; and they appeared to be saying to her, as she stooped down to take up the apples: "Ah! I see you. It is very naughty. I'll tell upon you. You are sure to be found out." Well, this so annoyed the little girl, from time to time, that she was determined to put a stop to this speechifying of these two great staring eyes; so she got a small knife, or a pair of scissors, and struck them out. Ah, but there were still the two large holes in place of the eyes, and she never could look at them without thinking of the eyes, and what they used to say to her. She had put out the eyes, but she had not, nor could she, get rid of her conscience. Moreover, the very means she had adopted for sinning without rebuke only served to discover her guilt; for when what had befallen the painting came to be found out, it led to such inquiries as at last to reveal the whole facts.

(641.) Sir. S. Baker states that some years since, when the Egyptian troops invaded Nubia, a company of soldiers were crossing the desert on their march southward. The heat was oppressive—almost beyond endurance; and the supply of water being very scanty, the men were put upon short allowance, and after some days it failed altogether.

While thus painfully toiling on, they saw, or thought they saw, in the horizon, a beautiful lake, with flourishing palm-trees on its banks. Their Arab guide, however, told them that there was neither lake nor tree in reality; that what they beheld was a mirage—a deception—a mere picture in the air. They would not credit him; they preferred to believe the testimony of their own sight, and insisted that the guide should deviate from his route, and follow their directions. The man refused to yield; he would not waste time which was precious, nor be commanded by those who ought to obey. They tried to compel him to accompany them towards their fancied paradise, and he resisted. In the violence which ensued, the guide was stricken down, and was left on the sand, a corpse.

Then the whole company, eager for their anticipated refreshment and repose, rushed towards the scene of promise. Parched with thirst and scorched by the burning sun, they soon became bewildered, half-blind, faint, and feeble; but their increasing sufferings only served to urge them on. Farther and farther they struck into the wide waste; farther and farther they separated themselves from their dead guide, with whose life had perished the secret of their safety; for he alone had known the way to the wells and shady retreats which are to be found even in a desert.

The unhappy men still stumbled on; and still the visionary lake fled before them. At last, as the sun declined, the deceptive mirage gradually faded from their sight, leaving only a dreary waste of sand. Then, maddened and despairing, the guilty men, reproaching each other and themselves, threw themselves on the ground in an agony of remorse and despair; and few survived to tell the tale of sin and folly.

Like to this is the guilt, and the folly, and the fate of those who reject the guidance of God's holy Word, and, walking in the ways of their own heart, and in the sight of their own eyes (Eccles. xi. 9), seek happiness in worldliness and sin.

XXXII. SHALL ENDURE FOR EVER.

(642.) The history, the morality, the theology, the consistency, the authenticity, and genuineness of the Bible, the truth of its prophecies and the very possibility of its miracles, have been all attacked—each in its turn, and with the same result. We have seen the soldier return from the fields of war with scars as well as medals on his breast; but our religion has come out of a thousand fights unscarred, from a thousand fires unscathed. She bears no more evidence of the assaults she has sustained than the air of the swords that have cloven it, or the sea of the keels which have ploughed its foaming waves; than some bold rocky headland of the billows that, dashing against it in proud but impotent fury, have shivered themselves on its sides. With few exceptions the writings of infidels have sunk into entire oblivion. Their names, and those of their authors are alike forgotten. Not so the name of Jesus, of Him Voltaire boasted he would crush; not so the Word of God—the blessed book which is the world's most precious treasure, and often man's only solace, as well in palaces as in cabins. While the works of once famous sceptics are left to rot on bookshelves, where the moth devours their memory, and the spider wraps them in her web, every year sees the Bible translated into some new tongue, acquire a greater influence, and receive a wider circulation. Fulfilling its own glorious predictions, it is bringing nearer the appointed time when, rising over all opposition like a flowing and resistless tide, the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters the channel of the deep.

—Guthrie.

(643.) If our faith is not a ruin, though a majestic one, or if the Church of Christ does not stand in the world like the decaying and deserted temple of a worn-out superstition, it is not because the Word of God has not been doubted, denied, attacked, and vilified. It has often been reviled; but it has never been refuted. Its foundations have been examined by the most searching eyes. In Hume, and Gibbon, and Voltaire, and La Place, to pass such coarse and vulgar assailants as Tom Paine and Carlyle, with their few living followers, the Bible has had to sustain the assaults of the greatest talent, the sharpest wit, and the acutest intellects. To make it appear a cunningly-devised fable, philosophers have sought arguments amid the mysteries of science, and travellers amid the hoar remains of antiquity; for that purpose geologists have ransacked the bowels of the earth, and astronomers the stars of heaven; and yet, after sustaining the most cunningly-devised and ably-executed assaults of eighteen hundred years, there it stands; and shall stand, defiant of time, of men, of devils—a glorious illustration of the words of its Founder, "On this rock have I built my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it!"

Since those eighteen hundred years began to run, what revolutions Time has wrought! what changes he has seen! The oldest monarchies have been overthrown; the dawn of truth has chased away the darkness of a long night; the maxims of statesmen and the theories of science have shifted like the wind; success has crowned the boldest innovator on all old-established systems. Jove is gone, but not Jehovah, the Hebrew's God. On Grecian headlands and Roman hills the temples of Jupiter stand in mouldering ruin; but temples sacred to Jesus are rising on every shore. Since John wrote in his cell at Patmos, and Paul preached in his own hired house at Rome, the world has been turned upside down; all old things have passed away; all things on earth have changed but one. Rivalled in fixedness, and more than rivalled in brightness, the stars that saw our world born and shall see it die, that rejoiced in its birth and shall be mourners at its burial, the Word of our God stands for ever. Time that weakens all things else, has but strengthened the impregnable position of the believer's faith, and hope, and confidence. And as, year by year, the tree adds another ring to its circumference, every age has added the testimony of its events to this great truth, "The grass withereth, and the flower fadeth, but the Word of the Lord shall endure for ever."

—Guthrie.

(644.) When men of ability, hostile, perhaps, to our views and feelings, examine with the most critical research, examine with a painstaking intelligence all the foundations on which our Book rests, I believe they will just tend to this result—that they will first help the friends of Christianity and the friends of the Bible to establish its authority; they will then bring the most clear proofs of the authenticity and genuineness of its books, all the more established because of the critical storms through which they must pass. If you wish to have the rotten twigs and the old leaves shaken off from a tree, that the rest may appear the greener and the fairer, you welcome the breeze that moves among the branches. Just such will be the effect of these storms through which we may have to pass. Well, if the Book's authority is established, established notwithstanding criticism, established by criticism, what happens then? Why, the same research examines all the original text, and brings us to the purest text. We examine a little further, and they bring out all the faults in our translation. With what result? Why, purer, more idiomatic, and more exact translations. They have brought us to this, and what further comes? Why, then they fall foul of our interpretations. Our interpretations are not sacred because the Book is sacred; and what will happen? Why, just what a strong shower of rain brings to our streets. No man, when the rain is descending in torrents, ever dreams that the houses will fall; it will wash away the filth off the streets, but leave our houses where they were. This examination clears away, and I do not doubt it will clear away interpretations that we have loved and have clung to, but it is only to give us more sound interpretations. And so, when all these things have been secured—the authority of the Book, the authenticity of all the books comprised in it, the genuineness of those books, the purity of the text, exactness of translation, and, finally, interpretations in exact accordance with the literal words that God has spoken—why, His Word has gained a triumph. Who, that receives God's Word, does not wish it to pass through all this? It is the best thing that can happen, and it brings out the sword of the Spirit sharper, brighter, keener, and more adapted to do its work than ever it was before.

—Baptist Noel.

(645.) There are men that are all the time afraid that something will happen to the Bible. I should be, if I had no more faith than they have in it. There is a mountain not far from my dwelling in the country, and I never got up in the night to see if it had not been stolen by somebody. Near by rolls the old Hudson, and I never said to myself on going to bed, "How do I know that before morning somebody will not run down with a quart pot and carry off that river!" Now, to me, the Bible stands as firm as mountains stand, and it is in as little danger of being overthrown as mighty rivers are of being carried off in a quart pot. I am never afraid that the Bible will be laid aside. I am never afraid of its being superseded. I feel a certainty that it belongs to God, that it is indispensable to man, and that, however much it may be neglected or run against, it will take care of itself, and maintain its rightful place. —Becher.

XXXIII. AND YET ITS MISSION IS TRANSITORY.

(646.) I think there may be one Bible in heaven fastened to the throne—just as now, in a museum, we have a lamp exhumed from Herculaneum or Nineveh, and we look at it with great interest, and say, "How poor a light it must have given compared with our modern lamps." So I think that this Bible, which was a lamp to our feet in this world, may lie near the throne of God, exciting our interest to all eternity by the contrast between its comparatively feeble light and the illumination of heaven. The Bible now is the scaffolding to the rising temple; but when the building is done, there will be no use for the scaffolding. —Talmage.

BODY, THE

1. Has its rights.

(647.) The body has its rights; and it will have them. They cannot be trampled upon or slighted without peril. The body ought to be the soul's best friend, and cordial, dutiful helpmate. Many of the studious, however, have neglected to make it so; whence a large part of the miseries of authorship. Some good men have treated it as an enemy; and then it has become a fiend, and plagued them.

—Guesses at Truth.

2. The folly of making its adornment our supreme concern.

(648.) Like as, if we dwell in a borrowed house, looking weekly when we must depart, we will never trouble ourselves with any cost or fitting of it, as we would do if we were sure to remain in it all the days of our lives; even so, for so much as the body is but a house lent unto the soul, from whence it looketh daily to depart, there is no reason, then, why we should be so careful to clothe this body with gaudy and costly apparel, which shortly must rot and perish, and so to neglect the soul, which is immortal.

—Caudray, 1598-1664.

3. The amount of care due to it.

(649.) To the Christian in duty the body is as the beast to the traveller; he cannot go his journey without it, and much ado to go with it. If the flesh be kept high and lusty, then 'tis wanton, and will not obey; if low, then it's weak, and soon tires.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

pered as to be unruly, nor yet so low as to disable him for travel. But all that health and strength which makes it not unruly, maketh it the more serviceable. It is not the life of the body, but the health and cheerfulness which maketh it fit for duty. And so much pleasing of the flesh as tendeth but to its health and cheerfulness is a duty, where it can be done without greater hurt the other way. A heavy body is but a dull servant to the mind; yea, a great impediment to the soul in duty, and a great temptation to many sins; as sickly and melancholy persons, and many phlegmatic people, know by sad experience. It is as great a duty to help the body to its due alacrity and fitness for service, as it is to tame it and bring it under by fasting and sackcloth when it is proud and lustful. And they that think fasting on certain days, in a formal manner, is acceptable to God, when the state of the body is not helped, but rather injured by it, as if it were a thing required for itself, do mistakenly offer a sacrifice to God which He requireth not; and take Him to be an enemy to man, that desireth his pain and grief, when it tendeth not to his good. A mower that hath a good scythe will do more in a day, than another that hath a bad one can do in two. Every workman knoweth the benefit of having his tools in order, and every traveller knoweth the difference between a cheerful and a tired horse; and they that have tried health and sickness know what a help it is in every work of God to have a healthful body, and cheerful spirits, and an alacrity and promptitude to obey the mind. When the sights of prospects, and beautiful buildings, and fields, and countries, or the use of walks or gardens, do tend to raise the soul to holy contemplation, to admire the Creator, and to think of the glory of the life to come (as Bernard used his pleasant walks), this delight is lawful, if not a duty, where it may be had. So when music doth cheer the mind, and fit it for thanks and praise to God, and when the rest of the body, and the use of your best apparel, and moderate feasting, on the Lord's day, and other days of thanksgiving, do promote the spiritual service of the day, they are good and profitable; but to those that are more hindered by fulness, even abstinence on such days is best. So that the use of the body must be judged of as it is a means or expression of the good or evil of the mind.

Many things do remotely fit us for our main end, which, nearly and directly, seem to have no tendency to it; as those that are only to furnish us with natural strength, and vigour, and alacrity, or to prevent impediments. As a traveller's hood and cloak and other carriage seem rather to be hindrances to his speed, but yet are necessary for preventing the cold and wet, which else might hinder him more.

Ordinarily it is safest to be more fearful of excess of fleshly pleasure than of defect; for ordinarily we are all very prone to an excess, and also the excess is more dangerous.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

BODY AND SOUL, THE

1. Partners in life.

(651.) As a fair and gentle wife, star-like and dove-like, is given to the guardianship of some rude, coarse, uncultured nature, who treads among her sweet feelings as the hoof and the snout deal with flowers in the garden, so it is in that strange husband and wife, the body and the soul : the soul full of sweetness, gentleness, purity, and delicacy, and the coarse animal body full of cruel passions. And they fare but ill in the wedded life on earth : the body looks down, and searches the ground for its delights : the soul looks up, and, like an astronomer, culls treasure from among the stars, and beyond. The body eats and drinks : the soul thinks and feels. The body lives in the world, for the world, and with the world : the soul reaches far away to some higher life whose need it feels—but all is vague, but the wish, but the need. Strange visions rise, but neither to-day does the soul know its origin, nor to-morrow. The picture of beauty and of purity that rose bright in the morning has faded out before night. To-morrow mocks the expectation of to-day. The soul is like a bird caged from the nest, that yet remembers something of its fellows in the forest of green leaves, and in summer days hears snatches of song from far-off fields, and yearns for that liberty which it has never proved, for that companionship which it so early missed.

2. Their mutual sympathy.

(652.) The soul and body in the present conjunction mutually sympathise. As two things that are unisons, if one be touched and moves, the other untouched yet moves and trembles. The cause is from the vibration the sound makes in the air, and impresses on solid bodies, moving them according to the harmonious proportion between them. Thus the soul and the body are two strings tempered to such a correspondence, that if one be moved, the other resents by an impression from it.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

3. The influence of the body on the soul.

(653.) The operations of the soul do much follow the disposition and temper of the body. There is a near connection and a sympathy between these two. There can scarcely be grief and pleasure in one, but the other partakes. Pleasure ! it melts the soul through the body, as lightning does the sword through the scabbard. Can the body be pampered, and the soul not grow wanton ? Can the carnal objects of sense be received, without leaving a tincture upon the mind ? When the body is filled and feasted, the soul is not in so fit a posture to hunger and thirst after righteousness. Herod after his feast is fit to behead, but not to hear John Baptist.

4. How the body is to be made helpful to the soul.

(654.) Polydorus, a heathen youth, had abandoned the crooked path of idolatry, and received with a faithful heart the words of truth. As he condemned the lusts of paganism, and repented of his former life, he retired into a solitary place, and renounced every pleasure of nature and life ; for he said, "The flesh striveth against the spirit ; therefore I will deaden the strength of the senses, and shut up all the paths of temptation."

Then Justus, his master, who had converted him, went to the youth, and took him to a tree planted by a brook, bearing flowers and fruit, and said to him, "Polydorus, observe this tree. The Lord has given it to us for an example, that we may be rich in good fruit."

The youth looked at the tree, and said, "The tree is happy ; without temptations and the war against the flesh, it fulfils its destiny in silence, bearing flowers and fruit in its season."

Then the old man smiled, and said, "Would not the tree be more perfect without the low root creeping along the dark soil, and drinking the slimy nourishment from the brook ?"

"But," answered the youth, "it supports the stem of the tree, and provides it with sap to bring forth flowers and fruit."

Then the old man lifted up his voice, and said, "Go thou, and do likewise. Despise not the senses nor their influence, for they are the low root of life ; but let them always be low. Form what this root conveys to thee into spiritual flowers and fruit. Like the branches and twigs of the tree, all thy thoughts and doings will then be directed towards heaven, and the light of truth will silently lead thee to perfection."

Thus said the old man Justus ; and Polydorus left the wilderness, lived in intercourse with nature and mankind, and taught many by his word and example.

BOOKS.

1. The most wonderful of human works.

(655.) Of all things which man can do or make here below, by far the most momentous, wonderful, and worthy are the things we call books.

—Carlyle.

2. Are living powers.

(656.) Books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a progeny of life in them, to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are ; nay, they do preserve, as in a vial, the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively, and as vigorously productive as those fabulous dragon's teeth ; and being sown up and down, may chance to bring up armed men. And yet, on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a book. Who kills a man, kills a reasonable creature—God's image, but he who destroys a good book, destroys reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were, in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the earth : but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life.

—John Milton.

3. The permanence of their influence.

(657.) Books are the legacies that a great genius leaves to mankind, which are delivered down from generation to generation, as presents to the posterity of those who are yet unborn. All other arts of perpetuating our ideas continue but a short time. Statues can last but a few thousands of years, edifices fewer, and colours still fewer than edifices. Michael Angelo, Fontana, and Raphael will hereafter be what Phidias, Vitruvius, and Apelles are at present,—the names of great statuary, architects, and painters whose works are lost. The several arts are expressed in mouldering materials. Nature sinks under them, and is not able to support the ideas which are impressed upon it.

The circumstance which gives authors an advantage above all these great masters is this, that they can multiply their originals ; or rather can make copies of their works, to what number they please, which shall be as valuable as the original themselves.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

4. Sure storehouses of truth.

(658.) Books are faithful repositories, which may be awhile neglected or forgotten, but when they are opened again will again impart their instruction. Memory once interrupted is not to be recalled; written learning is a fixed luminary, which after the cloud that had hidden it has passed away, is again bright in its proper station. Tradition is but a meteor, which if it once falls cannot be rekindled.

—Dr. S. Johnson.

5. Not an unmixed good.

(659.) Books are not seldom talismans and spells, By which the magic art of shrewder wits Holds an unthinking multitude enthral'd. Some to the fascination of a name Surrender judgment, hoodwink'd. Some the style Infatuates, and through labyrinths and wilds Of error leads them, by a time entranced. While sloth seduces more, too weak to bear The insupportable fatigue of thought, And swallowing, therefore, without pause or choice, The total grist unsifted, husks and all.

—Cowper.

6. Love of.

(660.) If the crowns of all the kingdoms of Europe were laid down at my feet in exchange for my books and my love of reading, I would spurn them all.

—Fulton.

(661.) A taste for books is the pleasure and glory of my life. I would not exchange it for the riches of the Indies.

—Gibbon.

(662.) Were I to pray for a taste which should stand me in stead under every variety of circumstances, and be a source of happiness and cheerfulness to me during life, and a shield against its ills, however things might go amiss, and the world frown upon me, it would be a taste for reading. Give a man this taste and the means of gratifying it, and you can hardly fail of making him a happy man; unless, indeed, you put into his hands a most perverse selection of books. You place him in contact with the best society in every period of history,—with the wisest, the wittiest, the tenderest, the bravest, and the purest characters who have adorned humanity. You make him a denizen of all nations, a contemporary of all ages. The world has been created for him!

—Sir J. F. W. Herschel.

7. Companionship of.

(663.) Books are the food of youth, the delight of old age; the ornament of prosperity, the refuge and comfort of adversity; a delight at home, and no hindrance abroad; companions by night, in travelling, in the country.

—Cicero.

(664.) I have friends whose society is extremely agreeable to me: they are of all ages, and of every country. They have distinguished themselves both in the cabinet and in the field, and obtained high honours for their knowledge of the sciences. It is easy to gain access to them; for they are always at my service, and I admit them to my company, and dismiss them from it, whenever I please. They are never troublesome, but immediately answer every question I ask them. Some relate to me the events of past ages, while others reveal to me the secrets of nature. Some teach me how to live, and others how to die. Some, by their vivacity, drive away my cares and and exhilarate my spirits, while others give fortitude to my mind, and teach me the important lesson how to restrain my desires and depend wholly on myself. They open to me, in short, the various avenues of all the arts and sciences, and upon their information I safely rely in all emergencies. In return for all these services they only ask me to accommodate them with a convenient chamber in some corner of my humble habitation, where they may repose in peace: for these friends are more delighted by the tranquillity of retirement than with the tumults of society.

—Petrarch.

(665.) It is chiefly through books that we enjoy intercourse with superior minds, and these invaluable means of communication are in the reach of all. In the best books great men talk to us, give us their most precious thoughts, and pour their souls into ours. God be thanked for books! they are the voices of the distant and the dead, and make us heirs of the spiritual life of past ages. Books are the true levellers. They give to all, who will faithfully use them, the society, the spiritual presence, of the best and greatest of our race. No matter how poor I am, no matter though the prosperous of my own time will not enter my obscure dwelling. If the sacred writers will enter and take up their abode under my roof, if Milton will cross my threshold to sing to me of paradise, and Shakspeare to open to me the worlds of imagination and the workings of the human heart, and Franklin to enrich me with his practical wisdom, I shall not pine for want of intellectual companionship, and I may become a cultivated man, though excluded from what is called the best society in the place where I live.

—Channing, 1780-1842.

(666.) Just such is the feeling which a man of liberal education naturally entertains towards the great minds of former ages. The debt which he owes to them is incalculable. They have guided him to truth. They have filled his mind with noble and graceful images. They have stood by him in all vicissitudes, comforters in sorrow, nurses in sickness, companions in solitude. These friendships are exposed to no danger from the occurrences by which other attachments are weakened or dissolved. Time glides on; fortune is inconstant; tempers are soured; bonds which seemed indissoluble are daily sundered by interest, by emulation, or by caprice. But no such cause can affect the silent converse which we hold with the highest of human intellects. That placid intercourse is disturbed by no jealousies or resentments. These are the old friends who are never seen with new faces, who are the same in wealth and in poverty, in glory and in obscurity. With the dead there is no rivalry. In the dead there is no change. Plato is never sullen. Cervantes is never petulant. Demosthenes never comes unseasonably. Dante never stays too long. No difference of political opinion can alienate Cicero. No heresy can excite the horror of Bossuet.

—Macaulay, 1800-1859.

8. Choice of.

(667.) We ought to regard books as we do sweetmeats, not wholly to aim at the pleasantest, but chiefly to respect the wholesomest; not forbidding either, but approving the latter most.

—Plutarch.

(668.) When thou hast resolved what to study, advise what are the best books on that subject, and procure them : as for indifferent ones, I would not have thee throw away any time or pains on them if thou canst get better. A few books well chosen, and well made use of, will be more profitable to thee than a great confused Alexandrian Library.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(669.) With books, as with companions, it is of more consequence to know which to avoid than which to choose : for good books are as scarce as good companions, and, in both instances, all that we can learn from bad ones is, that so much time has been worse than thrown away. That writer does the most who gives his reader the most knowledge and takes from him the least time. That short period of a short existence which is rationally employed is that which alone deserves the name of life ; and that portion of our life is most rationally employed which is occupied in enlarging our stock of truth and of wisdom.

—Colton, 1832.

(670.) Readers are not aware of the fact, but a fact it is of daily increasing magnitude, and already of terrible importance to readers, that their first grand necessity in reading is to be vigilantly, conscientiously select ; and to know everywhere that books, like human souls, are actually divided into what we may call "sheep and goats,"—the latter put inexorably on the left hand of the judge ; and tending, every goat of them, at all moments, whither we know, and much to be avoided, and, if possible, ignored, by all sane creatures !

—Carlyle.

9. The test of a good book.

(671.) Many books require no thought from those who read them, and for a very simple reason :—they made no such demand on those who wrote them. Those works therefore are the most valuable that set our thinking faculties in the fullest operation. For as the solar light calls forth all the latent powers, and dormant principles of vegetation contained in the kernel, but which, without such a stimulus, would neither have struck root downwards, nor borne fruit upwards, so it is with the light that is intellectual ; it calls forth and awakens into energy those latent principles of thought in the minds of others, which without this stimulus, reflection would not have matured, nor examination improved, nor action embodied.

—Colton, 1832.

(672.) A good book, like the talk of a great man, is seminal and germinant. Its seeds take root in your minds and bring forth fruit which, if not absolutely original, is yet thoroughly your own and perfectly fresh.

—W. M. Taylor.

10. Great books.

(673.) Every great book is an action, and every great action is a book.

—Luther, 1483-1544.

11. The most useful.

(674.) Books that you may carry to the fire and hold readily in your hand are the most useful, after all.

—Dr. S. Johnson.

12. Voluminous.

(675.) Were all books reduced to their quintessence, many a bulky author would make his appearance in a penny paper. There would scarcely be any such thing in nature as a folio : the works of an age would be contained on a few shelves ; not to mention millions of volumes that would be utterly annihilated.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

13. Small.

(676.) We shall generally find that the most excellent books in any art or science have been still the smallest and most compendious ; and this not without ground ; for it is an argument that the author was master of what he wrote, and had a clear notion, and a full comprehension of the subject before him. For the reason of things lies in a little compass, if the mind could at any time be so happy as to light upon it : most of the writings and discourses in the world are but illustration and rhetoric, which signifies as much as nothing to a mind eager in pursuit after the causes and philosophical truth of things.

—Fuller, 1637-1701.

14. The best.

(677.) The best books are those which every reader thinks he himself could have written. Nature, which is the highest excellence, seems familiar and level to all.

—Pascal.

15. Few are really valuable.

(678.) In books one takes up occasionally one finds a consolation for the impossibility of reading many books, by seeing how many might have been spared,—how little that is new or striking in the great departments of religion, morals, and sentiment.

—John Foster, 1770-1843.

16. Poor and bad are to be shunned.

(679.) If young men would not be cursed by the infidelity and immorality which lurk within his (Byron's) pages, let them beware how they touch his volumes—as they would a beautiful form infected with the plague.

—James.

(680.) It is with minds as with bodies : we in our growth greatly resemble the food upon which we grow. Coarse food will naturally produce a coarse body. We do not look for grace and beauty, for Caucasian symmetry and proportion from those who feed upon offal, and whale blubber, and the flesh of seals and bears ; and how can we expect minds seizing with hungry avidity the most wretched mental garbage to be gifted with health or stature, with athletic vigour, or noble proportions ? Impossible ! and therefore in the intellectual regions we are frequently meeting with those whose false and sickly sentimentality—whose deformed and dwarfed mental proportions—betray the cradles in which they were nurtured, the food upon which they were sustained, and the kingdoms in which their days of wan and stunted intelligence have been passed.

—E. P. Hood.

(681.) It is right for you, young men, to enrich yourselves with the spoils of all pure literature ; but he who would make a favourite of a bad book, simply because it contained a few beautiful passages, might as well caress the hand of an assassin because of the jewellery which sparkles on its fingers.

—Joseph Parker.

17. Modern.

(682.) The volumes of antiquity, like medals, may very well serve to amuse the curious ; but the works of the moderns, like the current coin of a kingdom, are much better for immediate use: the former are often prized above their intrinsic value, and kept with care; the latter seldom pass for more than they are worth, and are often subject to the merciless hands of sweating critics and clipping compilers: the works of antiquity were ever praised, those of the moderns read! the treasures of our ancestors have our esteem, and we boast the passion; those of contemporary genius engage our heart, although we blush to own it: the visits we pay the former resemble those we pay the great: the ceremony is troublesome, and yet such as we would not choose to forego: our acquaintance with modern books is like sitting with a friend; our pride is not flattered in the interview, but it gives more internal satisfaction.

—Goldsmith, 1728-1774.

18. Are meant to be read.

(683.) If thou buyest fine books, only to set up in thy closet, and never readest them, thou wilt be like a man that getteth in nice provisions, and never eats of them.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(684.) It is a vanity to persuade the world one hath much learning by getting a great library. As soon shall I believe every one is valiant that hath a well-furnished armoury. . . . Some books are only cursorily to be tasted of: namely, first, voluminous books, the task of a man's life to read them over; secondly, auxiliary books, only to be repaired to on occasions; thirdly, such as are merely pieces of formality, so that if you look on them you look through them, and he that peeps through the case-ment of the index sees as much as if he were in the house. But the laziness of those cannot be excused who perfunctorily pass over authors of consequence, and only trade in their tables and contents. These, like city-cheats, having got the names of all country gentlemen, make silly people believe they have long lived in those places where they never were, and flourish with skill in those authors they never seriously studied.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

19. How to read them.

(685.) In reading books, observe this direction: consider the scope and design of the whole, and judge of the particular passages with reference to that; and if there be any single passage, which thou apprehendest not the meaning of, or which at the first reading seems to have another meaning than is agreeable to the author's design, build nothing upon such a passage, but wait awhile to see if the author will not explain himself; and if he does not, and thou canst not at last discern how that passage can, without some straining of words, be reconciled with others, then conclude however, and take for granted that the author, if he appears a man of judgment, is consistent with himself, and consequently that in that passage (however the words may sound) he did not mean to thwart and contradict all the rest of his book.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(686.) One sound book read for the purpose of instruction will afford more nourishment to the mind than a whole library skimmed over for amusement. A cottage flower gives honey to the working bee, but a king's garden affords none to the fluttering butterfly.

—E. Cook.

CARELESS, THE

1. Their inattention to the plainest warnings.

(687.) It is said of birds that build in steeples, being used to the continual ringing of bells, the sound disquiets them not at all; or as those that dwell near the fall of the river Nilus (Nile), the noise of the water deafens them so, that they mind it not. Thus it is that the commonness of the death of others is made but, as it were, a formal thing: many have been so often at the grave, that now the grave is worn out of their hearts; they have gone so often to the house of mourning, that they are grown familiar with death; they look upon it as a matter of custom for men to die and be buried, and when the solemnity is over, the thoughts of death are over also; as soon as the grave is out of their sight, preparation for the grave is out of their mind: then they go to their worldly business, yea, to coveting and sinning, as if the last man that ever should be were buried.

—Caryll, 1602-1673.

(688.) Oh, the folly of men that take not warning by others! Silly fish are caught by the angle or net, and carried to the fire, yet they that remain are still greedy of the bait; Satan takes some sinners with the snares and baits of his temptations, jerks them out of the water of life, and casts them into the unquenchable fire, yet those that survive are as ready to hearken to his suggestions as if there were no such thing.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(689.) Silly man is like the foolish chickens; though the kite comes and takes away many of their fellows, yet the rest continue pecking the ground, never heeding their owner, nor minding their shelter. Death comes and snatches away one man here, a second there; one before them, another behind them, and they are killed by death, undone for ever; yet they who survive take no warning, but persist in their wicked and ungodly ways (Job iv. 20, 21).

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(690.) Wonderful stupidity! that they who see that carrying dead bodies to the grave, is as common a work as the midwives taking children into the world, and that this life is but the road to another, and that all men are posting on to their journey's end, should think no more considerably whither so many souls do go, that daily shoot the gulf of death. Wonderful! that it should be possible for a man awake, to believe that he must shortly be gone from earth, and enter into an unchangeable, endless life, and yet not bend the thoughts of his soul, and the labours of his life, to secure his true and durable felicity!

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(691.) A plough is coming from the far end of a long field, and a daisy stands nodding and full of dew-dimples. That furrow is sure to strike the daisy. It casts its shadow as gaily, and exhales its gentle breath as freely, and stands as simple, and radiant and expectant, as ever; and yet that crushing furrow, which is turning and turning others in its course, is drawing near, and in a moment it whirls the heedless flower with sudden reversal under the sod!

And as is the daisy, with no power of thought, so are ten thousand thinking, sentient flowers of life, blossoming in places of peril, and yet thinking that no furrow of disaster is running in toward them—that no iron plough of trouble is about to overturn them. Sometimes it dimly dawns upon us, when we see other men's mischiefs and wrongs, that we are in the same category with them, and that perhaps the storms which have overtaken them will overtake us also. But it is only for a moment, for we are artful to cover the ear, and not listen to the voice that warns us of our danger. —Baxter.

2. Their folly.

(692.) In a good pasture, where many good oxen are, the butcher comes and fetcheth away one and kills it; next day he fetcheth away another, and kills that too. Now, those which he leaves behind feed and fat themselves, till they are driven to the slaughter, not considering what is become of their fellows or what shall become of themselves. So, when Death comes amongst a multitude of men, here taking one and there another, we pamper up ourselves till he overtakes us also. We live as though, like Adam and Abel, we never saw a man die before us, whereas every churchyard, every ague, every sickness, should be a preacher of mortality unto us. —Alphonsus ab Avendano, 1590.

(693.) Careless soul! thou art like a passenger in a ship; asleep or awake, he is going his voyage. Thou art like that silly bird, that puts her head among the reeds, and then thinks she is safe from the hunter, because she sees him not. Sinner! God sees thee when thou dost not see Him, and is taking His aim at thee. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(694.) It seemeth an easy matter to a felon to think of his crime, while he is not apprehended, because he lives in hope to escape, and therefore he can laugh when he talks of the gallows; but when he comes to it, the case is altered. Offenders may escape the justice of men, but no man can so escape the hand of God. It may now seem a small and easy matter to you to think and talk of unpardoned sin; but the day is coming when you would give all the world if you had it for a pardon, as light as you do now make of it. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(695.) Verily, sirs, the case of careless sinners is never the safer, because they see not, and fear not the danger. A man in a consumption or dropsy is never the further from death, though he be never so confident that he shall not die. If a thief at the gallows have a conceit that he shall escape, that will not save his life. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(696.) We are either lost or not lost. If not, by all means "sleep on and take your rest." I should be sorry to disturb you. If the waves dance and play round your ship as she ploughs through a silver sea; if gentle zephyrs fill her sails; if no sound is heard but the song of the watch on deck, and the gentle dash of mimic billows as they break on your bows—lulling to slumber and happy dreams; then, happy voyagers, with a bright moon riding the calm heaven above, and wide sea-room below, "sleep on and take your rest." But if, instead of this, a shock has come that makes your bark shiver from stem to stern, if hurrying feet tread the deck overhead, if signal guns are flashing and booming through the darkness, if the rattling cordage tells that they lower the boats, if men, pale with fear, rush into the cabin to cry, We sink; and if, when we leap from bed on the floor, the water, rushing through many a yawning seam, splashes on our naked feet, the time is not for sleep—but for instant action, and such cries as this, "O sirs, what shall I do to be saved!" Who can miss the application of this to our condition? With that curse of a broken law impending over us, in danger of perishing every moment so long as we are out of Christ, how should we cry, Save me, I perish; and give immediate heed to the call, that Christ, seeing our danger, rises from His throne in heaven to sound down, "Lay hold of eternal life." —Guthrie.

3. The pitiable condition of their condition.

(697.) Of all men out of hell, none more to be pitied than he who hangs over its mouth, and yet is without fear. What good does physic poured down a dead man's throat? If he cannot be chafed to some sense of his condition, all applications are hopeless; and if sharp affliction, which is the strongest physic, leaves the sinner senseless, there is little prospect that anything else will do him good. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(698.) Oh what a sight is it to see a man go merry and laughing towards damnation, and make a jest of his own undoing! to see him at the brink of hell, and will not believe it! like a madman boasting of his wit, or a drunken man of his sobriety; or as the swine is delighted when the butcher is shaving his throat to cut it; or, as the fatted lambs are skipping in the pasture, that to-morrow must be killed and eaten; or, as the bird sits singing when the gun is levelled to kill him; or, as the greedy fish run striving which shall catch the bait, that must presently be snatched out of their element, and lie dying on the bank. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(699.) The devil amuses us till the last moment, as a poor man is kept amused while the soldiers are coming to take him. When they come, he cries and struggles in vain, for they will not release him. —Vianney.

4. The perilousness of their position.

(700.) There is not only a little time between you and judgment, but a little time between you and execution, nothing but the slender thread of a frail life, which is soon fretted asunder; and will you, can you, sleep in sin so near eternity, and laugh and dance over the brink of hell? You cannot soon enough flee from the wrath to come. —Alanton, 1620-1667.

(701.) When thou hast had but a few more merry hours, and but a few more pleasant draughts and morsels, and a little more of the honours and riches of the world, thy portion will be spent, and thy pleasures ended, and all is then gone that thou settest thy heart upon; of all that thou soldest thy Saviour and salvation for, there is nothing left but the heavy reckoning. As a thief that sits merrily spending the money in an alehouse that he hath stolen, when men are riding in post-haste to apprehend him; so it is with you; while you are drowned in cares or fleshly pleasures, and making merry with your own shame, death is coming in post-haste to seize upon you, and carry your souls to such a place and state, as now you little know or think of. Suppose when you are bold and busy in your sin, that a messenger were but coming post from London to apprehend you, and take away your life though you saw him not: yet if you knew of his coming, it would mar your mirth, and you would be thinking of the haste he makes, and hearkening when he knocketh at your door. Oh, that you could but see what haste death makes, though yet it hath not overtaken you! No post so swift! No messenger more sure! As sure as the sun will be with you in the morning, though it hath many thousand and hundred thousand miles to go in the night; so sure will death be quickly with you, and then where is your sport and pleasure?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(702.) If there ever was a mild and calm teacher, it was Christ; and yet, when one asked Him, "Are there few that be saved?" He said, "Strive to enter in at the straight gate; for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able." The gate was built for entering, it was designed expressly for that purpose, and God desires that men shall enter, and has made arrangements for all to enter; and yet, He saw reasons that led Him to say, calmly and affectionately, but plainly, "Strive—agonise—to enter in; for many will seek to enter, and shall not be able."

I know not how you feel, but one word from the lips of Christ is more potent with me than all the reasonings of philosophy. I believe in Him. And, seeing that there was danger, He was at least honest when He declared that the circumstances in which men lived were such that we should agonise—that is to say, put forth every effort—to enter eternal life. When Christ speaks thus, I know that there is mischief in the air; I know that there is peril about; I know that there is danger which may well arrest the attention and call out the utmost skill and exertion of man. I know that some have a feeling of security; but it is unwise, it is fatal. No man is in so much danger as he that thinks there is no danger.

Why, when the bell rings, when the watchman rends the air with cries of "Fire! fire! FIRE!" when in every direction there is the pattering of feet on the sidewalk, and when the engines come rattling up to the burning house, one after another, the inmates are awakened, and they rush out; and they are safest that are most terrified, and that suffer most from a sense of danger. One only remains behind. He hears the tumult, but it weaves itself into the shape of dreams; and he seems to be listening to some parade; and soon the sounds begin to be indistinct in his ear; and at length they cease to make any impression upon him. During all this time he is inhaling the deadly gas with which his apartment has become filled, gradually his senses are benumbed, and finally he is rendered unconscious by suffocation. And, in the midst of peril, and the thunder of excitement, that man who is the least awake, and the least frightened, is the very man that is the most likely to be burned up.

—Baxter.

(703.) Some years since a vessel lay becalmed on a smooth sea in the vicinity of an iceberg. In full view, the mountain mass of frozen splendour rose before the passengers of the vessel, its towers and pinnacles glittering in the sunlight, and clothed in the enchanting and varied colours of the rainbow. A party on board the vessel resolved to climb the steep sides of the iceberg, and spend the day in a picnic on the summit. The novelty and attraction of the hazardous enterprise blinded them to the danger, and they left the vessel, ascended the steep mountain of ice, spread their table on the summit, and enjoyed their dance of pleasure on the surface of the frosty marble. Nothing disturbed their security or marred their enjoyment. Their sport was finished and they made their way down to the water level and embarked. But scarcely had they reached a safe distance before the loud crash of the crumbling mass was heard. The scene of their gaiety was covered with the huge fragments of the falling pinnacles, and the giant iceberg rolled over with a shock that sent a thrill of awe and terror to the breast of every spectator. Not one of that gay party could ever be induced to try that rash experiment again.

But what is this world with all its brilliancy, with all its hopes, and its alluring pleasures, but a glittering iceberg, melting slowly away? Its false splendour, enchanting to the eye, dissolves, and as drop after drop trickles down its sides, or steals unseen through its hidden pores, its very foundations are undermined, and the steady decay prepares for a sudden catastrophe. Such is the world to many who dance over its surface, and in a false security forget the treacherous footing on which they stand. But can any one who knows what it is, avoid feeling that every moment is pregnant with danger, and that the final catastrophe is hastening on?

Is it in a merely fanciful alarm that we warn you to flee from the wrath to come, that we tell you that every moment of life is full of the deepest solemnity, and that we admonish you of the treacherous character of hopes that glitter like the pinnacles of the iceberg in the sunlight, which a moment may crumble to ruined fragments, strewn over your grave? If it is solemn to die, is it not solemn to live, when any moment may be the door through which you may pass into eternity? What are all the objects upon which you rely—health, strength, youthful vigour—but the frozen marble beneath your feet, that may yield in an hour, when you dream not, and leave you to sink in a river, which no plummet can fathom? Could you be so secure, so heedless of warning, if you realised your true condition?

CHARACTER.

I. DISPOSITION.

1. Differences of character.

(704.) There are differences of character which, springing from constitutional peculiarities, or early education, grace will modify, but never altogether eradicate on this side the grave. Such are those in Bunyan's pictures, all painted, no doubt, from life—as well Mr. Great-heart the giant-killer and hero of a hundred battles, as Mr. Feeble-mind, who started at his own shadow and trembled at the falling of a leaf. There are also differences among Christians which imply no defect; just as there are in countenances which are very unlike, and yet, be the complexion dark or fair, the hair of golden colour or like the raven's wing, are very beautiful. We do not expect or even wish all good men to be alike, any more than I would have all the members of a family alike; all flowers alike—none but roses in the garden, or daisies in the field; the Church of Christ like the meadows below, or the star-spangled heavens above, owing its beauty in part to that variety in unity which marks all the works of God, and mars none of them.

—Guthrie.

2. To what extent we are responsible for it.

(705.) As to constitution—look at Martin Luther : we may see the man every day ; his eyes, and nose, and mouth attest his character. Look at Melancthon : he is like a snail with his couple of horns ; he puts out his horn and feels—and feels—and feels. No education could have rendered these two men alike. Their difference began in the womb. Luther dashes in saying his things ; Melancthon must go round about—he must consider what the Greek says, and what the Syriac says. Some men are born minute men—lexicographers—of a German character : they will hunt through libraries to rectify a syllable. Other men are born keen as a razor ; they have a sharp, severe, strong acumen ; they cut everything to pieces ; their minds are like a case of instruments ; touch which you will, it wounds ; they crucify a modest man. Such men should aim at a right knowledge of character. If they attained this, they would find out the sin that easily besets them. The greater the capacity of such men, the greater their cruelty. They ought to blunt their instruments ; they ought to keep them in a case. Other men are ambitious—fond of power : pride and power give a velocity to their motions. Others are born with a quiet, retiring mind. Some are naturally fierce, and others naturally mild and placable. Men often take to themselves great credit for what they owe entirely to nature. If we would judge rightly, we should see that narrowness or expansion of mind, niggardliness or generosity, delicacy or boldness, have less of merit or demerit than we commonly assign to them. —Cecil, 1748-1810.

(706.) Nature seems to treat man as a painter would his disciple, to whom he commits the outlines of a figure highly sketched, which the scholar for himself is to colour and complete. Thus from nature we derive senses and passions, and an intellect which each of us for himself has to model into a character. —Harris.

(707.) Neither the vices nor the virtues of man are his nature ; to praise or to blame him is not to know him ; approbation or disapprobation does not define him ; the names of good or bad tell us nothing of what he is. Put the robber Cartouche in an Italian court of the fifteenth century ; he would be a great statesman. Transport this nobleman, stingy and narrow-minded, into a shop ; he will be an exemplary tradesman. This public man, of inflexible probity, is in his drawing-room an intolerable coxcomb. This father of a family, so humane, is an idiotic politician. Change a virtue in its circumstances, and it becomes a vice ; change a vice in its circumstances, and it becomes a virtue. Regard the same quality from two sides ; on one it is a fault, on the other a merit. The essential of a man is found concealed far below these moral badges. A character is a force, like gravity, weight, or steam, capable, as it may happen, of pernicious or profitable effects, and which must be defined otherwise than by the amount of weight it can lift or the havoc it can cause. It is therefore to ignore man, to reduce him to an aggregate of virtues and vices ; it is to lose sight in him of all but the exterior and social side : it is to neglect the inner and natural element. —Taine.

(708.) We receive our minds from our birth, just as we do our bodies ; and we are no more responsible for the proportions of the one than we are for the proportions of the other. But as a man, though not responsible for weakness, or deformity, or shortness, or length, or uncouthness of limbs, is responsible for the use to which he puts those limbs, whatever they may be, good or bad, and is responsible for the training they receive ; so, though a man is not responsible for the conditions and proportions of his mind, he is responsible for the training which he gives it—for the restraint of some of its parts, and the development of other of its parts, and the right carriage of the whole. —Becher.

3. How it is formed.

(709.) Character is consolidated habit, and habit forms itself by repeated action. Habits are like paths beaten hard by the multitude of light footsteps which go to and fro. The daily restraint or indulgence of the nature, in the business, in the home, in the imagination, which is the inner laboratory of the life, creates the character which, whether it be here or there, settles the destiny.

—J. Baldwin Brown.

(710.) Amongst the mountains bordering on our northern lakes, a few years back a mighty cave was discovered, consisting of fretted halls, long corridors and aisles, their roofs gemmed with pendant stalagmites, which have grown up into monster mounds of fantastic shapes, as during thousands and thousands of years in those untrodden cavernous retreats, the water, charged with carbonate of lime, has, drop by drop, formed their shapes, white, like ivory ! I have watched the water falling on them, or in the finest sheet of liquid waving over their crests. To the eye it seems marvellous that such mounds of adamant quality could have grown from the passing touch of that element ; but Nature, while displaying her cunning, and exhibiting her process to the beholder, shows him what mighty strata the almost imperceptible flow of water builds up in course of time ; and (what is most to our purpose) shows likewise, in the economy of her constructiveness, that every single drop, and every successive wave of liquid, though finer than tissue paper, must have made its deposit, and left its influence upon the rocky structure. Exactly so is it with our minds. Every influence, the simple, transient, trifling sights and sounds which seem almost too slight to arrest observation, and are so immaterial that they escape our memory, nevertheless (like the water over the stalactite) have passed over the surface of observation and thought, and have added their quota in the construction of our character.

—J. C. M. Bellew.

(711.) Do you know what that silent work is which is going on in you ? O builder ! do you ever think of all the structures that are going up in these great cities ? There are none that are building so fast and with so many hands as that structure of which you are the subject.

We read in fairy tales of how great chasms have been bridged over in a night by benevolent spirits, dwarfs, ouphes, and what not ; how they hustled together vast rocks, and piled one upon another, and built piers, and spanned them with arches, so that the brave knight could pass over them, and reach the castle, and get his lady-love. We read in fairy tales of how cities have been built in a single night ; and we imagine to ourselves how, when we sleep, ten million constructing figures might carry up the walls, and surmount them with golden domes, and how whole cities might stand in the morning where the night before there was only a wilderness. But there is something more strange actually going on in you. There is not a thought that is not striking a blow; there is not an impulse that is not doing mason work; there is not a passion thrust this way or that way that is not a workman's thrust. The imagination in all directions is building. You think that you are throwing out the net for game; you think that you are laying plans for accomplishment; but back of all the conscious work that is going on in you, back of your visible attainments, there is another work going on. There are as many master-workmen in you as there are separate faculties; and there are as many blows being struck as there are separate acts of emotion or volition. And this work is going on perpetually. Every single day these myriad forces are building, building, building. Here is a great structure going up point by point, story by story, although you are not conscious of it. It is a building of character. It is a building that is to stand. And the word of inspiration warns you to take heed how you build it; to see to it that you have a foundation that shall endure; to make sure that you are building on it, not for the hour in which you live, but for that hour of revelation, that hour of testing, when that which hath been done shall be brought out, and you shall be seen just as your are.

—Becher.

4. How it is to be judged.

(712.) As a man loveth, so he is; for the lover is in the thing loved more properly than in himself: wherefore, if a man love earthly things, he may be called an earthly man; but if he love heavenly things or God, he may be called an heavenly or a godly man.

—Colet, 1444-1519.

(713.) Actions, looks, words, steps, form the alphabet by which you may spell characters.

—Lavater, 1741-1801.

(714.) As daylight can be seen through very small holes, so little things will illustrate a person's character.

(715.) We must not form our opinion of men as of a picture or a piece of sculpture, by one view; there is an inward depth and a heart, which we must fathom; the veil of modesty hangs over merit, and the mask of hypocrisy conceals malignity. There are only a small number of judges able to distinguish what is real, and who have a right to give an opinion. It is only little by little, and when laid bare by times and opportunities, that perfect virtue and consummate vice at last show themselves in their true colours.

—La Bruyère, 1646-1696.

(716.) The reflection of other men's good-will toward us we use more than anything else to estimate our characters by. Those who do this are like buoys that are always on the surface of the water, but that move with it as it rises and falls with the ocean-tides. We lie like floats on the world-tide, which goes in and out, and up and down; and we have no gauge on the shore to show what is our absolute condition. It is merely relative to the fluctuations of the ever-shifting, ever-changing tide of human feeling.

—Becher.

(717.) Find what the magnet is that draws each one on, and you have discovered his character. His supreme desire fixes his value. To know what he seeks is to know what manner of man he is, better than by knowing in what way he seeks it: just as you can judge a traveller's destination better by seeing which way his face is set, than by observing his mode of conveyance.

—F. D. Huntington

(718.) I have generally found that a man is not much better than he looks, and if a man's outward life is not right, I shall not feel bound to believe that his inward life is acceptable to God. "Ah, sir," said one in Rowland Hill's time, "he is not exactly what I should like, but he has a good heart at bottom." The shrewd old preacher replied, "When you go to the market and buy fruit, and there are none but rotten apples on the top of the basket, you say to the market woman, 'These are a very bad lot.' Now, if the woman replied, 'Yes, they are rather gone at top, sir, but they are better as you go down,' you would not be so silly as to believe her, but would say, 'No, no, the lower we go, the worse they will be, for the best are always put on the top.'" And so it is with men's characters; if they cannot be decent, sober, and truthful in their daily life, their inner parts are more abominable still; the deeper you pry into their secrets the worse will be the report.

—Spurgeon.

5. The most powerful of all moral influences.

(719.) It is very difficult to persuade men that it is so, because they have the idea that there is only power where there is noise, bustle, and excitement. But it is really not so. All the forces in nature that are the most powerful, are the most quiet. We speak of the rolling thunder as powerful; but gravitation, which makes no noise, is ten thousand times ten thousand times more powerful. We say the red lightning is very powerful; so it is, when it rends the gnarled oak into splinters, or splits the solid battlements into fragments; but it is not half so powerful as that gentle light, that comes so softly from the skies, that we do not feel it, that travels with inconceivable speed, strikes, and yet is not felt. The things that are most noisy are not the most powerful. An eloquent speech will never have the effect of an eloquent life. The most conclusive logic that a preacher uses in the pulpit, will never exercise the effect that the piety, the consistent piety of character, will exercise all over the world. The preacher who may have few to hear him, and who has not the power of expressing clearly and intelligibly the great thoughts that he feels, in his walks amid his flock, by his beautiful and holy character, may be spreading an influence around him that will tell more upon the destinies of souls than if he had wielded all the thunders of Demosthenes, or pleaded with the persuasive eloquence of Cicero. It is not what we intend to do that strikes the most, it is what we are.

—Cumming.

6. Its transcendent importance.

(720.) What does a man take with him when from the extreme verge of life he launches into what lies beyond? It looks as if he took nothing. Death seems to pass a sponge over all that has gone before. Be it the end, or be it a new beginning, it seems a total breaking off from all that life has hitherto consisted in. That is what makes it terrible.

But, if we look at it truly, his past life is just the one thing that a man does take with him when he dies. He takes himself. And that self is the product of all his past experiences and actions. As an oak bears in itself the results of every shower that through long years has freshened it, of every gale that has toughened it or stripped its boughs, of the sunshine that has fad it, and the drought that has parched it; so a man, when he stands at the end of life, is what he has been made by all his joys, and sufferings, and actions. That is what he takes into the other world—his own character.

The life to come and the life that now is are parts of one another. They are related just as youth and manhood are related. The man is not the same that the boy was, but what the boy was entered into the man as a part of him. The strength I gain by my victories this year, and the weakness into which I come by defeat, will be a part of me next year. So, there is not an act, not a word or thought, but casts its influence forward into the to-morrow that lies beyond death.

The whole teaching of the Bible as to the future life centres on this—that what we are now is supremely important with reference to what we shall be then. Every warning, every encouragement, all the grand and terrible imagery of the Judgment, all the tender assurances of Christ, are directed to that end. The object of them all is to impress the transcendent importance of character. Language and thought are tasked to the utmost to express this. Visions of woe unspeakable, of joy ineffable, are used to picture the results of well-doing and evil-doing; to show that they radiate into eternity, and are immeasurable. And we have no right to break the force of this teaching by the assumption that one of two grand results is possible, and that, so a man is saved at last, his misdeeds will hurt him little. That is neither according to Scripture nor moral reason. He that is only righteous is to be "righteous still;" he that is holy, to be "holy still." According as a man has attained in this stage, so is his beginning in the next. He must commence there according as he has finished here, on a high plane or a low one. —Beecher.

II. REPUTATION.

(721.) Your success is very much connected with your personal character. Herod "heard John gladly," and he "did many things," because he knew the preacher to be a just and holy man. Words uttered from the heart find their way to the heart by a holy sympathy. Character is power.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(722.) A young man had volunteered, and was expecting daily to be ordered to the seat of war. One day his mother gave him an unpaid bill with money, and asked him to pay it. When he returned home at night she said, "Did you pay that bill?" "Yes," he answered. In a few days the bill was sent in a second time. "I thought," she said to her son, "that you paid this." "I really don't remember, mother; you know I've had so many thoughts on my mind." "But you said you did." "Well," he answered, "if I said I did, I did." He went away, and his mother took the bill herself to the shop. The young man had been in the town all his life, and what opinion was held of him this will show. "I am quite sure," she said, "that my son paid this some days ago; he has been very busy since, and has quite forgotten about it; but he told me that day he had, and says if he said then that he had, he is quite sure he did." "Well," said the man, "I forget about it; but if he ever said he did, he did." Wasn't that a grand character to have?

CHARACTER. CHRISTIAN

1. Its preciousness.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

(724.) There are sometimes rare and beautiful wares brought into the market that are invoiced at almost fabulous rates. Ignorant people wonder why they are priced so high. The simple reason is that they cost so much to procure. That luxurious article labelled £200 was procured by the adventurous hunter, who, at the hazard of his neck, brought down the wild mountain-goat, out of whose glossy hair the fabric was wrought. Yonder pearl that flashes on the brow of the bride is precious, because it was rescued from the great deep at the risk of the pearl-fisher's life, as he was lifted into the boat half-dead, with the blood gushing from his nostrils. Yonder ermine, flung so carelessly over the proud beauty's shoulder, cost terrible battles with Polar ice and hurricane.

And so is it that the best part of a Christian character is that which was procured at the sorest cost. Patience is a beautiful trait, but it is not worn oftener by those who walk on life's sunny side in silver slippers. It is the product of dark nights of tempest, and of those days of adversity whose high noon is but a midnight. For "the trial of your faith worketh patience." Purity of soul is like purity in gold, where the hottest fires turn out the most refined and precious metals from the crucible. Joseph found his crucible in an Egyptian prison; but he came out thence with the soul of a virgin. Purity of character is often bought in this wicked city by the bitter price of a crust of bread eaten with a good conscience in an attic; when a guilty connivance would have been rewarded with French satins and a harlot's sumptuous couch.

—Cayler.

2. How it is formed.

(725.) Did you ever see a sculptor make a statuette or statue? He begins with dirt, you know. He has a few rude sticks for a frame; and then he puts on the clay. When it is properly tempered, he roughs out the general form. Then he begins to scrape off the plaster. Then he works for symmetry, and lines, and grace, and proportions. Then he works for resemblances. And at last, as the work is becoming consummated, he puts on the finest touches. And all the way through it is dirt, dirt, dirt ! But this is not half so dirty as bringing up men in this world of temptation and passion, where all their desires are overflowing like a flood. Yet, as the sculptor goes on working thus with this lifeless material, to bring out at last the finest lines and lineaments, that the model, when completed, may be transmuted into the glowing marble, or bronze, or silver, or gold, as the case may be—so God is dealing with us ; so He is building us up : He is taking off and putting on, that after a while, when the work is completed, we may be transmuted into higher forms, and be as pillars in the temple of our God, and become men in Christ Jesus glowing with all the light of blessedness and immortality.

—Becher.

(726.) It is not great, or special, or extraordinary experiences which constitute in the best sense the "religious character." It is the uniform daily walk with God ; serving Him in little things as well as great things ;—in the ordinary duties and everyday avocations, as well as in the midst of grave and eventful contingencies. As the sublimest symphony is made up of separate single notes ; as the wealth of the cornfield is made up of separate stalks, or rather of separate grains ; as the magnificent texture, with its gorgeous combinations of colour, its pictures cunningly interwaved by the hand or the shuttle, is made up of individual threads ; as the mightiest avalanche that ever came thundering down from its Alpine throne, uprooting villages and forests, is made up of tiny snow-flakes ; so it is with the spiritual life. That life is itself the grandest illustration of the power of little. Character is the product of daily, hourly actions, and words, and thoughts ; daily forgivenesses, unselfishness, kindnesses, sympathies, charities, sacrifices for the good of others, struggles against temptation, submissiveness under trial. Oh, it is these, like the blending colours in a picture, or the blending notes of music, which constitute "the man !"

—Macduff.

3. Must be positive.

(727.) He is not half a saint who is but a negative saint. The forbearance of gross corruptions is the easiest and least part of religion, and therefore will not speak any man in a state of salvation. The tree that is barren and without good fruit is for the fire, as well as the tree that brings forth evil fruit.

For men to think to excuse themselves that they do no hurt, wrong neither man, woman, or child, and are not, as the Pharisee said, as the publicans, who generally were oppressors, is but a vain, foolish thing. The idle servant might have said, "Lord, I did no harm with my talent ; I did not lay it out in rioting and drunkenness, or any way to Thy dishonour ; I only hid it, and did not improve it,"—yet this was enough to condemn him. Can we call ground good ground for bearing no weeds, if it never bring forth good corn ? Or do we count that servant a good servant who doth not wrong his master in his estate by purloining or wasting it, if he live idle all day, and neglect the business his master appoints him ?

—Swinnock, 1673.

(728.) Reader, believe it, though thou mayest live by a negative religion, yet thou canst not die by it, much less stand before the judgment seat of Christ with it. It is true, even such a religion is of high price with men ; but if alone, it is abomination in the sight of God. Reader, let me reason the case with thee. In other things all are for fruitfulness in what is good. The husbandman would have his ground fruitful in good corn, as well as empty of weeds. He would have his cattle labour, and do him service, and thinks it not enough that they are in the stable or fields, and do him no hurt. The master would have his servant industrious in his shop or field, or some way or other about his business, and is not pleased to see him sit still all day, and forbear to purloin his goods, or fight with his fellow-servants. The father who sends his child to school would have him learn the languages, and profit daily therein, and without this will not be satisfied to hear that his child sits still all day at school, learns no oaths or blasphemies, calls no names, abuses none of his companions. And, reader, why should God be contented with thy harmlessness, when thou art barren and unprofitable ? Hath not God as much right to thee as thou hast to thy ground or cattle ? and art not thou as much bound to God as thy servant or child is bound to thee ? and why, then, shouldst thou think to put God off with that in thyself, which thou wilt not be put off with in thy ground, or cattle, or servant, or child ?

—Swinnock, 1673.

(729.) Christianity ends not in negatives. No man clears his garden of weeds, but in order to the planting of flowers or useful herbs in their room. God calls upon us to dispossess our corruptions, but it is for the reception of new inhabitants. A room may be clean, and yet empty ; but it is not enough that our hearts be swept, unless they be also garnished ; or that we lay aside our pride, our luxury, our covetousness, unless humility, temperance, and liberality, rise up and shine in their places. The design of religion would be very poor and short, should it look no further than only to keep men from being swine, and goats, and tigers, without improving the principles of humanity into positive and higher perfections. The soul may be cleansed from all blots, and yet still be left but a blank.

But Christianity that is of a thriving, aspiring nature, requires to proceed from grace to grace ; to "virtue adding patience, to patience temperance, to temperance meekness, to meekness brotherly kindness," and the like ; thus ascending by degrees, till at length the top of the ladder reaches heaven, and conveys the soul so qualified into the mansions of glory.

—South, 1633-1716.

(730.) In galleries of art we not uncommonly notice statues which seem to be carved in very exact measurement, and yet are thoroughly disappointing. There is an absence of strength, muscle, and vigour ; and then we look at some bold effort of genius where a fault is conspicuous, and yet there is so much nerve and power and effect developed in the rest of the sculpture, that we are charmed with its excellencies, and forget the blemish in the presence of so many recommendations. It is very much the same in character : a tame, powerless, unemphatic character is singularly uninteresting.

—Bellevu.

4. Should be conspicuous for truth and honour.

(731.) These qualities of truth and honour, which the world appreciates and admires, and which the Bible recognises and commends, constitute one of the developments of a Christian character. If you have these qualities, men, after they have associated with you for years, will bear this testimony respecting you: "He is like a glass bee-hive. You can always see what his motives are. He is full of honey. The more you know him, the better you will like him. He is true and honourable." But there are men who are like another kind of bee-hive—one in which the bees are all dead, and there is nothing left except empty comb and miserable moth-millers.

—Baehner.

8. Should be complete.

(732.) You shall rarely find a man eminent in sundry faculties of mind, or sundry manuary trades. If his memory be excellent, his fantasy is but dull: if his fancy be busy and quick, his judgment is but shallow: if his judgment be deep, his utterance is harsh. Which also holds no less in the activities of the hand. And if it happen, that one man be qualified with skill of divers trades, and practice this variety, you shall seldom find such one thriving in his estate. With spiritual gifts, it is otherwise: which are so chained together, that who excels in one, hath some eminency in more; yea, in all. Look upon faith: she is attended with a bevy of graces: he that believes cannot but have hope; if hope, patience: he that believes and hopes, must needs find joy in God; if joy, love of God: he that loves God, cannot but love his brother: his love to God breeds piety and care to please, sorrow for offending, fear to offend; his love to men, fidelity and Christian beneficence. Vices are seldom single; but virtues go ever in troops: they go so thick, that sometimes some are hid in the crowd; which yet are, but appear not. They may be shut out from sight: they cannot be severed.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(733.) In the body you observe, there are many members, yet all make but one body; and every member so useful, that the others are beholden to it. So in the Christian there are many graces, but one new creature; and the eye of knowledge cannot say to the hand of faith, I have no need of thee; nor the hand of faith to the foot of obedience; but all are preserved by the mutual care they have of one another. For as ruin to the whole city may enter at a breach in one part of its wall, and the soul run out through a wound in a particular member of the body; so the ruin of all grace, may, yea, must needs follow on the ruin of any one. There is indeed a stronger bond of necessity between graces of our souls, than there is between the members of our body. 'Tis possible, yea ordinary for some member to be cut off from the body, without the death of the whole, because all the members of the body are not vital parts. But every grace is a vital part in the new creature, and so essential to its very being, that its absence cannot be supplied per vicarium. In the body, one eye can make a shift to do the office of its fellow which is put out; and one hand do the other's work that is cut off, though may be not so exactly; but faith cannot do the office of love, nor love the work of obedience. The lack of one wheel, spoils the motion of the whole clock; and if one grace should be wanting, the end would not be attained for which this rare piece of workmanship is set up in the saint's heart.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(734.) Let your faith set all graces on work in their proper order and proportion; and carry on the work of holiness and obedience in harmony; and set not one part against another, nor look at one while you forget or neglect another.

Every grace and duty is to be a help to all the rest, and the want or neglect of any one is a hindrance to all: as the want of one wheel or smaller particle in a clock or watch will make all stand still, or go out of order. The new creature consisteth of all due parts, as the body doth of all its members. The soul is as a musical instrument, which must neither want one string, nor have one out of tune, nor neglected, without spoiling all the melody. A fragment of the most excellent work, or one member of the comeliest body cut off, is not beautiful; the beauty of a holy soul and life, is not only in the quality of each grace and beauty, but in the proportion, feature, and harmony of all.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(735.) A little infant has all the parts of an adult: there is nothing added to him even to his dying hour: the only difference between him in the different periods of his life is, that his parts are more matured by age, and capable of greater exertion when he arrives at manhood than they were in the earlier stages of his existence. The different rays of light may be separated by a prism, and so be brought under distinct and separate consideration: but it is the assemblage of all the rays that constitute light.

In like manner, we may separate in idea the graces of a Christian: but where there is one truly operative, there is, and must be all. —Simcox.

(736.) When the apostle Peter exhorts all believers to add to their faith, virtue, knowledge, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness and charity, he employs a word in the original Greek, ἐπιχορηγεῖτε, which signifies, to lead a chorus or band of musicians. The idea involved in the expression is, that perfect harmony should exist between all these virtues, as between the notes of a piece of music, each enhancing the effect of the other.

There is harmony in colours as well as in sounds; we see an example of it in every object of nature; and when the proper hues are associated together, the complementary ones contrasting and harmonising with one another, the effect is exceedingly pleasing. As in the field of nature, so in the Christian character, all the graces should blend in such a way that the effect of the whole may be to the eye what sweet melody is to the ear.

Were this the case, no more beautiful or convincing exhibition of the work of the Spirit could be given to the world. Like the four rows of precious stones in the breastplate of the Jewish high-priest, each jewel shining by its own coloured light, and yet contributing to the brilliancy of the whole, this breastplate of righteousness worn by the Christian would invest him with a sacred character, make him an interpreter of the oracles of God, and an instrument of salvation to men. But alas! how rare is such a symmetry of the graces in the Christian character; how seldom are the stones of the spiritual building laid with colours that harmonise with one another. Graces that charm us by their beauty, lie close by the side of defects that repel us. The good qualities are overshadowed by glaring weaknesses. The blue of love may be placed side by side with the sickly green of envy and jealousy, the purple of humility, with the red and angry glare of passion. What virtue is there that does not at times sin against its fellows? What Christian is there, so perfect, that we have not to say of him, as our Lord said of the Asiatic churches after enumerating a long list of their good works, "Nevertheless, I have somewhat against thee?" —Macmillan.

6. How it is to be judged.

(737.) Plutarch speaks of two men that were hired at Athens for some public work, whereof the one was full of tongue, but slow at hand, and the other blank in speech, yet an excellent workman. Being called upon by the magistrates to express themselves, and to declare at large how they would proceed, when the first had made a long speech, and described it from point to point, the other seconded him in few words, saying, "Ye men of Athens, what this man hath said in words that will I make good in true performance." And as he was adjudged the better artisan, so is the man of action the better Christian. It is not the man of words, but the man of deeds—not the leafy, but the fruitful, not the discoursing, but the doing Christian—that shall be blessed here in this world and happy in that which is to come. —Spencer, 1658.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(739.) That is a man's mind and will which is habitually his mind and will. When the very inclination and bent of your will is right, then only is your heart right. A bowl may, by a rub, or bank, be turned contrary to the bias; but when it is over the rub, it will follow the bias again. So the soul is, when hindered from ascending a little while, but when it is got over the stop, it will be mounting upward. A stone will move upwards against its nature, while it is followed by the strength of the hand that cast it; but when the strength is spent, it will quickly fall again. It is not an extraordinary act that you can try yourselves by, but such a free course and tenor of your lives as will prove that you have a new nature, or a heart inclined and habituated to God. The main business, therefore, is to prove that you are habitually resolved.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

—Watson, 1696.

(741.) There is a ring about the Christian man that is not to be mistaken. Do what you will with him, he is not what the other man is, and you cannot make him so. Here is a new coin which looks amazingly like a sovereign, and I turn it over; it is so clever a counterfeit that I cannot discover whether it is gold or no. Here is another: it is a light sovereign I find. I look at them both, and at first sight I am inclined to think that my new minted sovereign is the best of the two; for, say I, the other is evidently much worn and light. But there is a ring about the Christian that proves him to be gold, after all, even when he is worn and short in weight. You may deface him so that the king's image is not apparent upon him, but he is gold for all that; he only needs to be tried, and in the hour of trial that golden sound of grace will detect him, and he will prove still to be one on whom God hath made a difference. —Spurgeon.

(742.) Beethoven was in the habit of playing his symphonies on an old harpsichord as a test. They would thus be made to stand out in their true character, with nothing to hide their faults, or exaggerate their beauties. If, then, they commended themselves to his ear, they were good, and might safely be sent forth to the world.

Thus wisely may we test our character, endeavouring to ascertain how it manifests itself—not on great and rare occasions, or before the public eye, where there is a chance for display and applause, but in private, in the little, homely, everyday duties, which attract no particular attention, and reward us with no praise.

If, in the retired nook of your own breast, in the regulation of your thoughts and feelings; if, in the bosom of your family, in the monotonous round of home life each day, you preserve a sweet, serene temper, and go forward cheerfully, taking a real pleasure in duty as duty, and in all these little matters honestly strive to serve and please the heavenly Master; if, in a word, your piety sounds well on such an unpretending harp, it is good, genuine, tested; it will one day win acclamation from a vaster and nobler throng than ever was thrilled by the genius of Beethoven.

7. The final test in this world.

(743.) Talking recently with a lapidary upon the value of gems and the constant increase of false and spurious stones in the market, we asked: "How do you detect the real from the false—the genuine from the paste?" His reply was: "In these modern days, when art has made marvellous progress; when the keen eye, the steady hand, the wealth of science, are all summoned to aid the workman, there leap out from the furnace and the forge gems that shine and sparkle side by side with the diamond and the chrysoprase, and the spurious dazzles the beholder even as the pure. We try acids, and the false will bear the sharp tooth which heretofore has been sure to detect the counterfeit. We subject the stone to a fiery ordeal, and it comes out unharmed. We try that keen-eyed officer from the sun itself—polarised light, and the jewel shines and smiles unharmed by that terrible test. Time alone is the detective. With the passing years the glory and the beauty of the false pretender fades, and the lustrous gem becomes but a piece of glass or a brittle stone."

So time alone detects character and reveals the true man. When each fading year brings out into clearer relief the crystal beauty of the soul; when with the creeping on of age there shines from the eye a tenderer, softer light; when, as one draws nearer the sunset, there is a divine radiance beaming from every feature,—then may we be sure of the existence of a true diamond, whose lustre eternity itself cannot dim. These are the ones of whom it is said: "And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of Hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels."

Brilliant talents, a high position, commanding influence, the applause of an admiring people, are no tests of a man's character; they may all centre about him, and yet he be false within. Time, with its trials and burdens, its corroding care and bitter temptations, will surely prove of what stuff he is made.

8. The standard of judgment in the world to some.

(744.) When Christ comes with His scales, thou shalt not be measured with that man; but every man shall be weighed with God.

—Donne, 1573-1631.

9. In its first stages is sometimes unlovely.

(745.) A young Christian is like a green fruit. It has perhaps a disagreeable austerity, which cannot be corrected out of its proper course; it wants time and growth: wait a while, and by the nourishment it receives from the root, together with the action of the sun, wind, and rain, in succession from without, it will insensibly acquire that flavour and maturity, for the want of which an unskillful judge would be ready to reject it as nothing worth.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(746.) With all their faults, methinks there is something very beautiful and engaging in the honest vehemence of a young convert. Some cold and rigid judges are ready to reject these promising appearances on account of incidental blemishes. But would a gardener throw away a fine nectarine, because it is green, and has not yet attained all that beauty and flavour which a few more showers and suns will impart?

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(747.) When a strong spring gushes up in a stagnant pool, it makes some commotion at the first; and looking at the murky stream with its flotilla of duckweed tumbling down the declivity, and the expatriated newts and horse-leeches crawling through the grass, and inhaling the miasma from the inky runnel, you may question whether the irruption of this powerful current has made matters any better. But come anon, when the living water has floated out the stagnant elements, and when, instead of mephitic mud, skinned over with a film of treacherous verdure, the bright fountain gladdens its mirrored edge with its leaping fulness, then trips away on its merry path, the benefactor of thirsty beasts and weary fields.

So the first manifestations of the new and the spiritual element in a carnal mind are of a mingled sort. The pellicle of decency, the floating duckweed of surface-seemliness, which once spread over the character, is broken up, and accomplishments and amusing qualities, which made the man very companionable and agreeable, have for the present disappeared. There is a great break-up; and it is the passing away of the old things, which is at first more conspicuous and less pleasing than the appearance of the new. In these earlier stages of regenerate history, the contrition and self-reproach of the penitent often assume the form of an artificial demureness and voluntary humility; and in the general disturbance of those elements which have long lain in their specious stagnation, defects of character formerly hidden, are perceived sooner than the beauties of a holiness scarce yet developed. But "spring up, O well! sing ye unto it." If this incisive process go freely on—if the living water spring up fast enough to clear out the sedimentary selfishness of the natural mind, with its reptile inmates—if the inflowings of heavenly life be copious enough to impart a truly "fervent spirit"—come again. Survey that character when the love of God has become its second nature. In place of the silt and evil savour, the mean and sordid motives which once fermented there, view the simplicity and godly sincerity—the light-welcoming transparency, which reflects the Sun of righteousness above it, and the forms of truth around it; and instead of the fast evaporating scantiness of its former selfishness, follow its track of diffusive freshness through the green pastures which it gladdens, and beneath those branches which gratefully sing over it.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

10. How it is to be sustained.

(748.) A Christian life is the living Christ manifesting Himself. It is the vital power putting forth leaves and fruits—the vine sending out its strength into the branches. It cannot be too deeply impressed upon us that Christianity is a profound connection of the soul with Christ—that it is not an imitation of a splendid model, but the indwelling of a living person—that the Christ form is only the outward development of the Christ nature, the life manifesting itself after its kind. You all know that the various forms of vegetable creation are sustained and perfected by a secret, silent, but resistless power which we call life. It is this that lifts the oak in the forest, and spreads its mighty branches to the storm; and this that carpets the earth with verdure and decks the fields with teeming flowers. In the great and in the small, in the tree and in the herb, in the pine of the mountain and the grasses of the field, this secret but resistless principle asserts its power. Now, thus is it with us as Christian men; our Christianity is a principle of life; we are not imitations, we are alive; we are not artificial flowers, we are flowers growing in the garden; or, to keep to the metaphor of our text, we are branches growing in the Vine.

—J. W. Boulding.

CHEERFULNESS.

1. Is not levity.

(749.) Between levity and cheerfulness there is a wide distinction; and the mind which is most open to levity is frequently a stranger to cheerfulness. It has been remarked that transports of intemperate mirth are often no more than flashes from the dark cloud; and that in proportion to the violence of the effulgence is the succeeding gloom. Levity may be the forced production of folly or vice; cheerfulness is the natural offspring of wisdom and virtue only. The one is an occasional agitation; the other a permanent habit. The one degrades the character; the other is perfectly consistent with the dignity of reason, and the steady and manly spirit of religion. To aim at a constant succession of high and vivid sensations of pleasure is an idea of happiness perfectly chimerical. Calm and temperate enjoyment is the utmost that is allotted to man. Beyond this we struggle in vain to raise our state; and in fact depress our joys by endeavouring to heighten them. Instead of those fallacious hopes of perpetual festivity with which the world would allure us, religion confers upon us a cheerful tranquillity. Instead of dazzling us with meteors of joy which sparkle and expire, it sheds around us a calm and steady light, more solid, more equal, and more lasting.

—Blair, 1718-1756.

2. Is better than mirth.

(750.) I have always preferred cheerfulness to mirth. The latter I consider as an act, the former as a habit of the mind. Mirth is short and transient, cheerfulness fixed and permanent. Those are often raised into the greatest transports of mirth who are subject to the greatest depressions of melancholy. On the contrary, cheerfulness, though it does not give the mind such an exquisite gladness, prevents us from falling into any depths of sorrow. Mirth is like a flash of lightning, that breaks through a gloom of clouds, and glitters for a moment; cheerfulness keeps up a kind of daylight in the mind, and fills it with a steady and perpetual serenity.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

3. Is not a sign of weakness of character.

(751.) Leaves seem light and useless and idle and wavering and changeable; they even dance; yet God has made them part of the oak. In so doing He has given us a lesson not to deny the stout-heartedness within because we see the light-someness without.

—J. C. Hare.

4. Its helpfulness.

(752.) Give us, Oh, give us the man who sings at his work! Be his occupation what it may, he is equal to any of those who follow the same pursuit in silent sullenness. He will do more in the same time—he will do it better—he will persevere longer. One is scarcely sensible of fatigue whilst he marches to music. The very stars are said to make harmony as they revolve in their spheres. Wondrous is the strength of cheerfulness, altogether past calculation its powers of endurance. Efforts, to be permanently useful, must be uniformly joyous—a spirit all sunshine—grateful from very gladness—beautiful because bright.

—Carlyle.

(753.) A man who acquires a habit of giving way to depression is on the road to ruin. When trouble comes upon him, instead of rousing his energies to combat it, he weakens, and his faculties grow dull, and his judgment becomes obscured, and he sinks in the slough of despair. And if anybody pulls him out by main force and places him safe on solid ground, he stands there dejected and discouraged, and is pretty sure to waste the means of help which have been given him. How different it is with the man who takes a cheery view of life even at its worst, and faces every ill with unyielding pluck! He may be swept away by an overwhelming tide of misfortune, but he bravely struggles for the shore, and is ever ready to make the most of the help that may be given him. A cheerful, hopeful, courageous disposition is an invaluable trait of character, and should be assiduously cultivated.

(754.) Patience and cheerfulness adorn the ruins of fortune, as ivy does those of castles and temples.

5. Promotes health.

(755.) Cheerfulness is the best promoter of health. Repinings, and secret murmurs of heart, give imperceptible strokes to those delicate fibres of which the vital parts are composed, and wear out the machine insensibly; not to mention those violent ferments which they stir up in the blood, and those irregular disturbed motions which they raise in the animal spirits. I scarce remember, in my own observation, to have met with many old men, or with such who (to use our English phrase) wear well, that had not at least a certain indolence in their humour, if not a more than ordinary gaiety and cheerfulness of heart. The truth of it is, health and cheerfulness mutually beget each other; with this difference, that we seldom meet with a great degree of health which is not attended with a certain cheerfulness, but very often see cheerfulness where there is no great degree of health.

Cheerfulness bears the same friendly regard to the mind as to the body. It banishes all anxious care and discontent, soothes and composes the passions, and keeps the soul in a perpetual calm.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

6. Is a Christian duty.

(756.) Many Christians do greatly wrong themselves with a dull and heavy kind of sullenness; who, not suffering themselves to delight in any worldly thing, are thereupon oftentimes so heartless, that they delight in nothing. These men, like too careless guests, when they are invited to an excellent banquet, lose their dainties for want of a stomach; and lose their stomach for want of exercise. A good conscience keeps always good cheer: he cannot choose but fare well that hath it; unless he lose his appetite with neglect and slothfulness. It is a shame for us Christians, not to find as much joy in God, as worldlings do in their forced merriments, and lewd wretches in the practice of their sins.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(757.) Christian, what ill news hath Christ brought from heaven with Him, that makes thee walk with thy folded arms and pensive countenance? (Psal. cxxxii. 16). To see a wicked man merry, or a Christian sad, is alike uncomely. "A feast is made for laughter," saith Solomon. I am sure God intended His people's joy in the feast of the Gospel; mourners were not to sit at God's table (Deut. xxvi.). Truly the saint's heaviness reflects unkindly upon God Himself; we do not commend his cheer, if it doth not cheer us. What saith the world? "The Christian's life is but a melancholy walk," sure thinks the carnal wretch, "it is a dry feast they sit at, where so little wine of joy is drunk." And wilt thou confirm them in this their opinion, Christian? Shall they have thy example to produce against Christ and His Word, which promise peace and joy to all that will come to this feast? O God forbid, that thy conversation, wherein thou art to hold forth the Word of life, to live in the eyes of the world, and which ought to be as a comment or gloss upon the Word, to clear up the truth and reality of it to others; that this should so disagree from the text, as to make the gladsome tidings spoken of in it more disputed and questioned in the thoughts of the unbelieving world than before. It is an error, I confess, and that a gross one, which the Papists teach; that we cannot know the Scriptures to be the Word of God, but by the testimony of the Church; yet it is none to say, that a practical testimony from the saints' lives, hath great authority over the consciences of men, to convince them of the truth of the Gospel. Now they will believe 'tis good news indeed the Gospel brings, when they can read it in your cheerful lives; but when they observe Christians sad with this cup of salvation in their hands, truly they suspect the wine in it is not so good as the preachers commend it to them for. Should men see all that trade to the Indies come home poorer than they went, it would be hard to persuade others to venture thither for all the golden mountains said to be there. O Christians, let the world see you are not losers in your joy, since you have been acquainted with the Gospel; give not them cause to think by your uncomfortable walking, that when they turn Christians, they must bid all joy farewell, and resolve to spend their days in a house of mourning.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

If we consider him in relation to the persons whom he converses with, it naturally produces love and good-will towards him. A cheerful mind is not only disposed to be affable and obliging, but raises the same good-humour in those who come within its influence. A man finds himself pleased, he does not know why, with the cheerfulness of his companion. It is like a sudden sunshine that awakens a secret delight in the mind, without her attending to it. The heart rejoices of its own accord, and naturally flows out into friendship and benevolence towards the person who has so kindly an effect upon it.

When I consider this cheerful state of mind in its third relation, I cannot but look upon it as a constant habitual gratitude to the great Author of nature. An inward cheerfulness is an implicit praise and thanksgiving to Providence under all its dispensations. It is a kind of acquiescence in the state wherein we are placed, and a secret approbation of the Divine will in His conduct towards man.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

(759.) I have, in former papers, shown how great a tendency there is to cheerfulness in religion, and how such a frame of mind is not only the most lovely, but the most commendable, in a virtuous person. In short, those who represent religion in so unamiable a light are like the spies sent by Moses to make a discovery of the land of promise, when by their reports they discouraged the people from entering upon it. Those who show us the joy, the cheerfulness, the good-humour, that naturally springs up in this happy state, are like the spies bringing along with them the clusters of grapes and delicious fruits that might invite their companions into the pleasant country which produced them.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

(760.) If any man has springs of cheerfulness and of good-nature in him, in the name of the God of benevolence let him not stop them up. Let him rather keep them open, that they may be a source of joy and consolation to his fellow-men. I have sometimes heard it said of young men that before they joined the Church they were good fellows, but that afterward there was nothing in them. It is because some men think that religion consists in tying up the natural faculties. On the contrary, I think it consists in untying them, in giving them a wholesome development, and so making them better and sweeter and larger.

We do not put a colt into the harness for the sake of diminishing his power, but simply for the sake of directing it; and we are putting the harness on men, not to take away their power, but to organise it for use, and to make it more facile. And in regard to good cheer, humour, buoyancy of disposition, hopefulness—if a man has it naturally, it is an inestimable gift; and religion should make it more—not less.

—Becher.

(761.) When people want to make things attractive in farming, they give exhibitions of their products. The women bring their very best butter, moulded into tempting golden lumps; and the men bring the noblest beets and vegetables of every kind; and from the orchards they bring the rarest fruits: and when you go into the room where all these things are displayed, they seem to you attractive and beautiful.

It seems to me that is the way a Christian church ought to represent the Christian life. You ought to pile up your apples and pears and peaches and flowers and vegetables, to show what is the positive fruit of religion. But many people in Christian life do as farmers would do who should go to a show, and carry—one, pigweed; another, thistles; another, dock; and another, old hard lumps of clay;—and should arrange these worthless things along the sides of the rodm, and mourn over them. What sort of husbandry would that be? Christians are too apt to represent the dark side of religion in their conversation and meetings.

Christ prayed for His disciples, that they might bring forth fruit. He declared to them that in the Divine administration, God, as vintner, sought to make the vine bring forth more and more fruit. Bearing fruit, sweet, luscious, and blessed, is the business of the Christian life.

—Becher.

(762.) It is necessary for some people to remember that cheerfulness, good spirits, light-heartedness, merriment, are not unchristian nor unsaintly. We do not please God more by eating bitter aloes than by eating honey. A cloudy, foggy, rainy day is not more heavenly than a day of sunshine. A funeral march is not so much like the music of angels as the songs of birds on a May morning. There is no more religion in the gaunt naked forest in winter than in the laughing blossoms of the spring, and the rich, ripe fruits of autumn. It was not the pleasant things in the world that came from the devil, and the dreary things from God; it was "sin brought death into the world and all our woe;" as the sin vanishes, the woe will vanish too. God Himself is the ever-blessed God. He dwells in the light of joy as well as of purity, and instead of becoming more like Him as we become more miserable, and as all the brightness and glory of life are extinguished, we become more like God as our blessedness becomes more complete. The great Christian graces are radiant with happiness. Faith, hope, charity—there is no sadness in them;—and if penitence makes the heart sad, penitence belongs to the sinner, not to the saint; as we become more saintly, we have less sin to sorrow over. No, the religion of Christ is not a religion of sorrow. It consoles wretchedness and brightens with a Divine glory the lustre of every inferior joy. It attracts to itself the broken-hearted, the lonely, the weary, the despairing, but it is to give them rest, comfort, and peace. It rekindles hope; it inspires strength, courage, and joy. It checks the merriment of the thoughtless who have never considered the graver and more awful realities of man's life and destiny, but it is to lead them through transient sorrow to deeper and more perfect blessedness, even in this world, than they had ever felt before the sorrow came.

CHILDHOOD

1. Its beauty.

(763.) The morning, with every flower glistening in dews, the fresh air loaded with perfumes, the hills bathed in golden light, the skies ringing with the song of larks, is beautiful. Beautiful as is the morning of day, so is that of life. Fallen though we are, there remains a purity, modesty, ingenuousness, and tenderness of conscience, about childhood, that looks as if the glory of Eden yet lingered over it, like the light of day on hilltops at even, when the sun is down. The Word of God, no doubt, declares infants as well as others to be dead in trespasses and sin; and I don't say but there is death; still it is like death before the body has grown stiff and cold, the colour of life fled the cheek, or decay effaced its beauty. Look at a little child! It does not behave itself unseemly; does not rejoice in iniquity; does not glory in its shame; nor stand with unblushing front before a shocked and wondering world to avow its vileness, and proclaim itself seducer, liar, murderer. Blushes mantle on its cheek; and it has a conscience in its bosom, which protests against thoughts and words and actions, that men live to boast of. Sins, afterwards committed without compunction, and rolled as a sweet morsel under the tongue, are followed in early life by fears and uneasy feelings, stings of conscience and bitings of remorse; and the child is no more like what the man becomes, than a rosebud, bursting its sheath, breathing odours, and opening into beauty, is like that vile, soiled, and rotten thing which I have seen hanging on the leafless branch—a nest of worms, and smelling rank of decay.

—Guthrie.

2. Its sacredness.

(764.) Can we think that Holy Scripture thus tells us of the sacred Childhood of Jesus, and means us not to reverence childhood? Feel we not (at least, if we be not deadened by this world's vanities) a drawing forth of our inmost hearts towards them, a tender love, a reverence for them, which, alas! we cannot have for ourselves, and often not for others of riper years?

—Pusey.

3. Christ's sympathy for childhood.

(765.) Jesus was the first great teacher of men who showed a genuine sympathy for childhood,—perhaps the only teacher of antiquity who cared for childhood as such. Plato treats of children and their games, but he treats them from the stand-point of a publicist. They are elements not to be left out in constructing society. Children, in Plato's eyes, are not to be neglected, because children will inevitably come to be men and women. But Jesus was the first who loved childhood for the sake of childhood. In the earlier stages of civilisation it is the main endeavour of men to get away from childhood. It represents immaturity of body and mind, ignorance and folly. The ancients esteemed it their first duty to put away childish things. It was Jesus who, seeking to bring about a new and higher development of character, perceived that there were elements in childhood to be preserved in the highest manhood; that a man must, indeed, set back again toward the innocence and simplicity of childhood if he would be truly a man. Until Jesus Christ, the world had no place for childhood in its thoughts. When He said, "Of such is the kingdom of Heaven," it was a revelation.

—Eggleston.

CHILDREN

I. Why they are sent to us.

(766.) Tell me not of the trim, precisely-arranged homes where there are no children; "where," as the good Germans have it, "the fly-traps always hang straight on the wall;" tell me not of the never-disturbed nights and days, of the tranquil, unanxious hearts, where children are not! I care not for these things. God sends children for another purpose than merely to keep up the race:—to enlarge our hearts, to make us unselfish, and full of kindly sympathies and affections; to give our souls higher aims, and to call out all our faculties to extended enterprise and exertion; to bring round our fireside bright faces and happy smiles, and loving, tender hearts. My soul blesses the Great Father every day, that He has gladdened the earth with little children.

—Mary Hewitt.

2. Necessary to complete the home.

(767.) A house is never perfectly furnished for enjoyment unless there is a child in it rising three years old, and a kitten rising three weeks.

—Southey.

3. Their preciousness.

(768.) God bless the dear children! What would our homes be without them! We may have done much for them. They have done more for us. What a salve for a wounded heart there is in the soft palm of a child's hand. Did harp or flute ever have such music as there is in a child's "good-night." From our coarse, rough life, the angels of God are often driven back; but who comes into the nursery without feeling that angels are hovering around.

On one of the Lake steamers there was a father and two daughters journeying. They seemed extremely poor. A benevolent gentleman stepped up to the poor man, to proffer some form of relief, and said, "You seem to be very poor, sir." "Poor, sir!" replied the man, "if there's a poorer man than me a troublin' the world, God pity both of us!" "I will take one of your children, and adopt it, if you say so. I think it would be a great relief to you." "A what?" said the poor man. "A relief! Would it be a relief to have the hands chopped off from the body, or the heart torn from the breast? A relief, indeed! God be good to us! What do you mean, sir?"

—Talmage

4. Are causes of anxiety as well as of joy.

(769.) Yet it may be doubted whether the pleasure of seeing children ripened into strength be not over-balanced by the pain of seeing some fall in the blossom, and others blasted in their growth; some shaken down by storms, some tainted with cankers, and some shrivelled in the shade; and whether he that extends his care beyond himself does not multiply his anxieties more than his pleasures, and wear himself to no purpose, by superintending what he cannot regulate.

—Dr. S. Johnson.

6. Are little men and women.

(770.) When I see the motherly airs of my little daughters when playing with their puppets, I cannot but flatter myself that their husbands and children will be happy in the possession of such wives and mothers.
—Addison, 1672-1719.

6. Preciousness of their love.

(771.) I love these little people; and it is not a slight thing when they, who are so fresh from God, love us.
—Dickens.

7. Their happiness.

(772.) I seem, for my own part, to see the benevolence of the Deity more clearly in the pleasures of very young children than in anything in the world.
—Paley.

8. Their hopefulness.

(773.) Nothing seems to weigh down their buoyant spirits long; misfortune may fall to their lot, but the shadows it casts upon their life-path are fleeting as the clouds that come and go in an April sky. Their future may, perchance, appear dark to others, but to their fearless gaze it looms up brilliant and beautiful as the walls of a fairy palace.
—Tegner.

9. Their selfishness.

(774.) I know it is a shocking thing to say, but the children are mostly selfish: so long as you are administering to their amusement or comfort, they will love you, but the moment it becomes necessary to thwart a whim or control a passion, you are altogether hateful; and they hate you for the time being very cordially. I have been loved and hated myself a dozen times a week; and I know a little damsel now who, when her temper is crossed, tells her governess that she hates her pet cat, and is not above giving the innocent pussy a sly blow or kick as proxy for its much-enduring mistress.
—Household Words.

10. Their susceptibility to impressions of every kind.

(775.) It is the law of human nature that, when it is beginning to grow, it shall be soft as wax to receive all kinds of impressions, and then that it shall gradually stiffen and become hard as adamant to retain them. The rock was once all fluid and plastic, and gradually it cools down into hardness. If a finger-dint had been put upon it in the early time, it would have left a mark that all the forces of the world could not make, nor can obliterate now. In our great museums you see stone slabs with the marks of rain that fell hundreds of years before Adam lived; and the footprint of some wild bird that passed across the beach in those old, old times. The passing shower and the light foot left their prints on the soft sediment; then ages went on, and it has hardened into stone; and there they remain and will remain for evermore. That is like a man's spirit; in the childish days so soft, so susceptible to all impressions, so joyous to receive new ideas, treasuring them all up, gathering them all into itself, retaining them all for ever. And then, as years go on, habit, the growth of the soul into steadiness and power, and many other reasons beside, gradually make us less and less capable of being profoundly and permanently influenced by anything outside us; so that the process from childhood to manhood is a process of getting less impressible.

—MacLaren.

(776.) How quick a child is to observe, how ready to catch and retain impressions; no photographic plate is so exquisitely sensitive to the image which the sun paints upon it.
—Cuyler.

11. The importance and power of parental example.

(777.) We may read in the fable what the mother crab said to the daughter: "Go forward, my daughter; go forward!" The daughter replied, "Good mother, do you show me the way!" whereupon the mother, crawling backward and sidling, as she was wont, the daughter cried out, "Lo, mother! I go just as you do!"
—Griffith.

(778.) If you would have honour from your children, set them a good example. It makes children despise their parents, when the parents live in a contradiction to their own precepts; when they bid their children be sober, yet they themselves will be drunk: they bid their children fear God, yet are themselves loose in their lives. Oh! if you would have your children honour you, teach them by an holy example. A father is a looking-glass which the child oft dresseth himself by; let the glass be clear, and not spotted.
—Watson, 1696.

(779.) Amongst the causes assigned for the continuance and diffusion of the same moral sentiments amongst mankind, may be mentioned imitation. The efficacy of this principle is more observable in children; indeed, if there be anything in them which deserves the name of an instinct, it is their propensity to imitation. Now, there is nothing which children imitate or apply more readily than expressions of affection and aversion, of approbation, hatred, resentment, and the like; and when these passions and expressions are once connected, which they soon will be by the same association which unites words with their ideas, the passion will follow the expression, and attach upon the object to which the child has been accustomed to apply the epithet.
—Paley.

12. Their claims upon us.

(780.) Children are travellers newly arrived in a strange country; we should therefore make conscience not to mislead them.
—Locke, 1632-1704.

13. Importance of early training.

(781.) Reason would teach us, if revelation did not, that childhood was the most propitious period of life to instil those precepts—ingraft those truths—and form those habits which become the people of God, who are emphatically styled a holy and peculiar people. It is common sense to put the seal to the wax while it is soft; to bud the tender twig with the fruit it should bear; to go to the fountain-head, and guide the current of the stream; and to lay hold upon the young tendrils of the shooting vine, and to train them as we would have them to go.
—Jackson, 1640.

(782.) There is little hope of children who are educated wickedly. If the dye have been in the wool, it is hard to get it out of the cloth.
—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(783.) Every thing must be taken in its time.

Let a bladder alone till it be dry, and all the wind in the world cannot fill it, no not so much as raise it up; whereas being new and moist, the least breath enlarges it. It is not otherwise in ages and dispositions. Inform a child in precepts of learning and virtue, of which his years make him capable, how pliable he yields, how happily is he replenished with knowledge and goodness! But let him alone till time and example have hardened him, till he be settled in an habit of evil, and contracted and clung together with sensual delights, he becomes utterly indocible; sooner may such a plant bow than brake, such a bladder be broken than extended.

—Hall, 1576-1656.

(784.) What if some prove naught that are well brought up? it is not the generality of them. Will you say that Noah's family was no better than the drowned world, because there was one Cham in it; nor David's because there was one Absalom; nor Christ's because there was one Judas?

But what if it were so: have men need of the less teaching, or the more? You have more wit in the matters of this world. You will not say, "I see many labour hard, and yet are poor, and therefore it is as good never to labour at all;" you will not say, "Many that go to school learn nothing, and therefore they may learn as much though they never go; or many that are great tradesmen break, and therefore it is as good never to trade at all; or many great eaters are as lean as others, and many sick men recover no strength though they eat, and therefore it is as good for men never to eat more; or many plough and sow, and have nothing come up, and therefore it is as good never to plough more." What a fool were he that should reason thus! And is he not a thousand times worse that shall reason thus for men's souls? Peter reasons the clean contrary way, "If the righteous be scarcely saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" And so doth Christ, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate, for many shall seek to enter, and not be able."

Other men's miscarriages should quicken our diligence, and not make us cast away all. What would you think of that man that should look over into his neighbour's garden, and because he sees here and there a nettle or weed among much better stuff, should say, "Why you may see these men that bestow so much pains in digging and weeding, have weeds in their garden as well as I that do nothing, and therefore who would be at so much pains?" Just thus doth the mad world talk; you may see now that those that pray and read and follow sermons, have their faults as well as we, and have wicked persons among them as well as we. Yea, but that is not the whole garden, as yours is; it is but here and there a weed, and as soon as they spy it, they pluck it up, and cast it away.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(785.) Do all that in you lies to check and discourage in them the first beginnings of sin and vice; so soon as ever they appear pluck them up by the roots. This is like the weeding of corn, which is a necessary piece of good husbandry. Vices like ill weeds grow apace, and if they once take to the soil, it will be hard to extirpate and kill them; but if we watch them and cut them up as soon as they appear, this will discourage the root and make it die.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(786.) It is of the last importance to season the passions of a child with devotion, which seldom dies in a mind that has received an early tincture of it. Though it may seem extinguished for a while by the cares of the world, the heats of youth, or the allurements of vice, it generally breaks out and discovers itself again as soon as discretion, consideration, age, or misfortunes have brought the man to himself. The fire may be covered and overlaid, but cannot be entirely quenched and smothered.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

(787.) Those soils which are the most productive are called vegetable, to distinguish them from sandy and clayey soils; and, as their name imports, they are produced from the decay of a succession of vegetable productions. It is by much bearing in a lower kind that they attain their fertility in a higher. For everything is so created and constituted of God, as to be able to fructify the seeds of some one plant or another. The very rock, when exposed to the heat of the sun, you will find covered with a moss, then with a lichen, and then perhaps with a grass; and so on, according to a succession which my knowledge of the vegetable kingdom doth not enable me to describe. And when the plant, of whatever kind it is, hath come to perfection, and yielded its stem and leaves and fruits and seeds, all these, except the seed, decay, and resolve themselves into earth again; whereby another coating is furnished to the ground; and so by much bearing a good and deep soil is at length produced, fit for the seeds of the husbandman. In like manner it is in man, that by much bearing of fruits in the lower degrees of instinct and knowledge, of kindly feelings and honest practices, a soil in due time is prepared which will receive and fructify the seed of the Word of God, and bring forth the fruits of the Spirit to the praise and glory of God.

It is further to be observed, that the plants and seeds which are first produced by any soil in this progress towards fertility, are of an inferior kind in the scale of vegetable life, and fit only for the nourishment of insects and fowls, but not for the nourishment of man or beast, or at least in a very insufficient degree. But chiefly, it would seem, are they ordained of God for this very end of preparing a soil upon which the richer fruits and more nourishing plants may grow; the production of the lower being, as it were, to serve as the ground-work for the production of the higher kind. And so in human nature the right education and training of children in the ways of understanding and truth and honesty and dutifulness is to be diligently ensued; not so much for the present advantages, or disadvantages though these be many, but with a long-sighted wisdom to the future man, and a full conviction that we are thereby laying the materials for a more precious husbandry of spiritual things, to be carried on by an omnipotent and invisible hand.

And still further it is to be observed, that if, in due time, when the soil hath been ripened for the tillage of animal food, it should not be turned to this use, then doth it change its nature, and heave up into moss, or corrupt into marsh, or take on some other unproductive and even noxious quality; whereby nature doth signify, that, when she has laboured so long for man's support and well-being, if he will not profit by her care, she will straightway avenge his neglect of her by something troublesome to his convenience, offensive to his taste, or even destructive to his life. This again teacheth us, that, after a man has been reared up in the observation of all the duties, and the practice of all the moralities, and the study of all the faculties of his nature and opportunities of his place; if he refuse the seed of the Word of God, for which all the rest is but the preparation, or if you withhold it from him, he will, for want of the wholesome influences thereof, become puffed up with pride, filled with conceit, intoxicated with power, or in some other way evil-conditioned, the end of whom will be worse than the beginning. —Irving.

(788.) A celebrated theological professor of Princeton was asked by a sceptic: "Doctor, how do you explain this? You say that 'Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it.' Now, how do you account for the fact that your Bill is such a dissipated fellow?" The Doctor replied: "The promise is, when he is old he will not depart from it. Bill is not old yet!" Subsequent years have shown the wisdom of the Doctor's faith. Bill is old now, and a Christian. —Talmage.

14. Must first of all be taught to exercise self-restraint.

(789.) Young people who have been habitually gratified in all their desires will not only more indulge in capricious desires, but will infallibly take it more amiss when the feelings or happiness of others require that they should be thwarted, than those who have been practically trained to the habit of subduing and restraining them, and consequently will, in general, sacrifice the happiness of others to their own selfish indulgence. To what else is the selfishness of princes and other great people to be attributed? It is in vain to think of cultivating principles of generosity and beneficence by mere exhortation and reasoning. Nothing but the practical habit of overcoming our own selfishness, and of familiarly encountering privations and discomfort on account of others, will ever enable us to do it when required. And therefore I am firmly persuaded that indulgence infallibly produces selfishness and hardness of heart, and that nothing but a pretty severe discipline and control can lay the foundation of a magnanimous character.

—Lord Jeffrey.

15. Must be taught line upon line.

(790.) In dibbling beans the old practice was to put three in each hole: one for the worm, one for the crow, and one to live and produce the crop. In teaching children, we must give line upon line, and precept upon precept, repeating the truth which we would inculcate, till it becomes impossible for the child to forget it. We may well give the lesson once expecting the child's frail memory to lose it; twice, reckoning that the devil, like an ill bird, will steal it; thrice, hoping that it will take root downward, and bring forth fruit upward to the glory of God. —Spurgeon.

16. Their curiosity is not to be repressed, but instructed.

(791.) Curiosity in children nature has provided to remove that ignorance they were born with; which, without this busy inquisitiveness, will make them dull.

Children should always be heard, and fairly and kindly answered, when they ask after anything they would know, and desire to be informed about. Curiosity should be as carefully cherished in children as other appetites suppressed.

—Locke, 1632-1704.

17. Books for them must be carefully chosen.

(792.) The influence exercised by works of fiction is overlooked by those who suppose that a child's character, moral and intellectual, is formed by those books only which are put into his hands with that design. As hardly anything can accidentally touch the soft clay without stamping its mark on it, so hardly any reading can interest a child without contributing in some degree, though the book itself be afterwards totally forgotten, to form the character; and the parents, therefore, who, merely requiring from him a certain course of study, pay little or no attention to story-books, are educating him they know not how. —Whately.

18. Must be instructed in the Scriptures.

(793.) Would mathematical science thrive if Euclid and the Principia were to cease from the studies of our youth? Would the public watchfulness of the people over their rulers thrive if they were to refrain from perusing the daily intelligence, and conversing of public affairs? Will religion thrive if the Word of God be not studied and its topics conferred on? If at that season when our youth of first family and ambition are preparing their minds for guiding affairs, by courses of early discipline in public schools, and those of second rank are entered to the various professions of life, if then no pains be taken to draw their attention to the sacred writings, and impress principles of piety and virtue upon their minds, how can it be expected that religion should even have a chance? One cannot always be learning; youth is for learning, manhood for acting, and old age for enjoying the fruits of both. I ask, Why, when the future lawyer is studying Blackstone or Lyttleton; the future physician, Hippocrates and Sydenham; the future economist, Smith and Malthus; the future statesman, Locke and Sydney; each that he may prepare for filling a reputable station, in the present world,—Why is the future immortal not at the same time studying the two Testaments of God, in order to prepare for the world to come, in which every one of us hath a more valuable stake? If immortality be nothing but the conjuration of priests to cheat the world, then let it pass, and our books go to the wind like the sibyls' leaves; but if immortality be neither the dream of fond enthusiasts, nor the trick of artful priests, but the revelation of the righteous God; then let us have the literature and the science, and the practice for the long after-stage of our being, as well as for the present time, which is but its porch. These pleadings are to men who believe immortality (we may hereafter plead with those otherwise minded); therefore justify your belief, and show your gratitude by taking thought and pains about the great concerns of that immortality which you believe. —Irving.

19. Should be trained to attend public worship.

(794.) The question is often asked how shall we get our working-classes to attend public worship. The answer may be supplied by an incident of my boyhood. On the mantle-shelf of my grandmother's best parlour, among other marvels was an apple in a phial. It quite filled up the body of the bottle, and my wondering inquiry was, "How could it have been got into its place?" By stealth I climbed a chair to see if the bottom would unscrew, or if there had been a join in the glass throughout the length of the phial. I was satisfied by careful observation that neither of these theories could be supported, and the apple remained to me an enigma and a mystery. But as it was said of that other wonder, the source of the Nile—

"Nature well known no mystery remains,"— so was it here. Walking in the garden I saw a phial placed on a tree bearing within it a tiny apple, which was growing within the crystal; now I saw it all; the apple was put into the bottle while it was little, and it grew there. Just so must we catch the little men and women who swarm our streets—we call them boys and girls—and introduce them within the influence of the church, for alas! it is hard indeed to reach them when they have ripened in carelessness and sin.

—Spurgeon.

30. Are not incapable of faith.

(795.) There are persons who appear to think that the comprehensions of the theology of Christianity, or of the philosophy of the atonement, is essential to its efficiency, and that therefore children are incapable of faith. We hold a totally different opinion. Much that is called theology and philosophy on this subject, is neither Divine revelation nor sound human wisdom, and we devoutly wish that much which is presented to us as an explanation of the atonement, had never been put forth by lip, or pen, or press. We believe that it is possible to accept all the intended benefit from the sin-offering of the Saviour, without comprehending or knowing even all that God has spoken on the topic. To know that Christ died for the ungodly, and that Jesus died for us, is all the knowledge of the atonement that is essential to salvation; and none can deny that a little child is capable of such knowledge. That subsequent sense of mystery, which leads us men to look for explanations, has nothing whatever to do with the efficacy of the sacrifice of the Son of God. On the contrary, as many dyspeptic persons are robbed of nutriment from the food which they eat, by reading books upon digestion, so many Christians are deprived of much comfort from "the precious blood of Jesus," by their everlasting "Why?" and "How is it?"—and by their not receiving the kingdom of heaven as a little child. "A little child." Yes, a little child, who feels the meaning of those words, "for us," in the phrase, "Christ died for us,"—the child who can say, Father goes to work "for" me, and mother has made herself so tired "for" me, can attach a sufficient meaning to the words, "Jesus died for us," to qualify him to believe on that Jesus for the saving of the soul.

—Samuel Martin.

(796.) A Sunday-school teacher was trying to make his class understand the dependence of the branches on the vine. "Jesus is the vine; we are the branches. We derive all our life and happiness from Him." "Yes," said a little fellow,

"Jesus is the vine; grown-up people are the branches; and we are the buds."

21. Their repentance real.

(797.) We have already admitted that a child's knowledge of sin is necessarily small, that its sense of sin is feeble, and its sorrow for sin shallow. But then it must be remembered that, comparatively speaking, the actual transgressions of most children are but few, and that godly sorrow is a slow growth, even in the adult convert. Moreover, the genuineness of repentance is entirely independent of the number and of the character of the sins to be repented of, and equally independent of the degree of regret and, self-chiding which are experienced. How slight is the deviation from the main line at what are termed the points of a railway junction; and yet a divergence, almost imperceptible at first, leads to a terminus, far away from that into which the metals of the trunk line would have conducted the train. The tiny daisy as really turns its face to the sun, as the tall and stately sunflower. A drop of water from the snow which melts on the grass blade, as it grows upon the bank of the glacier stream, as really finds its way to the ocean, as the waters that rush from beneath the glacier itself. The grain of gold dust is as really precious metal as the bar of gold. True life is as really in the germ or in the foetus, as in the full-grown animal or tree. The tears of the tiny infant as effectually lave the eye, as the tears of a full-grown man. We are too apt to apply the standard of quantity to spiritual things. Thus prayers are estimated by their length or frequency, and pecuniary gifts by their commercial value, and service by the time devoted to it. It is quite true that the tears of a child are not continuous—

"The tear on childhood's cheek that flows,
Is like the dewdrop on the rose."

It is true that the sighs of a child are not heavy; they are not, as in the soul of manhood and womanhood, ocean waves, but they are rather like the ripple upon the waters of some sheltered lake. It is true that the emotions of a child are not the hardy blossoms of a sturdy fruit tree, but the tender and delicate bloom of a tree that has as yet yielded little more than promise of fruit. Nevertheless, that blossom, which winds will tear and shake, is the outflowing of life; that ripple on the lake shows susceptibility in the water towards its sister element, air; and those dewdrop tears show that earth and heaven, man and God, are working upon the child's nature. The hands of the infant united, as we have all seen them joined in the familiar statue of Hannah's child, and in the pictorial representations of the infant Samuel, may express as real a repentance, and may as distinctly appeal to heaven, as the publican's smiting upon his breast, and crying, "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

—Samuel Martin.

22. Should be taught to look to Jesus.

(798.) Godly children are God's workmanship, created by Jesus Christ, and if we would be the means of leading children into true godliness, we must bid them to look to our Saviour Jesus. I say to Him, not at Him. Some who have to do with the religious instruction of children, require them to look at Christ instead of to Him. There is a vast difference between these things. The child looks at the queen, when he goes to see her proceed in state to open the Parliament; but he looks to his mother, when he relies on her for the supply of his daily wants. We look at the statue, say of Jenner, or of Abernethy, but we look to our medical attendant for advice and healing. We look at Pitt or Fox, as they now stand before us in marble or stone, but we look to the prime minister of the day for the conduct of our national affairs. We Christians know for ourselves, that it is not by looking at Jesus, as at a great sight, that we are saved; but by looking to Him, as to a loving, personal Redeemer; therefore, in speaking to children of the Son of God, it is important to speak of Him, not as of a Being to be looked at, but looked unto.

—Samuel Martin.

(799.) Mirabeau was once asked what was the best way of teaching popular liberty? He replied, "Begin with the infant in the cradle, and let the first name it lisps be Washington." So we would say to Christian parents, the best way to teach your children the knowledge of that liberty which makes them free indeed, is to begin in the cradle, and let the first name you teach them to speak be Jesus.

22. True godliness in children is childlike.

(800.) The ability to talk religiously is no sign of early piety. Speech seasoned with religious phrases and with texts of Scripture, may be a mere matter of taste, or may spring from a desire to please Christian kindred and friends, or from a wish to be noticed, and to receive attention from particular persons. Further, the profession of piety is no proof of early godliness, for this may be mere imitation. The most certain sign of early piety is that which is called in Scripture "doing that which is right in the sight of the Lord." "By their fruits ye shall know them." Godly conduct is godliness outside, and it proves the existence of godliness within. But the point to which we would call attention is this, that very often a degree of perfection is looked for in a child, before his claim to be accounted godly is allowed, and a degree of maturity is required, which is not demanded from an adult professor of religion. The waters of the Gulf Stream (which in or near the Gulf of Mexico, are of an indigo-blue), are said to be so distinctly marked, that their line of junction with the common sea-water may be traced by the eye. Often one half of a vessel may be seen floating in the Gulf Stream water, while the other half is in the common water of the sea; so sharp is the line, and such the want of affinity between those waters, and such the reluctance, so to speak, on the part of the Gulf Stream to mingle with the common water of the sea. In like manner, through much in a child's conduct that is disobedient and unloving and godless, may be sometimes seen a stream of obedient, loving, and Christian action, proving that a fountain of living water has been opened in the heart, and affording reason to hope that in due time, as this fount is made deeper and wider, the pure stream will expand, until it covers the entire outer life. Or, to adopt another illustration, we sometimes see in a little child the moral fighting of a little soldier, and the moral courage of a little hero. With a disposition to do wrong, and with many temptations to that which is evil, the child fights with all his power of heart and arm. He is sometimes defeated, but still life, even to that little one, is a battle—a hard and honest struggle. The children who are marked out by these observations, exhibit the most trustworthy signs of true godliness. If life be all peaceful, and calm, and united, it is difficult to say, what of apparent godliness is traceable to constitution, and temperament, and imitation. But if there be a stream within a stream, if there be a hard and heavy conflict, then we may say, Here is the finger of God, here is the hand of Jesus Christ, and here is the workmanship of the Holy Ghost.

—Samuel Martin.

24. A child's faith in prayer.

(801.) God answers all true believing petitions that are addressed to Him, and the more we trust Him the safer we are. One cannot be too confident.

A Sunday-school pupil one time had a great grown-up sister, whom he loved very much. She was gay and worldly and would not go to church. This boy said one day to his teacher: "Oh! I wish Sarah would read the Bible." His teacher replied: "Well, you must pray God to lead her to do so, and that will do her good and make her a Christian." So, when the school prayer-meeting was held, the teacher gave out that one of the scholars wished his sister prayed for. After others had prayed, to the surprise of everybody the lad himself rose and reverently uttered a little prayer. Then at once he left the room. His teacher rebuked him afterwards because he went out of the meeting. "Oh!" said he, "I did so want to see how Sarah would look with a Bible in her hands." Now that is the right spirit. We must follow up our prayers, and see what becomes of them.

25. How religion is to be commended to them.

(802.) We have especially cause to bear in mind a remark of the Rev. C. Simeon's, when we are attempting to bring the young under religious influences. A lady had asked him if we ought always to be talking about religion. "No, no!" answered the good man, rather precipitately, "let your speech be seasoned with salt; seasoned with salt, madam, not a whole mouthful." Nothing produces more fatal results than "dinning" religion into a child; the "whole mouthful" crammed into the child's mouth being simply rejected with disgust. Though, in dealing with children, everything should be seasoned with the salt of true religion, yet we must remember that small vessels are soon filled, and He who is "touched with the feeling of our infirmities" certainly meant us to be touched with the infirmities of little children.

26. Their religious training devolves especially upon their parents.

(803.) Our children are not born with Bibles in their heads or hearts. And who ought to be the instructor, if not the parent? yea, who will do it with such natural affection? As I have heard sometimes a mother say in other respects, Who can take such pains with my child, and be so careful as myself that am its mother? Bloody parents then they are, who acquaint not their children with God or His Word; what do they but put them under a necessity of perishing, if God stir not up some to show more mercy than themselves to them? Is it any wonder to hear that ship to be sunk or dashed upon the rock which was put to sea without chart or compass? no more is it they should ingulph themselves in sin and perdition that are thrust forth into the world (which is a sea of temptation) without the knowledge of God, or their duty to Him.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(804.) The Church began at first in a family, and was preserved by the godly care of parents in instructing their children and household in the truths of God, whereby the knowledge of God was transmitted from generation to generation; and though now the Church is not confined to such strait limits, yet every private family is as a little nursery to the Church; if the nursery be not carefully planted, the orchard will soon decay. Oh, could you be willing, Christians, that your children when you are laid in the dust, should be turned into the degenerate plants of a strange vine, and prove a generation that do not know God? Atheism needs not to be planted, you do enough to make your children such, if you do not endeavour to plant religion in their minds. The very neglect of the gardener to sow and dress his garden, gives advantage enough to the weeds to come up. This is the difference between religion and atheism, religion doth not grow without planting, but will die even where it is planted without watering. Atheism, irreligion, and profaneness are weeds that will grow without setting, but they will not die without plucking up; all care and means are little enough to stub them up. And, therefore, you that are parents, and do not teach your children, deal the more unrighteously with God, because you neglect the best season in their whole life for planting in them the knowledge of God, and plucking up the contrary weeds of atheism and irreligion. Young weeds come up with most ease, sinful ignorance in youth becomes wilful ignorance, yea, impudence in age: you will not instruct them when young, and they will scorn their ministers when they are old.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(805.) Some will further object, and say, "It is the work of ministers to teach both us and our children, and therefore we may be excused."

Answer.—It is first your duty, and then the minister's. It will be no excuse for you, because it is their work, except you could prove it were only theirs. Magistrates must govern both you and your children: doth it therefore follow that you must not govern them? It belongs to the schoolmaster to correct them, and doth it not belong also to you? There must go many hands to this great work, as to the building of a house there must be many workmen, one to one part, and another to another; and as your corn must go through many hands before it be bread: the reaper's, the thresher's, the miller's, the baker's; and one must not leave their part, and say, It belongs to the other: so it is here in the instructing of your children: first you must do your work, and then the minister do his: you must be doing it privately night and day; the minister must do it publicly and privately as oft as he can.
—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(806.) It is not laws and orders that will reform us, if the men be not good, and reformation begin not at home. When children go wicked from the hands of their parents, thence some come such to the universities, and so we come to have an ungodly ministry, and in every profession they bring this fruit of their education with them. When gentlemen teach their children only to hunt, and hawk, and game, and deride the godly, what magistrates, and what parliaments, and so what government, and what a commonwealth are we likely to have, when all must be guided by such as these! Some perverse, inconsiderate persons lay the blame of all this on the ministers; that people of all sorts are so ignorant and profane; as if one man can do the work of many hundreds. I beseech you that are masters and parents, do your own duties, and free ministers from these unjust aspersions, and the Church from her reproach and confusion. Have not ministers work enough of their own to do? Oh, that you knew what it is that lieth on them! And if, besides this, you will cast upon them the work of every master and parent in the parish, is it likely, indeed, to be well done? How many sorts of workmen must there be to the building of a house? And if all of these should cast it upon one, and themselves do nothing, you may judge how much were likely to be done. If there be three or four schoolmasters in a school, amongst three or four hundred scholars, and all the lower that should fit them for the higher schools should do nothing at all but send all these scholars to the highest schoolmaster as ignorant as they received there, would not his life be a burden to him, and all the work be frustrated and spoiled? Why, so it is here. The first work towards the reforming and making happy of Church and Commonwealth, lies in the good education of your children; the most of this is your work; and if this be left undone, and then they come to the ministers raw and ignorant, and hardened in their sins also, what can a minister do? Whereas, if they come trained up in the principles of religion, and the practice of godliness, and were taught the fear of God in their youth, oh, what an encouragement would it be to ministers! And how would the work go in our hands! I tell you seriously, this is the cause of all our miseries and unreformedness in Church and State, even the want of a holy education of children. Many lay the blame on this neglect and that, but there is none hath so great a hand in it as this. What a school must there needs be where all are brought raw, as I said, to the highest form! What a house must there needs be built, when clay is brought to the masons' hands instead of bricks! What a commonwealth may be expected if all the constables and justices should do nothing but cast all upon king and parliament! And so, what a Church may we expect when all the parents and masters in the parish shall cast all their duty on their ministers!

I entreat you that are parents, also to consider what excellent advantages you have above all others for the saving of your children. They are under your hands while they are young, and tender, and flexible; but they come to ministers when they are grown older, and stiffer, and settled in their ways, and think themselves too good to be catechised, and too old to be taught. You have a twig to bend, and we an oak. You have the young plants of sin to pluck up, and we the deep-rooted vices. The consciences of children are not so seared with a custom of sinning and long-resisting grace as others. You have the soft and tender earth to plough in, and we have the hard and stony ways, that have been trodden on by many years' practice of evil. When they are young, their understandings are like a sheet of white paper, that hath nothing written on, and so you have opportunity to write what you will. But when they are grown up in sin, they are like the same paper written over with falsehoods, which must all be blotted out again, and truth written in the place. And how hard is that! We have hardened hearts to beat on like a smith's anvil, that will not feel us; we may tell them of death and judgment, heaven and hell, and they hear us as if they were asleep or dead; you have the soft clay to mould, and we have the hardened burned bricks. You have them before they are possessed with prejudice and false conceits against the truth, but we have them to teach when they have many years lived among those that have scorned at godliness, and taught them to think God's ways to be foolish preciseness. Custom hath not ensnared and engaged our little ones to contrary ways, but of old sinners, the Lord Himself hath said, "that if the Ethiopian can change his skin, and the leopard his spots, then may those that are accustomed to do evil, learn to do well." Doth not the experience of all the world show you the power of education? What else makes all the children of the Jews to be Jews; and all the children of the Turks to be Mahometans; and of Christians to be in profession Christians; and of each sect or party in religion to follow their parents and the custom of the place? Why now, what an advantage have you to use all this for the furtherance of their happiness, and possess them as strongly beforehand against sin, as else Satan would do for it; and so Satan would come to them upon some of those disadvantages that now Christ comes on.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

27. Their precocious developments are to be checked.

(807.) Here is a great tree overlaid with blossoms. It is not possible that all these should prosper; one of them must needs rob the other of moisture and growth.

I do not love to see an infancy over hopeful: in these pregnant beginnings, one faculty starves another; and, at last, leaves the mind sapless and barren. As, therefore, we are wont to pull off the too-frequent blossoms that the rest may thrive; so, it is good wisdom to moderate the early excess of the parts of progress of over-forward childhood.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

28. Should be trained to industry.

(808.) When your children are grown up, put them to some lawful calling, wherein they may serve their generation. And it is good to consult the natural genius and inclination of a child; forced callings do as ill, sometimes, as forced matches. To let a child be out of a calling is to expose it to temptation. A child out of a calling is like fallow-ground; and what can you expect should grow up but weeds of disobedience?

—Watson, 1696.

(809.) Honest work is the best employment for fallen man; and the bread of idleness breeds sin and trouble in those that eat it. This is often illustrated in the luxuriant affluence of tropical vegetation. The unsought bounty of nature there feeds a race of idle and dissolute men,

"Where every prospect pleases,
And only man is vile;"

and the plenty granted by Heaven becomes a dire calamity to those who misimprove the benefits bestowed by God. "Mr. Dilke believes that the banana plant is one of the greatest curses of tropical countries, because it will support life with no labour. It grows as a weed, and hangs down its bunches of ripe, tempting fruit into your lap as you lie in its cool shade. It will make nothing; you can eat it raw or fried, and that is all; you can eat it every day of your life without becoming tired of its taste; without suffering in your health you can live on it exclusively. 'The terrible results of the plentiful possession of this tree are seen in Ceylon, at Panama, in the coast lands of Mexico, and at Auckland in New Zealand. At Pitcairn's island, the plantain grove has beaten the missionary from the field; there is much lip Christianity, but no practice to be got from a people who possess the fatal plant. The much-abused' coconut cannot come near it as a devil's agent.'"

Such are the results of eating the bread of idleness, and yet how many parents toil, and save, and hoard, that they may bring up their children in idleness, and leave to them a fortune as fatal as the banana plant, a fortune which exempts them from toil, but seduces them into sin; spares them from the sorrows of want, and the curse of labour, but which dooms them to the bondage of sin and corruption in this world, and the vengeance of eternal fire at last.

29. Learn little from the experience of their parents.

(810.) Ah! do men learn by the experience of others? They are like birds, which allow themselves to be caught in the same nets in which already a hundred thousand of their species have been caught. There is no one who does not enter quite fresh into life, and the follies of the fathers are no warning to the children.

—Fontenelle.

30. Their discipline.

(811.) They who provide much wealth for their children, but neglect to improve them in virtue, do like those who feed their horses high, but never train them to the manage.

—Socrates.

(812.) As we are wont to slack the strings of our bows and lutes to make them the stiffer, and to hold the better when we list to shoot or play: so, likewise, it is needful that parents and schoolmasters should require no more of their children and scholars than they are able to do, lest they discourage them and make them to hate their study or any other thing whereto they would bring them.

—Cawdray, 1598-1664.

(813.) In order to form the minds of children, the first thing to be done is to conquer their will. To inform the understanding is a work of time, and must, with children, proceed by slow degrees, as they are able to bear it; but the subjecting the will must be done at once, and the sooner the better; for, by neglecting timely correction, they will contract a stubbornness and obstinacy which are hardly ever conquered, and not without using such severity as would be as painful to me as the child. In the esteem of the world they pass for kind and indulgent, whom I call cruel, parents, who permit their children to get habits which they know must afterwards be broken. When the will of a child is subdued, and it is brought to revere and stand in awe of its parents, then a great many childish follies and inadvertencies may be passed by. Some should be overlooked, and others mildly reprov'd; but no wilful transgression ought to be forgiven without such chastisement, less or more, as the nature and circumstances of the offence may require. I insist upon conquering the will of children betimes, because this is the only strong and rational foundation of a religious education, without which both precept and example will be ineffectual. But when this is thoroughly done, then a child is capable of being governed by the reason and piety of its parents till its own understanding comes to maturity, and the principles of religion have taken root in the mind.

—Locke, 1632-1704.

(815.) Discipline should respect each child in particular according to his disposition. In the same family there may be a variety of tempers, which will require a varied method of treatment, in addition to the general principles of education which will apply alike to all minds. And therefore, as the farmer consults the nature of his land, adapting the seed to the soil; and as the physician studies the constitution of his patient, suiting the remedy to the disease; so ought every parent to study the dispositions of all his children, that he may adapt his discipline to the particularities of their respective tempers.

—James.

31. Their correction.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(817.) Great severities do often work an effect quite contrary to that which was intended. And many times those who were bred up in a very severe school, hate learning ever after for the sake of the cruelty that was used to force it upon them: and so likewise an endeavour to bring children to piety and goodness by unreasonable strictness and rigour, does often beget in them a lasting disgust and prejudice against religion; and teaches them, as Erasmus says, "To hate virtue at the same time that they teach them to know it;" for by this means virtue is represented to the minds of children under a great disadvantage, and good and evil are brought too near together, so that whenever they think of religion, they remember the severity which was wont to accompany the instructions about it; and the natural hatred which men have for punishment, is by this means derived upon religion itself. And indeed how can it be expected that children should love their duty when they never hear of it but with a handful of rods shook over them?

I insist upon this the more, because I do not remember to have observed more notorious instances of great miscarriage than in the children of very strict and severe parents; of which I can give no other account but this—that nature when it is thus overcharged recoils the more terribly; it hath something in it like the spring of an engine, which being forcibly pressed, does, upon the first liberty, return back with so much the greater violence. In like manner the vicious dispositions of children, when restrained merely by the severity of parents, do break forth strangely as soon as ever they get loose and from under their discipline.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(818.) I would not have children much beaten for their faults, because I would not have them think bodily pain the greatest punishment.

—Locke, 1632-1704.

(819.) If a child, when questioned for anything, directly confess, you must commend his ingenuity, and pardon the fault, be it what it will.

—Locke, 1632-1704.

(820.) Excess of severity is one danger. My mother, on the contrary, would talk to me, and weep as she talked. I flung out of the house with an oath; but wept too when I got into the street. Sympathy is the powerful engine of a mother. I was desperate: I would go on board a privateer. But there are soft moments to such desperadoes. God does not, at once, abandon them to themselves. There are times when the man says—"I should be glad to return; but I should not like to meet that face!" if he has been treated with severity.

Yet excess of laxity is another danger. The case of Eli affords a serious warning on this subject. Instead of his mild expostulation on the flagrant wickedness of his sons—"Nay, my sons, it is no good report that I hear"—he ought to have exercised his authority as a parent and magistrate in punishing and restraining their crimes.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(821.) Be very gentle with the children God has given you; watch over them constantly; reprove them earnestly, but not in anger. In the forcible language of Scripture, "Be not bitter against them." "Yes, they are good boys," I once heard a kind father say; "I talk to them very much, but do not like to beat my children—the world will beat them." It was a beautiful thought, though not elegantly expressed. Yes: there is not one child in the circle round the table, healthful and happy as they look now, on whose head, if long enough spared, the storm will not beat. Adversity may wither them, sickness may fade, a cold world may frown on them, but amidst all let memory carry them back to a home where the law of kindness reigned, where the mother's reproving eye was moistened with a tear, and the father frowned "more in sorrow than in anger."

—Elihu Burritt.

32. Should be trusted.

(822.) Give a dog a bad name—and hang him. Treat a man as a rascal and his moral character will have to be founded on adamant virtue, or it will split. There was never a schoolmaster who trusted all to his own shrewdness and nothing to the children's honour that did not have a tricky lot of scholars. "As well have the game as the name," is more than a poacher's proverb. On the contrary, while trustfulness is liable to imposition, persistent confidence breeds honour and not deceit, certainly in the long run. "There's no use in lying to the Doctor," said the boys of Rugby, in good old Dr. Arnold's time; "he believes everything you say!"

—Stawin.

32. Should be encouraged in virtuous actions.

(823.) Encourage that which you see good and commendable in your children. Virtus laudata crescit. Commending that which is good in your children, makes them more in love with virtuous actions; and is like the watering of plants, which makes them grow more.
—Watson, 1696.

34. Suffer for their parents' sins.

(824.) This is a truth evident by universal experience. It is seen every day, in every part of the world. If Mr. Paine indulge in intemperance, and leave children behind him, they may feel the consequences of his misconduct when he is in the grave. The sins of the father may thus be visited upon the children to the third and fourth generation. It would, however, be their affliction only, and not their punishment. Yet such visitations are wisely ordered as a motive to sobriety.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

36. A reason for parental solicitude on their behalf.

(825.) Consider what a sad inheritance you have conveyed to your children. You have transmitted to them corrupt and depraved natures, evil and vicious inclinations: you have begotten them in your own image and likeness, so that by nature they are children of wrath. Now, methinks, parents that have a due sense of this should be very solicitous, by the best means they can use, to free them from that curse; by endeavouring to correct those perverse dispositions, and cursed inclinations, which they have transmitted to them. Surely you ought to do all you can to repair that broken estate which from you is descended upon them.

When a man hath by treason tainted his blood and forfeited his estate, with what grief and regret doth he look upon his children, and think of the injury he hath done to them by his fault; and how solicitous is he, before he die, to petition the king for favour to his children; how earnestly doth he charge his friends to be careful of them and kind to them; that by these means he may make the best reparation he can of their fortune which hath been ruined by his fault.

And have parents such a tenderness for their children, in reference to their estate and condition in this world; and have they none for the good estate of their souls and their eternal condition in another world? If you are sensible that their blood is tainted, and that their best fortunes are ruined by your sad misfortune, why do you not bestir yourselves for the repairing of God's image in them? Why do you not travail in birth till Christ be formed in them? Why do you not pray earnestly to God, and give Him no rest, who hath reprieved, and, it may be, pardoned you, that He would extend His grace to them also, and grant them the blessings of His new covenant?

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

36. Are not to be apprenticed to ungodly masters.

(826.) Think how precious the soul of your child is. It is immortal, it is capable of communion with God and angels: and will you let this soul be lost, by placing it in a bad family? If you had a horse you loved, you would not put him into a stable with other horses that were sick and diseased; and do you not love your child better than your horse?

—Watson, 1696.

37. Their influence for good.

(827.) Children are not apt to remember how much good they can do merely with words they can speak. Sometimes I think they can do even more than men and women; for nobody is half as likely to be angry with a child for telling him what he ought not to do as he would, perhaps, be with a minister or some older person. I have known the hardest sort of people to be quite kind and thoughtful when rebuked by those who were too small for them to strike or curse for being faithful.

Not long ago, I read, there was a Highland boy sitting on the door-stone, with some half-dozen others. They were singing Sunday-school hymns. Along came a half-drunken man, who said with an awful oath, "Does your master teach you nothing better than these silly songs?" When up spoke this sharp little fellow, six years old: "Why, yes, sir. He teaches us it is wicked for any one to swear!" The man hurried on silently, as if he were ashamed; and afterwards told how he had become a better man because of the rebuke the child gave him.

There was a great and good man lecturing in London; and he happened to say: "Everybody has influence; even that little girl." And as he said this, he pointed to a child sitting on her father's knee. "That is true," said the man, right out in the meeting. Afterward he waited to make an apology for the interruption. "I could not help speaking," he said. "I used to be a drunkard, and this little girl of mine pleaded with me to stop going to the ale-house. I was angry, and knocked her down. But she got up and came straight to me, saying: 'Twasn't you, father, but the rum, that struck me.' And I felt so sorry that I never went again. This little child is my very best friend in the world."

(828.) A few days I saw a large, strong man come forward as a candidate for church membership. By the hand he held a fair, delicate child of nine years, and pointing to her as the tears rolled down his cheeks, he said: "She showed me the way." I knew I was a sinner, and needed the pardon and sanctification, but I kept putting the matter off. I heard the most powerful sermons, but would say: 'Go thy way for this time.' My pious wife entreated me to be reconciled to Jesus, but I turned a deaf ear to all her persuasions. But when my little daughter came again and again, and putting her loving little arms about my neck would say, 'Dear father, won't you go to heaven, too? Father, you don't know how good Jesus is. O father! He died for you and me; can't you love Him?'—I could resist no longer; and blessed be the God of my dear child, He is mine too now, and shall be mine to all eternity." Thus was the father's soul saved through the prayers and entreaties of a little child.

32. Their death.

(829.) If a young man, or if a young daughter die, what a great mourning beginneth there to be! "Alas! he is taken away in his young days before his time; he should first have been married, and had a good wife upon earth, and in his last age have died in peace and rest." Hereof cometh it that we think the death of children to be unnatural, even as when the flame of fire through water is violently quenched. The death of the aged we think to be natural, as when the fire quencheth of itself, according to the saying of Cicero. The death of young persons is compared to unripe apples that with violence are plucked off from the tree: the death of the aged is thought to be as when ripe apples fall down of themselves.

If God had promised every one a long life, then mightest thou complain at the shortening of the life of thyself or of thy friends against God's promise. No man hath cause to complain of an untimely death; whatsoever one hath lived over and beside the first day of his birth, it is an increase.

Moreover, though we remain a long season in this fickle transitory life, yet is all our time but short, especially towards the endless eternity. Therefore it hath but a slender difference to depart hence in youth, or in age.

He that is upon the sea, and with a good strong wind is carried soon to the haven where he would be, is happier than he that for lack of wind is fain to sail still many days upon the sea with much trouble and weariness. Even so the more happy is he, whom death taketh away from the stormy sea of this world. Seeing there is set before us a universal native country, and he that is long in going thither obtaineth no more than he that is speedily gone thither beforehand; should not one wish that he had soon overcome the foul dangerous way that leadeth to the heavenly harbour?

The sooner one payeth his debt, the better it is. If there were none other remedy, but that with an hundred more thou must needs be beheaded, and thou art the first that is put to execution, art thou not then the first that is dispatched of the pain?

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(830.) If a great lord had called thee and thy son, and promised thee much wealth and good, shouldst thou weep when thy son goeth to him, and thou thyself wilt shortly follow after? No, verily; but thou wouldst order thy matter so that thou mightest be there out of hand. Why unquietest thou thyself then so sore for the death of thy son or friend? The Almighty Lord hath called him and thee to His eternal kingdom, to place thee and him among the princes of heaven. Thy son passeth hence through the gates of death; he shall rise again to honour. Why vexest thou then thyself? Why orderest not thou thyself joyfully to follow him? for thou hast not lost him, but only sent him before. If it were possible that thy son knew of thy immeasurable wailing, and could speak unto thee, without all doubt he himself would rebuke it.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(831.) Ye have lost a child; nay, she is not lost to you, who is found in Christ; she is not sent away, but only sent before; like unto a star which, going out of sight, does not die and vanish, but shines in another hemisphere.

—Rutherford, 1661.

(832.) Ah! we sometimes, I fear, compel Jesus to take "away" our children, that through the bereavement He may overcome and melt savingly our callous hearts. It mindeth me of another little story worth telling. A shepherd had folded safely and well a flock of ewes—all save one, which would not enter, do what he would. The gate was flung wide open, and with all gentle constraint he sought to guide it in—sparing it the rough bark of his dog. But no! still it would run back. At last, for the shades of evening were falling, and folded all must be, if he were not to be "too late" for home himself—he sprang out, seized her lamb, raised it tenderly to his bosom, laid it right upon his heart as he would his own nestling babe, and carrying it within the fold, placed it down there. Then, ah! then the poor ewe ran in—ran in after her little lamb, and was safe with it. It is a parable. But fathers! mothers! still away from the Good Shepherd, and grieving sorely over your Willie or Mary, will you not run in after your little lamb? Will you compel Him to take another and another?

—Grosart.

(833.) God cultivates many flowers, seemingly only for their exquisite beauty and fragrance. For when, bathed in soft sunshine, they have burst into blossom, then the Divine hand gathers them from the earthly fields to be kept in crystal vases in the deathless mansions above. Thus little children die—some in the sweet bud, some in the fuller blossom; but never too early to make heaven fairer and sweeter with their immortal bloom.

—Wadsworth.

33. Death of an infidel's child.

(834.) As Lucy — lay on her sick bed, all that a tender mother could do to mitigate pain, or to restore God's gift of health, was done in vain. The angel of death was on the threshold, prepared to take the child through the dark valley to her eternal home. She had lain some hours still; at last she roused up and saw her parents watching, one on either side of the bed. She looked at them both with penetrating gaze which is so often seen in eyes that are soon to close on all mortal sights, and said, reaching out her hand feebly towards her father: "Father, I'm sure I'm dying—I feel I am. What would you wish me to believe? what you have taught about Jesus?" The man shook from head to foot, as if smitten through with a dart. He answered: "Oh Lucy dear, believe what your mother has taught you." "Ah—yes! then that is— is true—true, mother dear; He's your Jesus and He's mine." She spoke with difficulty; a cough impeded her utterance. For a few minutes all were still, then there was one look, one smile, the quivering lips whispered: "Blessed be"—Angel ears alone heard the finish of the sentence, as the soul went up to heaven. Creeping on her knees round the bed to her husband's side, the wife took his hand, and said, "He was her Jesus; He is mine; He wants to be yours. Oh, pray—pray, let me beseech you—pray this prayer: 'Lord, I believe; help Thou my unbelief.' " . . . Some years have passed since the scene recorded, and the infidel father has become a humble happy Christian.

CHRIST.

1. HIS DEITY.

1. The doctrine of His Deity pervades the New Testament.

(835.) So thoroughly intermingled with the whole texture of New Testament Scripture is the Godhead of the Saviour, that no criticism which does not destroy the book can altogether extinguish its testimony. We have seen a copy of the Gospels and Epistles which was warranted free from all trace of the Trinity, but it was not the Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. We beheld it, and we received instruction. It did not want beauty; for the parables, and the sermon on the mount, and many a touching passage, still were there. But neither would a garden want beauty if the grass-plots and green bushes still remained, though you had carefully called out every blossoming flower. The humanity of Jesus still is beautiful, even when the Godhead is forgotten or denied. Or rather it looked like a coronation tapestry, with all the golden threads torn out, or an exquisite mosaic from which some unscrupulous finger had abstracted the gems and only left the common stones: you not only missed the glory of the whole, but in the fractures of the peace and the coarse plaster with which the gaps were supplied, you saw how rude was the process by which its jewels had been wrenched away. It was a casket without the pearl. It was a shrine without the Shekinah. And yet, after all, it was not sufficiently expurgated; for after reading it, the thought would recur, how much easier to fabricate a Gnostic Testament exempt from all trace of our Lord's humanity, than a Trinitarian Testament ignoring His Divinity. —Hamilton, 1814-1867.

2. The doctrine of His Deity is essential to our respect for Him.

(836.) Whatever may be the fate of the question as to the divinity of Christ, textually, and upon the lower grounds of philosophy, it seems impossible to me to accept Jesus as a mere man without throwing out the most striking elements of His character. All those things which lift themselves above the ordinary horizon of an instructor, and leave us almost gasping by their boldness, must be left out, if we so regard Him. Christ must have been either insane or Divine. If he was a man, for Him to have made such claims for Himself as He did indicated insanity. On the supposition that He was Divine, these claims are rational, and indicate a Being transcending the measure of a man. He was our exemplar of the Father. He was the manifestation of God to men. He epitomised in Himself the universal. The obscure in His teaching is that in which He glides from the local and temporary to higher things, that in their nature are universal, and are therefore difficult of comprehension by us. "I am the way,"—I am a practical development. "I am the truth,"—I represent the reality. "I am the life,"—not an abstraction, not a system, do I bring; I bring the life itself. I represent to the world, by a practical life, the great elements which concern the world to come. He stands for system, for practice, and for being, all at once.

—Bocher.

3. Proofs of His Deity.

(1.) His unchangeableness.

(837.) Caesar is not Caesar still, nor Alexander

Alexander still; but Jesus is Jesus still, and shall be for ever (Heb. xiii. 8). —Donne, 1573-1631.

(2.) The statements of the Gospels concerning Him.

(838.) He was oppressed with hunger; but He feeds the thousands in the desert, and He is the living and celestial Bread. He was parched with thirst; but He cried aloud, "If any one thirst, let him come unto Me, and drink;" and He promised to be a fountain unto believers. He was weary; but He was the rest of those who are "weary and heavy-laden." He was weighed down with sleep; but He walked lightly on the wave, and He rebuked the winds, and He bare up Peter from the rolling billows. . . . If the things which evince His humanity have afforded thee a pretext for error, let the circumstances which attest His Divinity remove thy mistake. —Gregory Nazianzen.

(3.) His influence on human affairs.

(839.) I want to call your attention to His influence in human affairs as an element of progress. If I have read history aright, that influence saved the world. Nothing else could have done it. If Christ was only a man, then we have such a leader as we have no examples of. Was it possible that a man should preach sermons that should be universalised? Yet Christ's have been. If He was only a Hebrew reformer, though he had been inspired of God, though He has spoken with clarion notes, though he had thundered with supreme honesty and boldness, yet would His influence have died away. If He was a prophet, then He would take His place among the prophets, and we should look upon Him as upon Moses, Isaiah, and Ezekiel. Yet did these prophets but typify and foretell His coming. But if, on the other hand, we look upon Him as Divine, if we believe that in some fashion the power of God the Father was resident in Him, then we should have a right to see an influence that never wanes, a voice that never stills, a fulfilment of all prophecies, an utter change in the fashion of the world's politics, science, and its philosophy. And this is exactly what has occurred. The great men whom we have heard and have honoured sink into pigmies if you but compare them with Christ. A moment before towering above the average of humanity like mountain peaks, now they shrink and wane into mole-hills before the great presence of the mighty Christ. Who is Luther, pray you, but the lowliest follower of Christ? And who, pray, is Calvin? and who are all those grand heroes of past ages, at whose mention our blood thrills—who are all the great and the good who have stood up and suffered for the truth? Are they Christ's, or what? They are no more to be compared to Him, than the petty rushlight's flame to the broad zone of light that streams from the great sun. Christ leads, they follow. He commands, they obey. He stands among them, they kneel in humblest adoration. —Hepworth.

(4.) His demands upon the soul.

(840.) Across a chasm of eighteen hundred years Jesus Christ makes a demand which is beyond all others difficult to satisfy: He asks that for which a philosopher may often seek in vain at the hands of his friends, or a father of his children, or a bride of her spouse, or a man of his brother: He asks for the human heart: He will have it entirely to Himself: He demands it unconditionally; and forthwith his demand is granted. Wonderful! In defiance of time and space, the soul of man, with all its powers and faculties, becomes an annexation to the empire of Christ. All who sincerely believe in Him experience that remarkable supernatural love towards Him. This phenomenon is unaccountable; it is altogether beyond the scope of man's creative power. Time, the great destroyer, is powerless to extinguish this sacred flame: time can neither exhaust its strength nor put a limit to its range. This is which strikes me most. I have often thought of it. This it is which proves to me quite convincingly the Divinity of Jesus Christ.

—Napoleon I.

(5.) His influence on the soul.

(841.) As there can be no argument of chemistry in proof of odours like a present perfume itself; as the shining of the stars is a better proof of their existence than the figures of an astronomer; as the restored health of his patients is a better argument of skill in a physician than laboured examinations and certificates; as the testimony of the almanack that summer comes with June is not so convincing as is the coming of summer itself in the sky, in the air, in the fields, on hill and mountain: so the power of Christ upon the human soul is to the soul evidence of His divinity, based upon a living experience, and transcending in conclusiveness any convictions of the intellect alone, founded upon a contemplation of mere ideas, however just and sound.

If Christ is the wisdom of God and the power of God in the experience of those who trust and love Him, there needs no further argument of His Divinity.

—Becher.

(842.) The Deity of the Son of God is, to me, not proved merely in propositions. I believe that he who believes in the Godhead of Jesus Christ has all history, all etymology, all philosophy, and all true reading of the case entirely on his side. But I do not look to propositions, to logical formulæ, to any bare statements, however exact, for the proof and confirmation that this claim, now read as my text, is a claim founded in righteousness. Do you think that I build my hopes of eternity upon some little etymological technicality? Do you suppose that my dependence is founded altogether upon the construction of a phrase or the mood and tense of a verb? We have nothing to fear from that side of the argument, so far as I have been able to collate the testimonies of competent men. But I do not rely upon it in preaching the deity of the Son of God, and in committing myself to the great claim which Jesus makes in this text on behalf of His own nature. What do I trust then? The moral reach, the spiritual compass, the indefinable and inexpressible sympathy of the man. When He touched my heart into life, I did not say, "Hand me down the Greek grammar and the Hebrew lexicon, and three volumes of the encyclopædia, to see how this really stands." I did not say, "Let me see what the 'Fathers' have said about this." I knew it to be a fact. Nobody ever did for me what He has done. Once I was blind, now I see. I go to other men—writers, speakers, teachers—hear what they have to say, and behold, they are broken cisterns that can hold no water. I go to the Son of God, whose teaching is written in the New Testament, and it gets into the deep places of my life; it redeems me; it goes further than any other influence and does more for me than any other attempt that ever was made to recover and bless my life. It is, therefore, in this great sweep of His, in this reply to every demand that is made upon His resources, this infinite sufficiency of His grace, that I find the exposition and the defence of His Godhead. Some things must be felt; some things must be laid hold of by sympathy, affection, sensibility. The heart is in some cases a greater interpreter than the understanding. There is a time when logic has to say, "I can do no more for you; do the best you can for yourself!" Then love goes forward, and necessity feels it; and it is in that further insight and penetration that the Godhead of the Nazarene, as it appears to me, is vindicated and glorified.

Shall a man say to me this morning, I thought, as I was looking out upon the sunny scene, that he will prove to me that the firmament is the symbol of infinity? I had in my imagination such a person calling upon me this morning. He said he had come for the purpose of proving to me that the firmament was about the best natural symbol of infinity that we have. And he proceeded,—what to do? To take out of his side-pocket a little foot-rule; and he said, "Now let me prove this to you." And he laid the foot-rule upon one end of the horizon, began to count, "One—two—three." And I left him there saying, "A plague upon your foot-rule; and upon your own thick head too! I feel it! I feel what the firmament is! Away with you!" I know that that firmament is to me, from a natural point of view, infinite. I feel it. If no foot-rule had ever been invented, I should have known that that great arch, full of light, all but translucent, almost letting heaven come through it, is God's natural symbol of the Infinite!

As I looked upon the sun this November morning, shining through some beautiful blue clouds, a man called upon me to prove that that sun was, in his judgment, so far as he could make out by "the tables," about sufficient to light the world. He turned over long pages of logarithms, and tables of various kinds, fractions and decimals, and long processions of figures; he asked me for a slate and a pencil, and he was going to make it out to my satisfaction that the sun was just about sufficient to enlighten a hemisphere at a time. I ordered him off! Why? I saw it; I felt it; the whole thing was before me, and if that man had never been born, and the slate had never been made, I should have known that this great sun poured light upon the earth until there was not room enough to receive it, and that the splendour ran off at the edges and flamed upon other stars! And yet sometimes men call upon us with slates, pencils, sponges, for the purpose of showing us by their calculations that Jesus Christ cannot be God the Son. I have lived long enough to know that He is God enough for me. What more can I want? He raises the dead; He redeems my life from destruction; He fills the mouth with good things; He numbers the hairs of my head; He carries me up-hill many a time when I am weary and the wind is bleak; He visits me in my distress and affliction. His words are—

"Music in the sinner's ear—
And life, and health, and peace!"

My Lord! My God! I will not receive Thee merely through grammars, technical discussions, and "various readings." I will receive Thee because when Thou dost come into my heart, I know that all the heaven that I can contain is already within me when Thou art near. My Lord! and my God!

—Joseph Parker.

(843.) If Christ be not Divine, every impulse of the Christian world falls to a lower octave, and light and love and hope alike decline.

—David Swing.

4. Rendered it impossible that He should be holden of death.

(844.) The hypostatical union of Christ's human nature to His Divine, rendered a perpetual duration under death absolutely impossible. For how could that which was united to the great source and principle of life be finally prevailed over by death, and pass into an estate of perpetual darkness and oblivion? Even while Christ's body was divided from His soul, yet it ceased not to maintain an intimate, indissoluble relation to its divinity. It was assumed into the same person; for according to the Creed of Athanasius, "as the soul and body make one man, so the divine nature and the human make one Christ." And if so, is it imaginable that the Son of God could have one of His natures rent wholly from His person? His divinity, as it were, buoyed up his sinking humanity, and preserved it from a total dissolution: for, as while the soul continues joined to the body (still speaking in sensu compassio), death cannot pass upon it, forasmuch as that is the proper effect of their separation; so, while Christ's manhood was retained in a personal conjunction with His godhead, the bands of death were but feeble and insignificant, like the withs and cords upon Samson, while he was inspired with the mighty presence and assistance of God's Spirit.

It was possible, indeed, that the divine nature might for a while suspend its supporting influence, and so deliver over the human nature to pain and death, but it was impossible for it to let go the relation it bore to it. A man may suffer his child to fall to the ground, and yet not wholly quit his hold of him, but still keep it in his power to recover and lift him up at his pleasure. Thus the divine nature of Christ did for a while hide itself from His humanity, but not desert it; put it into the chambers of death, but not lock the everlasting doors upon it. The sun may be clouded, and yet not eclipsed, and eclipsed, but not stopped in his course, and much less forced out of his orb. It is a mystery to be admired, that anything belonging to the person of Christ should suffer; but it is a paradox to be exploded, that it should perish. For surely that nature which, diffusing itself throughout the universe, communicates an enlivening influence to every part of it, and quickens the least spire of grass according to the measure of its nature, and the proportion of its capacity, would not wholly leave a nature, assumed into its bosom, and, what is more, into the very unity of the Divine Person, breathless and inanimate, and dismantled of its prime and noblest perfection. For life is so high a perfection of being, that in this respect the least fly or mite is a more noble being than a star. And God has expressly declared Himself, "not the God of the dead, but of the living:" and this in respect of the very persons of men; but how much more with reference to what belongs to the person of His Son! For when natures come to unite so near, as mutually to interchange names and attributes, and to verify the appellation by which God is said to be man, and man to be God; surely man so privileged and advanced, cannot for ever lie under death, without an insufferable invasion upon the entireness of that glorious person, whose perfection is as inviolable as it is incomprehensible.

—South, 1633-1716.

5. Entitles Him to our worship.

(845.) "And they worshipped Him, and returned to Jerusalem with great joy." Did they sin in worshipping the Lord Jesus Christ? After their long career of intimacy, did love to such a Being, who had exhausted the symbolism of life to express His life-giving relations to them; with every conceivable incitement to reverence and worship; with love, wonder, joy, and gratitude kindling their imaginations towards Him; without a solitary word of caution lest they should be snared by their enthusiasm, and bestow upon Him the worship which belonged only to God, did they sin in worshipping Christ? If they did, was not Christ Himself the tempter? If they did not, may not every living soul worship Him? Is there any other question of divinity which man need be troubled about but a divinity which the soul may worship, and on which it may rely for salvation?

Let me place another case before you for judgment. A maiden, the daughter of a prince, has wandered from her father's house, and has lapsed from virtue, seeking pleasure in ways every year more degrading. A noble youth appears among her gross companions, not to partake in their orgies, but with a gentle grace and eloquent persuasion to inspire an ambition of better things. To her he brings her father's impurity. Drawn to him by all that is attractive in pure manhood, she is met with more than encouragement—with sympathy, with tenderness, with expression of love so exquisite, so new, so eloquent, that her soul dies in her with a sense of unworthiness. But he comforts and encourages her: "Because I live thou shalt live also." And when she fears to weary him, and seeks alone to find her upward way, he whispers, "Not without me, for without me ye can do nothing." When the returning power of habits conquered but not subdued drives her to despair, he re-illuminates hope, saying, "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world, and you shall also." And then, amid blushing flowers, he pours the tide of love in strange words that thrill the heart and fascinates the imagination. "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee. Come to me in every hour of trial, and I will give thee rest. Grow to me and mingle my life with your own, as the branch derives its life from the vine. Thy heart is my home; I will dwell there. Not God and His dearest ones are more united than I and thou."

By all these words, by all this love, by all these hopes, by the ineffable joy of his presence, by his noble example and his unwearied teachings, by the inspiration of his life, and the lifting power of his soul put beneath hers, she comes back to virtue and womanhood, and with sacred ardour turns to him who has saved her, to love him with a love that leaves nothing unmingled in it, that carries up with it the dew from every flower that blossoms in her heart! What if he sternly shuts her opening heart, and puts away the reverence of her love and the devotion of her soul, saying, "Give these to your father. It is wicked to bestow them upon me!" If it be wicked to love, what is it to have deliberately inspired such love, and then to refuse it?

And shall I follow Christ through all my life, behold His beauty, twine about Him every affection, lean upon Him for strength; behold Him as my leader, my teacher; feed upon Him as my bread, my wine, my water of life; see all things in this world in that light which He declares Himself to be; in His strength vanquish sin, draw from Him my hope and inspiration, wear His name and love His works, and through my whole life, at His command, twine about Him every affection, die in His arms, and awake with eager upspring to find Him whom my soul loveth, only to be put away with the announcement that He is not the recipient of worship? Well might I cry out in the anguish of Mary in the garden, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him."

—Becher.

II. HIS INCARNATION.

1. Its necessity.

(846.) Logicians may reason about abstractions, but the great mass of mankind never feel an interest in them. They must have images. God, the uncreated, the incomprehensible, the invisible, attracted few worshippers; a philosopher might adore so noble a conception, but the crowd turned away in disgust from words which presented no image to their minds. It was before Deity, embodied in a human form, walking among men, partaking of their infirmities, leaning on their bosoms, weeping over their graves, slumbering in the manger, bleeding on the cross, that the prejudices of the synagogue, and the doubts of the academy, and the pride of the portico, and the furies of the lictors, and the swords of thirty legions were humbled in the dust.

—Macaulay, 1800-1859.

(847.) What theologians call the natural perfections of the Godhead, eternal existence, almighty power, infinite wisdom, with other attributes of the same order, suffered temporary eclipse in the incarnation of the Divine Word. Christ came with no majesty or terror, to fill the imagination with excitement or awe; with no visible pomp which could interfere with the full effect of the moral revelation. The circumstances in which He lived, all the incidents of His mortal life gave emphatic and almost exclusive prominence to His moral and spiritual character. The divine justice, and mercy, and goodness, and compassion, and truth, all the elements of holiness, all the qualities which constitute moral perfection, are revealed to us in Him as they were never revealed before. The words which represent these attributes existed in the world before, but they did not stand then for ideas of the same magnitude and glory as those for which they stand now. We talk of mountains before we have seen the Alps—but when once we have looked on the glittering glaciers, and the desolate wastes of eternal snow, the word has a sublimity of meaning it never had till then. So, although in the mind of Moses and of David and of Isaiah, there were true and noble conceptions of the divine mercy, they must have been dim and poor when compared with the thoughts which John and Peter and Paul had of the same perfection.

—R. W. Dale.

(848.) The incarnation of God is a necessity of human nature. If we really and truly have a Father, we must be able to clasp His feet in our penitence, and to lean on His breast in our weary sorrowfulness. If He be God, we must see exhibitions of what we believe to be Divine. If He be glorious, we must see His glory. It must shine in something or in some person whom we can apprehend, or else we can never have knowledge of the glory of God. Where does that glory shine? Paul says that "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God is in the face of Jesus Christ."

—Deems.

2. Its nature.

(849.) Others, as the Arians and the Eunomians, admitted that Christ took on Him a real human body, yet denied that He took on Him a human soul; asserting that His Divine nature supplied the functions that it required. But upon this supposition with what show of reason can it be affirmed that He took upon Him our nature, since the human nature is adequately compounded and made up of body and soul as its two essential, constituent parts: so that a body is no more a man's nature without the concomitance of a rational soul, than a carcass is a man; or that two units can make a perfect number of four.

—South, 1633-1716.

3. Veiled, but did not conceal His divine glory.

(850.) It is recorded of Moses, who was a type of Christ, that after his familiar converse with God, descending from the mount, his face shone with such an excessive brightness, as it were by reflection from the face of God, that coming to the Israelites to deliver to them the Divine laws, he was fain to cover it with a veil: yet some rays of that miraculous splendour were visible through that mysterious veil, to assure them it was Moses himself who directed and governed them according to God's will.

Thus when the Son of God came down from the heaven of heavens to instruct the world, He shadowed the light of Deity with a veil of flesh: yet He was not so absolutely concealed under His humanity, but that from time to time beams of the Divine nature appeared in works so proper to God, that the apostle says, "We saw His glory as the glory of the only begotten Son of God."

—Bates, 1625-1699.

4. Incomprehensible, but not incredible.

(851.) Seneca prudently observes that extraordinary effects in nature are unaccountable to us, as to their immediate proper causes, whilst we only consider the usual principles by which it works. Nay in the most common works of nature, how many things are so perceptible to sense that none is so stupid as to deny them, yet imperceptible to reason as to the manner of their production!

Who understands the admirable conjunction of the soul and body in man? How two metals of so precious and so base alloy, gold and lead, a spirit and matter, the one celestial, the other earthly, should so strictly combine, and notwithstanding such diversity in their natures and properties embrace with such concord in their inclination? Now if the sharpest eye, fixed with the greatest attention cannot discern the manner of this natural union when the thing is above all doubt, can there be any pretence to disbelieve supernatural mysteries because we are not able to comprehend how they are effected?

—Bates, 1625-1699.

(852.) You are unable to explain the wonderful union of God and man in the nature of Christ; but are you more perfectly able to explain the wonderful union of matter and spirit in your own? Are you able to explain how it is that matter seems to be affected by the laws of spirit, so that the hands beckon, the feet walk, and the lips have language in obedience to the determinations of the intellect and will? or how is it that the spirit seems to be affected by the laws of matter, so that an afflicted body will sometimes make a clouded soul? In both cases you must believe, not on the ground of your ability to explain the thing in question, but on the ground of its support by appropriate evidence.

—Stanford.

5. The greatest of all marvels.

(853.) Christ came from the bosom of His Father, from the incomprehensible, surpassing glories in the Godhead, from an eternal enjoyment of an absolute, uninterrupted bliss and pleasure, in the mutual, ineffable intercourse between Him and His Father. The heaven of heavens was His habitation, and legions of cherubims and seraphims His humble and constant attendants. Yet He was pleased to disrobe Himself of all His magnificence, to lay aside His sceptre and His glories, and, in a word, to "empty Himself," as far as the essential fullness of the Deity could be capable of such a dispensation.

And, now, if by the poor measures of a man we may take an estimate of this great action, we shall quickly find how irksome it is to flesh and blood to have been happy, to descend some steps lower, to exchange the estate of a prince for that of a peasant, and to view our happiness only by the help of memory. For how hard a task must obedience needs be to a spirit accustomed to rule! How uneasy must the leather and the frieze sit upon the shoulders that used to shine with the purple and the ermine! All change must be grievous to an estate of absolute, entire, unmingled happiness; but then to change to the lowest pitch, and that at first, without inuring the mind to the burden by gradual intermediate declensions, this is the most afflicting calamity that human nature can be capable of. And yet what is all this to Christ's humiliations? He who tumbles from a tower surely has a greater blow than he who slides from a molehill. And we may as well compare the falling of a crumb from the table to the falling of a star from the firmament, as think the abasement of an Alexander from his imperial throne to the condition of the meanest scullion that followed his camp, any way comparable to the descension of Him who was "the brightness of His Father's glory, and the express image of His person," to the condition of a man, much less of a servant and a crucified malefactor,—for so was Christ treated: this was the strange leap that He made from the greatest height to the lowest depth, concerning which it might be well pronounced the greatest wonder in the world, that He should be able so far to humble Himself, were it not yet a greater that He could be willing.

—South, 1633-1716.

6. The most conspicuous display of the Divine goodness.

(854.) The power of God doth brightly shine in the creation, the wisdom of God may be discerned in the government of things: but the incarnation of God is that work, is that dispensation of grace, wherein the Divine goodness doth most conspicuously display itself, how indeed possibly could God have demonstrated a greater excess of kindness toward us, than by thus, for our sake and good, sending His dearest Son out of His bosom into this sordid and servile estate, subjecting Him to all the infirmities of our frail nature, exposing Him to the worst inconveniences of our low condition? What expressions can signify, what comparisons can set out the stupendous vastness of this kindness? If we should imagine that a great prince should put his only son (a son most lovely, and worthily most beloved) into rags, should dismiss him from his court, should yield him up into the hardest slavery, merely to the intent that he thereby might redeem from captivity the meanest and basest of his subjects, how faint a resemblance would this be of that immense goodness of that incomparable mercy, which, in this instance, the King of all the world hath declared towards us, His poor vassals, His indeed unworthy rebels. —Barrow, 1630-1677.

III. THE MANIFESTATION OF GOD.

(855.) God is best known in Christ; the sun is not seen but by the light of the sun.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(856.) In nature, we see God, as it were, like the sun in a picture; in the law, as the sun in a cloud; in Christ, we see Him in His beams: He being "the brightness of His glory, and the exact image of His person."

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(857.) The light of Divine wisdom in the greatest works of nature, holds not the proportion of the meanest star unto the sun in its full strength, unto that glory of it which shines in this mystery of God manifested in the flesh, and the work accomplished thereby.

—Owen, 1613-1683.

IV. HIS CHILDHOOD AND YOUTH.

(858.) We are apt to forget that it was during this time that much of the great work of the second Adam was done. The growing up through infancy, childhood, youth, manhood, from grace to grace, holiness to holiness, in subjection, self-denial, and love, without one polluting touch of sin, this it was which, consummated by the three years of active ministry, by the Passion and by the Cross, constituted "the obedience of one man," by which many were made righteous. We must fully appreciate the words of this verse in order to think rightly of Christ. He had emptied Himself of His glory. His infancy and childhood were no mere pretence, but the Divine Personality was in Him carried through these states of weakness and inexperience, and gathered around itself the ordinary accession and experience of the sons of men. All the time the consciousness of His mission on earth was ripening,—“the things heard of the Father” (John xv. 15) were continually imparted to Him; the Spirit, which was not given by measure unto Him, was abiding more and more upon Him, till the day when He was fully ripe for His official manifestations,—that He might be offered to His own, to receive or reject Him,—and then the Spirit led Him up to commence His conflict with the enemy. As yet, He was in favour with man also,—the world had not yet begun to hate Him; but we cannot tell how soon this feeling toward Him was changed, for He alleges (John vii. 7), "Me the world hateth because I testify of it, that its deeds are evil;" and we can hardly conceive such testimony, in the years of gathering vigour and zeal, long withheld. The incidents of Luke iv. 28, 29, can scarcely have arisen only from the anger of the moment.

—Alford.

(859.) In regard to the second period, that of our Lord's youth and early manhood, one event at its commencement, which shows us how that grace unfolded itself in heavenly wisdom, is fully made known to us,—one event, but one only, to which one short verse (Luke ii. 52) is added, to teach us how that wisdom waxed momentarily more full, more deep, more broad, until like some mighty river seeking the sea, it merged inseparably into the omniscience of His limitless Godhead.

(860.) How full of meaning is the fact that we have nothing told us of the life of our blessed Lord between the twelfth and thirtieth years! What a testimony against all our striving and snatching at hasty results, our impatience, our desire to glitter before the world, against the plucking the unripe fruit of the mind, and the turning of that into a season of stunted and premature harvest, which should have been a season of patient sowing, of earnest culture and silent ripening of the powers.

—Trench.

(861.) There is no more difficult subject in theology than that of the development of the human soul in Jesus. When we would trace the development of any other man, we soon find ourselves checked as Moses was when he wished to advance too near the burning bush. Moses said, with the curiosity natural to an educated and philosophical mind, "I will now turn aside, and see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt." But he heard a voice which said, "Draw not nigh hither: put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." Still, we are permitted to trace this subject as far as to learn in His youth, at least, Jesus grew in wisdom. His attainment of knowledge, at that period of His life, was progressive. Nor can we reasonably suppose it was otherwise afterwards: He learned obedience by the things which He suffered. —L. H. Wiseman.

(862.) We, being defective in nature, are developed through error. By slow correction of mistakes, we arrive at intellectual, by slow correction of faults, at moral excellence. But it is quite possible to conceive the entirely natural development of Christ's perfect nature, limited by time; the development, as it were, of a fountain into a river, perfect as the fountain, but not more than the fountain as a child; perfect as the rivulet, but not more than the rivulet as a boy; perfect as the stream, but not more than the stream as a youth; and perfect as the majestic river as a man. At each stage greater than at the last, more developed, but as perfect as possible to nature at each; and as the water of the fountain, rivulet, stream, and river is the same throughout, self-supplied, perennial in its source and flowing, so was it with the nature of Christ, and with His growth.

—Stopford Brooke.

(863.) There are two conceivable kinds of development; one, development through antagonism, through error, from stage to stage of less and less deficiency. This is our development; but it is such because evil has gained a lodgment in our nature, and we can only attain perfection through contest with it. But there is another kind of development conceivable, the development of a perfect nature limited by time. Such a nature will always be potentially that which it will become; i.e., everything which it will be is already there, but the development of it is successive, according to time; perfect at each several stage, but each stage more finished than the last. The plant is perfect as the green shoot above the earth, it is all it can be then; it is more perfect as the creature adorned with leaves and branches, and it is all it can be then; it reaches its full perfection when the blossom breaks into flower. But it has been as perfect as it can be at every stage of its existence; it has had no struggle, no retrogression, it has realised in an entirely normal and natural way, at each successive step of its life, exactly and fully that which a plant should be.

Such was the development of Christ. He was the perfect child, the perfect boy, the perfect youth, the perfect flower of manhood. Every stage of human life was lived in finished purity, and yet no stage was abnormally developed; there was nothing out of character in His life. He did not think the thought of a youth when a child, nor feel the feelings of a man when a youth; but He grew freely, nobly, naturally, unfolding all His powers without a struggle, in a completely healthy progress.

A second illustration may make the matter clearer. The work of an inferior artist arrives at a certain amount of perfection through a series of failures, which teach him where he is wrong. By slow correction of error he is enabled to produce a tolerable picture. Such is our development.

The work of a man of genius is very different. He has seen, before he touches the pencil, the finished picture. His first sketch contains the germ of all. The picture is there; but the first sketch is inferior in finish to the next stage, and that to the completed picture. But his work is perfect in its several stages; not a line needs erasure, not a thought correction; it develops into its last and noblest form without a single error. Such was Christ's development,—an orderly, faultless, unbroken development, in which humanity, freed from its unnatural companion, evil, went forward according to its real nature. It was the restoration of humanity to its original integrity, to itself, as it existed in the idea of God.

—Stopford Brooke.

V. HIS BAPTISM.

(864.) Why should our Lord, who was without sin, have come to a baptism of repentance? Because He was made sin for us. For the same reason He suffered the curse of the law. It became Him, being in the likeness of sinful flesh, to go through those rites and purifications which belonged to that flesh. There is no more strangeness in His having been baptized by John than in His keeping the passovers. The one rite, as the other, belonged to sinners, and among the transgressors He was numbered.

—Alford.

VI. HIS FORTY DAYS' FAST.

(865.) "And when He had fasted forty days He was afterwards an hungred." How are we intended to understand a fast of this length, manifestly impossible to man under ordinary conditions? Not by bringing in, as some have done, Christ's divine power as the explanation of all; which would indeed rob this fact of its significance for us.

We must seek the explanation elsewhere. We are far too much accustomed, in a stiff dualism, to conceive of the spiritual and material as of two worlds altogether apart, with a rigid line of demarcation between them, so that the powers and influences of the higher cannot pass over effectually to operate in the sphere of the lower. Yet all the experience of our daily life contradicts this, and we note the higher continually making itself felt in the region of the lower. The wayworn regiment, which could scarcely drag itself along, but which revives at the well-known air, and forgets all its weariness, what does it but declare that the spirit is lord not merely in its own domain, but is meant to be, and even now in no inconsiderable degree is, the lord of the provinces of man's life that lie beneath it? Matter instead of offering a stubborn resistance to spirit, proves in many and marvellous ways to be plastic to it. Sensuality debases and degrades the countenance; purity and love ennoble it, casting a beam even upon the outward shape. What is the resurrection of the body, or the ultimate glorification of nature, or the larger number of those miracles wrought by the Lord in the days of His flesh, but the workings of spirit upon matter? So too, it fared with His forty days' fast. To bring in here His Divine power, or to suppose that He then fasted otherwise than as a man, is, as has been urged already, to rob the whole transaction of its meaning. Upborne and upholden above the common needs of the animal life by the great tides of spiritual gladness, in the strength of that recent baptism, in the solemn joy of that salutation and recognition from His Father, He found and felt no need for food all these forty days.

—Trench.

VII. HIS TEMPTATION.

(866.) The gloom and temptation of the wilderness preceded the glorious career of our Lord's ministry, as heavy mists often precede a brilliant summer's day.

—L. H. Wiseman.

(867.) In the wilderness Jesus was not tempted as He was divine, but as He was human. The wind agitates the surface of the ocean, while its hidden depths remain untroubled. These temptations troubled the outer humanity: the inner divinity they could not touch; nor was the inner divinity called forth in resisting them. As a man He suffered, as a man He resisted, as a man He conquered.

—L. H. Wiseman.

(868.) It is not probable that He was at any time long together freed from Satanic molestations; though the great temptations, at the close of forty days, are more minutely recorded; as the sailor tells of one or two fearful storms which he has weathered, leaving lighter squalls unmentioned. And as the devil is often busiest with us when we wish to be most intent on heavenly meditations, knowing that if he can thwart and distract us then, he is depriving us of our strength and hope in the midst of busy outward duties, it is unlikely that he would leave our Saviour unmolested during the whole of the forty days which He spent in communing with His Father.

—L. H. Wiseman.

(869.) Did Christ, then, merely suffer in the wilderness as any other man has done? Suffering is a question of nature. The educated man suffers more than the uneducated man; the poet probably suffers more than the mathematician; the commanding officer suffers more in a defeat than the common soldier. The more life, the more suffering; the billows of sorrow being in proportion to the volume of our manhood. Now Jesus Christ was not merely a man, He was man; and by the very compass of His manhood He suffered more than any mortal can endure. The storm may pass as fiercely over the shallow lake as over the Atlantic, but by its very volume the latter is more terribly shaken. No other man had come with Christ's ideas; in no other man was the element of self so entirely abnegated; no other man had offered such opposition to diabolic rule; all these circumstances combine to render Christ's temptation unique, yet not one of them puts Christ so far away as to prevent us finding in His temptation unflinching solace and strength.

—Joseph Parker.

(870.) Our Lord's temptations brought out clearly into view the perfectness of His character. Says Epictetus concerning Hercules, "Had he sat at home by the fireside, and passed his life in effeminate ease and indulgences, he had never been Hercules. They were the lion, the hydra, the boar, and all those monsters he so laboriously defeated, which exercised his gallantry. What honour had he acquired if his virtue had not been thus dangerously employed? What benefit had mankind reaped from so great a soul if he had declined the occasions of exerting it?"

(871.) A certain class of modern sceptics are accustomed to represent the temptation of Christ as originating in His own thoughts at the discovery that He possessed miraculous power. The question then presented itself, What should He do with the awful gift? And it occurred to Him that He might use it for His own aggrandisement. Now, that such a thought may have occurred to Him may not be denied; but if this were all, it is difficult to understand where the temptation was. The hoary saint knows that he could kill that child for the penny in its hand; but the bare occurrence of the thought is no temptation. If the thought occurred to Christ, and was attended by strong desires in Him to pervert His miraculous power to His own personal interest in the world, then it might have been truly said of Him, "He hath a devil." But this militates against the conceded perfection of Christ, and must be condemned by these same sceptics who now so loudly proclaim that our Saviour's great superiority consisted in the fact that His heart was always right.

—M' Rae.

VIII. MADE PERFECT BY SUFFERING.

(872.) He was made like to men in the curse, though not in the sin; which was necessary for His being a merciful high priest. This qualification of compassion could not result in such a high manner from anything so well as from an experimental knowledge of the miseries we had contracted. No man is so affected with the wretched state of men in a shipwreck by beholding it in a picture, as when he sees the ship dashed against the rocks, and hears the cries and beholds the strugglings of the passengers for life; nor is any man so deeply affected with them upon sight, as upon feeling the same miseries in his own person. That makes a man's compassion more readily excited upon seeing or hearing of others in the like state. Now, had not Christ run through the chief miseries of human life, and the punishment of death, He had not had that experimental compassion which was necessary to qualify Him for this priesthood. It was by being made perfect through sufferings that He became "the author of eternal salvation."

—Charnock, 1628–1680.

(873.) "The Captain of our salvation was made perfect by sufferings, and for suffering death was crowned with glory," because His sufferings did constitute Him a perfect Captain or Redeemer in performance; though before He was perfect in ability. As he that undertaketh to redeem some Turkish galley-slaves by conquering their navy, is made a perfect redeemer, or conqueror, when he hath taken the fleet, though yet the prisoners are in his power, to release them on such terms as seem best to him. And as a man is a perfect surgeon, when (besides his skill) he is furnished with all his instruments or salves (how costly soever) though yet the cure is not done: or as he that hath ransomed prisoners is a perfect ransom, when he hath paid the price, though yet they are not delivered, nor have any actual right themselves to claim deliverance by.

—Baxter, 1615–1691.

IX. HIS LIFE CANNOT BE WRITTEN.

(874.) The effect of studying the life of Christ is, that after you have devoted weeks and weeks and weeks to one phase of His character, and you are called to write it out when it is finished, the impression on your mind is that you are just ready to begin on that point; and you throw away your manuscript and try again. And you gather from the Gospels all the materials that you can, and turn them in every way to make a more massive and a more perfect representation; and at last it flashes upon your mind that you are attempting to exhaust that which in its nature is inexhaustible and infinite.

Who can take an opal and paint it? It is only so much as you can at one point see that you can paint. You cannot paint the flash, nor the lustre, nor the varying colours. And you can only conceive of actual life. You cannot take in such a nature as Christ's, with all its relations to heaven above and to the earth beneath, and all its social and æsthetic qualities, and all its divine elements, not simply because they elude your grasp, running out beyond analysis and research, but because they are so combined, so changeable, so constantly coming and going, with various phases and in various ways, that no man can give the whole of it. There is always more; and when that is expressed there is still more. There is no end to it.

—Becher.

X. HIS CHARACTERS AND TITLES.

1. The Word of God.

(875.) The Divine Person who has accomplished the salvation of mankind is called the Word, and the Word of God (Rev. xix. 13); not only because God at first created, and still governs all things by Him, but because, as men discover their sentiments and designs to one another by the intervention of words, speech, or discourse, so God, by His Son, discovers His gracious designs in the fullest and clearest manner to men.

—Igdalia.

2. The Consolation of Israel.

(876.) Piscator observeth that "the consolation of Israel" is the periphrasis of Jesus Christ; because all the consolation of a true Israelite, as Jacob's in Benjamin, is bound up in Christ. If He be gone, the soul goeth down to the grave with sorrow. As all the candles in a country cannot make a day—no, it must be the rising of the sun that must do it; the greatest confluence of comforts that the whole creation affordeth, cannot make a day of light and gladness in the heart of a believer; no, it must be the rising of this Sun of Righteousness.

—Swinnock, 1673.

3. The Light of the world.

(877.) The light of the law shone only on the Jews; but this Light spread itself wider, even over all the world.

—Lightfoot, 1602–1675.

4. The Sun of Righteousness.

(878.) Christ is the Sun of Righteousness, for as by nature there was no guile found on His lips, so is He habitually and actually righteous. He is compared to the sun. First, because, as all light was gathered into the body of the sun, and from it derived to us, so it pleased God that in Him should the fulness of all excellency dwell; and therefore those that look for perfection out of Christ, do look for light without the sun.

Secondly, as there is but one sun, so there is but one Sun of Righteousness; and therefore what needeth two heads, or two husbands? One must needs be an adulterer. Christ does all by the Spirit, which is His vicar. Other vicar needs He not, though there are a thousand worlds more.

Thirdly, as the sun is above in the firmament, so Christ is exalted up on high, to convey His graces and virtues to all His creatures here below, even as the sun conveys life and quickens the earth, yea, all things thereon, though itself be but one.

Fourthly, as the sun works largely in all things here below, so does Christ.

Fifthly, as the sun is the fountain of light, and the eye of the world, so Christ is the fountain of all spiritual light. "I am the light of the world," saith He of Himself. He was that light that enlightens the world, saith St. John of Him; and therefore Zacharias termeth Him "the dayspring from on high."

Sixthly, as the sun directs us whither to go, and which way, so does Christ teach us to go to heaven, and by what means; what duties to perform, what things to avoid, and what things to bear.

Seventhly, as the sun is pleasant and darkness is terrible, so Christ is comfortable, for He makes all at peace when He comes, and sends His Spirit, the Comforter. Now He is in heaven. Therefore as ignorance and error is expressed by darkness, so, contrarily, joy and honour and knowledge which brings it is expressed by light; and Christ is our director, our supporter, and without Him what are we? and what do we but glory in our shame?

Eighthly, by the beams of the sun is conveyed influence to make things grow, and to distinguish between times and seasons. Thus Christ, by His power, makes all things cheerful, and therefore is called the "quickening spirit," for He quickens the dead and dark soul, which, till Christ shine on us, is a dungeon of ignorance and unbelief; and as His Spirit blows on our spirits, so also it works a spring in the growth of grace, or a summer in strength of zeal.

Ninthly, the sun works these effects, not by coming down to us, but by influence; and shall we then be so sottish as to imagine that Christ of necessity must come bodily in the sacrament to us, or else there is no work of the Spirit by that ordinance. Can the sun be thus powerful in operation by nature, and shall not this Sun of Righteousness be more powerful by the influence of His Spirit to comfort and quicken us, though He comes not bodily down into a piece of bread?

Tenthly, as the sun does work freely, drawing up vapours to dissolve them into rain upon the earth, to cherish it when it is dry, so does Christ. He freely came from heaven to us, and freely draws up our hearts to heaven, which cannot ascend thither but by His exhaling power. Christ is our loadstone, that draws these iron, hard hearts of ours upward, causing us to contemn this base world, counting it "dross and dung," as the Church is shadowed out in Revelation treading the moon under her feet.

Eleventhly, as the sun shines upon all, yet doth not heat all, so Christ is offered to all. He shines on all where the gospel comes, but all are not enlightened; and all that are enlightened do not burn in love to Him; nay, some are more hardened by it, as it is the nature of the sun to harden some bodies.

Twelfthly, and lastly, as the sun quickens and puts life into dead creatures, so shall Christ, by His power, quicken our dead bodies, and raise them up again when He shall come to judgment.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

5. The door.

(879.) You are not shut out of your Father's house, poor prodigal. The door is opened. You have not to stand and knock by the month together with processes of repentance and reformation. A door is opened. Christ is that door. If you come to Christ you have come to God; if you trust in Jesus you are saved. The door to the ark was wide enough to admit the hugest beasts as well as the tiniest animals, and the door into God's mercy is wide enough to let in the greatest sinner as well as the more refined moralist.

—Spurgeon.

(880.) Christ is the door of salvation. Wide enough is that door for the admission of all. "If any man," is the superscription on its portals. Whatever be the age, the country, the colour of skin; rich or poor, young or old, bond or free;—free as that sun in heaven which shines with indiscriminate splendour on molehill and mountain, on cottage and palace, on blade of grass and stately palm or cedar; free as that mountain stream, singing its way amid birch and heather to lake or ocean; free as that stream is to the fish that sports in its pools, or to the wild deer of the forest, or to the wayside pilgrims to slake their thirst; free as that ocean is to every vessel and every craft, from the rude fisherman's boat and the plank of the cast-away, to the iron fortress, carrying its impenetrable sheathing and its sleeping thunders;—so free is that door of entrance into the Fold of the Heavenly Shepherd. Around it, rich and poor may congregate together, with this plea, "The Lord is the Redeemer of us all." It is not like the doors opening into the high places of the world. These are patent only to the favoured few. These can only be opened by the key of influence, or merit, or intellect, or rank, or money (the golden key which fits all locks); while the multitude—the vast majority—stand outside, excluded. But all are warranted and welcome here. —Macduff.

(881.) The old city of Troy had but one gate. Go round and round and round the city, and you could find no other. If you wanted to get in, there was but one way, and no other. So to the strong and beautiful city of heaven there is but one gate, and no other. Do you know what it is? Christ says, "I am the door."

6. The Vine.

(882.) A beautiful theory has recently been established in vegetable physiology, which illustrates in a most striking manner the nature of the union between Christ and believers, as symbolised by a vine and its branches. This theory proceeds on the assumption that all plants, without exception, are strictly annual; the only difference between the more fugitive and the more permanent species being that the one kind is propagated exclusively by seeds, while the other is propagated by both buds and seeds. This notion is opposed to the popular belief, and to the apparent evidence of our senses. A tree, under which class the vine of course is included, is generally supposed to be a single plant, like a primrose or a lily, only that it does not fade in autumn, and is possessed of perennial growth. The common idea is that it is an individual, having the same kind of individuality or personality that a man has; the root, trunk, branches, leaves, and blossoms being component parts of one and the self-same single plant, just as the body, limbs, and various organs are component parts of one and the self-same human being. And this certainly is the impression which at first sight it produces. Recent scientific researches, however, have proved this belief to be erroneous. A tree is now found to be not a single individual, a single plant, but, on the contrary, an aggregate of individuals, a body corporate. The idea involved in a genealogical tree is exactly that which is involved in a natural tree; the former consists of living and dead persons, as the latter consists of living and dead plants. In its full wealth of summer foliage and vigour, a tree is literally a vegetable colony, propagating its individual plants vertically in the air, instead of spreading them out horizontally over the earth's surface, like herbaceous plants. It is neither more nor less, to use the language of one who has written a special treatise upon the subject, than a collection of living and growing, but separate and distinct, plants—the production of the current year, and likewise of the dead remains of a still larger number of individual plants of the same kind or species, the production of a series of bygone years. Each season new shoots or annual plants spring up from the buds which crown the old ones; and these are the only living parts of the tree. Each season, at the close of the year, these shoots or annual plants, having fulfilled the purposes of their existence, die completely—there being no provision in vegetable, as in animal economy, to repair wasted tissues; but though dead and composed of very perishable materials, they escape decomposition, to which all dead organic matter is liable when exposed to the action of the elements, owing to the roots of the new buds with which they are tipped growing over them, inclosing them on every side and throughout their entire length. They are thus hermetically encased in the tree, and serve to increase its size, affording to the new plants that are to spring from them a temporary soil and a permanent mechanical support. A tree is thus like a cluster of coral—each new generation of living organisms developing parasitically upon the remains of a past generation, living and dead being built up into one compact corporate organisation. And just as there is no limit to the growth and increase of coral structures, except the strength of the waves and the absence of secreting materials in the sea, so there can be no limit on account of this peculiarity of its construction to the size and age of a tree, except the limit imposed by soil and external circumstances.

Now, viewed in this light, what a beautiful and appropriate type does the vine afford of the mystical body of Christ, that sacred and spiritual corporation composed of Christ, and of all who have been united to Him by a living faith as the living Head—belonging to every age and country, belonging to every class and denomination, living and dead! This spiritual body is one organisation; but, like a coral cluster, it is composed of numberless distinct and separate individuals. This sacred vine is a unity; but, like a natural tree, it is made up of countless separate plants. The union between Christ and His people, and between each of themselves, is of the closest and most vital description. Each member has his own personality, his own individual existence; and yet, living or dead, he is regarded as a scion, or branch, of one common stock—a component and integral part of one tree. The same bond unites each to all; the same sap pervades all; the same life animates them all. Christ is not the trunk, nor the branches, but the whole vine; they are members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones. They are His fulness, in the same sense that all the separate plants grow on a tree, and the remains of those that are dead, make up the outline, and form, and substance of that tree.

7. The Saviour.

(883.) At the very utterance of the name,—a Saviour,—every heart exults with a delight otherwise unknown. To the generous breast no other object is so beautiful, no other sound so welcome. Never do we shed such rapturous tears, or feel so passionate a joy, as when we witness the heroism and the self-devotion of some act of magnanimous deliverance. Power softens into loveliness, when thus exerted. Danger and toil, encountered in such a cause, impart a stern, yet irresistible attraction. It is thus we think of the patriot, bleeding for the freedom of his country; of the philanthropist, regardless of his own security amidst pestilence, and darkness, and the ministers of death, that he may release the wretched captive, and break the yoke of the oppressor; of the advocate, defending the home of the widow or the heritage of the orphan, and turning into mockery the venality of accusation, and the menaces of vengeance; of the statesman, who stands forth single-handed, but with a dauntless heart, to turn back the flood of tyranny or faction, when threatening to engulf in common ruin the welfare of his people and the safety of mankind; and of the pilot, adventurously urging his way through the pitiless and maddening surge, that he may snatch some solitary victim from the horrors of shipwreck, and bear him, naked and shivering, to the shore. What, then, shall be the glory of Him who plunged, with all the consciousness of unsheltered peril, into the very depths of misery, to rescue the perishing soul! Or what shall be the measure, either of our admiration or our gratitude, when we celebrate, beholding its last triumphs, the emancipation of a world! Advocate, friend, brother,—these are beloved names; and, like a grateful odour, they give life to the drooping spirit; but if the name of Saviour be more endearing than them all, then what is that ravishment of love with which the rescued sinner shall hail at length the blessed name of Jesus! —M'All.

8. The Giver of Peace.

(884.) I went into a German church in one of the old quaint cities of the Middle Ages, as twilight-time was falling over the old buildings, to hear an organ. The building was dark as I entered it, for only a single candle struggled with the gloom that possessed the aisles and nave, the columns, and arches, and old monuments, and made all things weird and spectral. Some hundred people sat there; and the strange thing began its wonderful work of sound, calling up all the faculties from their chambers—the watchmen of the soul from their citadels and cells. How it groaned through the old building! How those wonderful sounds throbbled against the pillars and shook them, and rumbled along beneath our feet, and travelled thrillingly and palpitantly overhead among the arches. You know what an organ can do; how it can sigh, and shout, and storm, and rage; and how it can madden, and how it can soothe. And then, when the wonderful creature I was listening to had poured out these preludes of its power, it began to utter some marvellous delirium of music (I think Mendelssohn's Wulfgang's Night); it imposed on the imagination the whole scenery of a wild tempest—a storm of nature among heaths and mountains! The thunder rolled near and far among the crags; the rain hissed in the wind; the flash of the lightning went by you! the storm possessed—it overwhelmed you! The blasts of the tempest and the bolts of the thunder were like giant spirits striving together in night and solitude; while fear, and terror, and awe, and horror, held revelry and carnival. And then, I will tell you what came—I had never heard it before—I thought it was a human voice. Amidst the hurricane on the organ it rose so clear, so calm, so ineffably restful and light, so high over the surges and the wailing of the rain, the thunder, and the wind. It was the vox humana stop, that wondrous simulation, the human voice stop, the mightiest marvel of all the artifices of music; the storm continued, but still it sang on, and rose on the wings of light and of sound, over all the hurricanes that hurried from the pipes and the keys. Then I thought of the one Human-Voice Stop in Time, that said, "Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing?" "The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved: HE UTTERED HIS VOICE; the earth melted." Amidst the crash of kingdoms, thrones, peoples, and opinions; amidst panics, and horrors, and fears, and travails, one Voice, and only one, has been heard. ONE human voice, able to sway all storms, to pierce to and sing in the heavens, high above those lower regions where the tempests have their home. It is "He that sitteth upon the circle of the earth," who has spoken to us by His Son, the voice including every human chord—"In the world ye shall have tribulation, but in Me ye shall have peace. Come unto Me, and I will give you rest."

—E. P. Hood.

9. Our life.

(885.) Christ is our life. How His life is made to be, at the same time, our own, is a mystery of grace, of which you have seen types in the garden, where just now so many millions of God's thoughts are springing and growing into beautiful expression. You once grafted something on to a fruit-tree. The process, though delicate, was most simple. You only had to be careful that there should be clean, clear, close contact between the graft and the tree. The smallest shred or filament of wrapping round the graft would have prevented the life of the tree from flowing into it. The weak, bleeding graft was fastened on to the strong stem just as it was: then in due time it struck; then gradually the tiny slip grew into the flourishing bough; and lately, as you stood looking at that miracle of tender formation and soft bright flush, you almost fancied it was conscious. It seemed to say, "I live; nevertheless, not I, but the tree liveth in me; and the life I now live in the foliage, I live by faith in the shaft of the tree. I trust to the tree only; every moment I am clinging to it, and without it I can do nothing."

—Stanford.

XI. VARIOUS EMBLEMS OF CHRIST.

(886.) Cast thine eyes which way thou wilt and thou shalt hardly look upon anything but Christ. Jesus has taken the name of that thing upon Himself. Is it day? and dost thou behold the sun? He is called the Sun of Righteousness. Or is it night? and dost thou behold the stars? He is called a Star, "There shall come a Star out of Jacob." Or is it morning? and dost thou behold the morning star? He is called "the bright Morning Star." Or is it noon? and dost thou behold clear light all the world over? He is "that Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Come nearer: if thou lookest upon the earth, and takest a view of the creatures about thee, dost thou see the sheep? "As a sheep before her shearer is dumb." Or seest thou a lamb? "Behold the Lamb of God." Seest thou a shepherd watching over his flock? "I am the Good Shepherd." Or seest thou a fountain, waters, rivers? He is a Fountain. Or seest thou a tree good for food, or a flower? He is "the Tree of Life, and the Lily of the Valley, and the Rose of Sharon." Art thou adorning thyself, and taking a view of thy garments? "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ." Art thou eating meat, and taking a view of what thou hast on thy table? He is the Bread of God; the true Bread from Heaven; the Bread of Life.

—Ambrose.

XII. TYPICAL REFERENCES TO CHRIST.

1. Jacob's ladder.

(887.) Some writers appear anxious to prove that the appearance which the patriarch saw was not precisely that of a ladder, but probably that of a pyramid or pillar. There is a want of dignity, they think, in the image of a ladder, and they would therefore substitute a more imposing. But though many of the same truths might be taught, if there were the supposed change in the emblem, we are no ways affected by the homeliness of the figure, but think, on the contrary, that it adds to its fitness. It was the declaration of prophecy in regard to the Christ, "He hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see Him, there is no beauty that we should desire Him." And therefore, if He is to be delineated as connecting earth and heaven, we should expect the image to be that of a ladder, a common instrument, with nothing of the grand and attractive, rather than of a splendid tower, such as that of Babel, which men themselves would delight to rear, and when reared to admire. Besides, however, we would avoid the straining a type. We own that the representation of Christ, under the figure of a ladder, appears to us to include the most exact references to the appointed mode of salvation. How do I look to be saved? by clinging to Christ. How do I expect to ascend up to heaven? by mounting step by step, the whole height of Christ's work, so that He is made unto me of God, "wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption." It is no easy thing, the gaining eternal life through the finished work of the Mediator. It is a vast deal more than the sitting with the prophet in his car of fire, and being borne aloft, without effort, to an incorruptible inheritance. "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." There must be, if we may thus express it, a holding fast to Christ, and a climbing up to Christ: to look back is to grow dizzy, to let go is to perish. And that we are to mount by the Mediator, and, all the while, to keep hold of the Mediator; that we are in short to ascend by successive stages, stretching the hand to one line after another in the work of the Redeemer, and planting the foot on one step after another in the covenant made with us in Christ—what can more aptly exhibit this, than the exhibiting Christ as a ladder, set upon the earth that men may scale the heavens? The necessity for our striving, and yet the uselessness of that striving, if not exerted in the right manner; the impossibility of our entering heaven except through Christ, and the equal impossibility of our entering it, without effort and toil; the fearful peril of our relaxing, for an instant, our spiritual vigilance and earnestness, seeing that we hang, as it were, between earth and heaven, and may be thrown by a moment's carelessness, headlong to the ground; the completeness and singleness of the salvation which is in Jesus, so that, if we adhere to it, it is sufficient, but there are no modes which meet in it, or branch off from it; swerve a single inch, and you have no footing, but must be hopelessly precipitated: all these particulars seem indicated under the imagery of a ladder, and could not perhaps have been equally marked, had some other emblem been given of the connecting of earth and heaven by the Mediator Christ.

—Melvill, 1798-1871.

XIII. HIS OFFICES.

1. Our representative.

(888.) As the burgess of a town or corporation, sitting in the parliament house, beareth the person of that whole town or place, and what he saith the whole town saith, and what is done to him is done to the whole town, even so Christ upon the cross stood in our place and bare our persons, and whatsoever He suffered we suffered, and when He died all died with Him—all the faithful died in Him, and, as He is risen again, so the faithful are risen in Him.

—Boys, 1560-1643.

2. Our mediator.

(889.) His mediatorship includes His appearing for us in heaven, His owning of our cause, and of our souls to God the Father: "Christ is not entered into the holy place made with hands, but into heaven, now to appear in the presence of God for us." He does not in an ordinary way and manner appear for us in heaven; but with an emphasis, He does openly and publicly, before, all the saints and angels, appear for us in the presence of God the Father. It is a comfort unto a man sometimes to have a good friend at court, at the king's elbow, that may own him and appear for him; but though a man have a friend at court, sometimes if there be any danger, he will not appear and own him; it may be he will own him, and countenance his cause as long as there is no danger, but no longer. But now, here we have a Friend in heaven, that will appear for us, and own our causes, and our souls, and in all conditions appear for us.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(890.) What doth our Lord and Saviour Christ, our great High Priest, when He offers up our gifts unto God the Father?

First, He doth take our persons, and carries them in unto God the Father, in a most unperceivable way to us. He knows that if our persons be not first accepted, our duty cannot be accepted.

Secondly, As He doth take our persons, and lead and carry us into the presence of God the Father: so, when we do perform any duty, He doth observe what evil or failing there is in that duty, and draws it out, takes it away before he presents the duty unto God the Father. A child that would present his father a nosegay, goes into the garden, and he gathers flowers and weeds together; but coming to his mother, she takes them, and picks out the weeds, and binds up the flowers by themselves, and so it is presented to the father. Thus it is with us: we go to duty, and we gather weeds and flowers together; but the Lord Jesus Christ comes and picks out the weeds, and then He presents nothing but flowers unto God the Father.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(891.) A mediator is considered in two ways, by nature or by office, as the Fathers distinguish. He is a mediator by nature, as partaking of both natures, divine and human; and mediator by office, as transacting matters between God and man.

—Waterland.

3. Our intercessor.

(892.) Christ's presence and employment in heaven lays a strong engagement on God to bring His whole force and power into the field upon all occasions for His saints' defence. One special end of His journey to heaven, and abode there, is, that He might (as the saints' solicitor) be ever interceding for such supplies and succours of His Father, as their exigencies call for; and the more to assure us of the same before He went, He did (as it were) tell us, what heads He meant to go upon in His intercession, when He should come there; one of which was this, That His Father should keep His children while they were to stay in the world, from the evil thereof (John xvii. 15). Neither doth Christ take upon Him this work of His own head, but hath the same appointment of His Father, for what He now prays in heaven, as He had for what He suffered on earth. He that ordained Him a priest to die for sinners, did not then strip Him of His priestly garments (as Aaron) but appoints Him to ascend in them to heaven, where He sits a priest for ever by God's oath. And this office of intercession was erected purely in mercy to believers, that they might have full content given them for the performance of all that God had promised; so that Jesus Christ lies lieger at court as our ambassador, to see all carried fairly between God and us according to agreement: and if Christ follow His business closely, and be faithful in His place to believers, all is well. And doth it not behove Him to be so, who intercedes for such dear relations? Suppose a king's son should get out of a besieged city, where he hath left his wife and children (whom he loves as his own soul) and these all ready to die by sword or famine, if supply come not the sooner; could this prince, when arrived at his father's house, please himself with the delights of the court, and forget the distress of his family? Or rather would he not come post to his father (having their cries and groans always in his ears) and before he eat or drink, do his errand to his father, and entreat him if ever he loved him, that he would send all the force of his kingdom to raise the siege, rather than any of his dear relations should perish? Surely, sirs, though Christ be at the top of His preferment, and out of the storm in regard of His own person, yet His children, left behind in the midst of sins, Satans, and the world's batteries, are in His heart, and shall not be forgotten a moment by Him.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(893.) Based upon the atonement is the intercession of Christ. "If any man sin we have an Advocate with the Father." He is there to-day advocating our cause. Whether He presents His petitions in words or not I cannot tell. Perhaps His presence there is quite enough. We read that Cteschylus was condemned to death by the Athenians, and about to be led to execution. His brother, Amyntas, had signalled himself in the service of his country, and just as his brother was condemned he entered the court. He came in, and, without saying a word, he lifted up his arm—the stump of his arm, for he had lost his hand in battle. He lifted it up in the sight of all but said not a word, and when the judges saw this mark of suffering they forgave the guilty brother for the sake of him who had imperilled his life in behalf of the country. And perhaps Jesus Christ has only to present Himself before the throne of His Father and show the marks of suffering to obtain acquittal and pardon for transgressors.

—J. C. Jones.

4. Our example.

(894.) When Alexander the Great marched through Persia, his way was stopped with ice and snow, inasmuch that his soldiers, being tired out with hard marches, were discouraged and would have gone no further, which he perceiving, dismounted his horse, and went on foot through the midst of them all, making himself a way with a pickaxe; whereat they all being ashamed, first his friends, then the captains of his army, and last of all the common soldiers, followed him. So should all men follow Christ their Saviour, by that rough and unpleasant way of the cross that He hath gone before them—He having drank unto them the cup of His passion, they are to pledge Him when occasion is offered; He having left them an example of His suffering, they are to follow Him in the self-same step of sorrow.

—Spencer, 1658.

(895.) It is reported in the Bohemian story, that S. Wenceslaus, their king, one winter night going to his devotions in a remote church, barefooted in the snow and sharpness of unequal and pointed ice, his servant, Podavivus, who waited upon his master's piety, and endeavoured to imitate his affections, began to faint through the violence of the snow and cold, till the king commanded him to follow him and set his feet in the same footsteps which his feet should mark for him; the servant did so, and either fancied a cure or found one, for he followed his prince, helped forward by shame and zeal for his imitation, and by the forming footsteps for him in the snow. In the same manner does the blessed Jesus: for since our way is troublesome, obscure, full of objections and danger, apt to be mistaken and to affright our industry, He commands us to mark His footsteps, to tread where His feet have stood, and not only invites us forward by the argument of His example, but He hath trodden down much of the difficulty, and made the way easier and fit for our feet. For He knows our infirmities, and Himself hath felt their experience in all things but in the neighbourhoods of sin; and therefore He hath proportioned a way and a path to our strength and capacities, and, like Jacob, hath marched softly and in evenness with the children and cattle, to entertain us by the comfort of His company and the influence of a perpetual guide.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(896.) The master doth not only rule the scholar's book for him, but writes him a copy with his own hand. Christ's command is our rule; His life our copy. If thou wilt walk hoily, thou must not only endeavour to do what Christ commands, but as Christ Himself did; thou must labour to shape every letter in thy copy, action in thy life, in a holy imitation of Jesus.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(897.) Blessed be God for this example—for the glory of the condescension, patience, faith, and endurance of Jesus Christ in the extremity of all sorts of sufferings. This hath been the pole-star of the Church in all its storms.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

(898.) Our religion sets before us, not the example of a stupid stoic who had by obstinate principles hardened himself against all sense of pain beyond the common measures of humanity, but an example of a man like ourselves, that had a tender sense of the least suffering, and yet patiently endured the greatest.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(899.) I have read of a distinguished general who conducted an army by forced marches, through a sterile as well as hostile country. They were foot-sore, worn, and weary; supplied with the scantiest fare, and toiling all day long, through heavy sands, and beneath a scorching sun. Yet his brave men pressed on—such as fell out of the line by day, unless shot down by the foe, who crouched like tigers in every bush, and hung in clouds on their flanks and rear, rejoining their ranks in the cool and darkness of the night. Thus this gallant army, undaunted and indomitable, accomplished a great achievement in arms. And how? They were inspired by their commander. Foregoing the privileges of his rank, he dismounted from his horse to put himself not only at the head of his men, but on a level with them. He shared their hard bed; he lived on their scanty rations; every foot they walked, he walked; every foe they faced, he faced; every hardship they endured, he bore; and with cheek as brown, and limbs as weary, and couch as rude as theirs, he came down to their condition—touched by their infirmities, and teaching them by his example what part to act and with what patience to endure. They would have followed him to the cannon's mouth—his cry not Forward, but Follow.

—Guthrie.

(900.) In looking at Jesus Christ, as He moves high and apart from all of us in His perfectly spotless life, one sometimes feels as we have felt when gazing on the bright but distant glory of a star that holds on its lofty course through the far realms of space. We wish to be like Christ; we long to be like Christ; but to reach His high, and holy, and pure, and spotless character, seems to be like wishing to reach that orb so beautiful, and bright, and lovely, where haply sorrow never weeps, and sin has never entered. But to rise to His example, to attain to His holy and blameless life, ah! that seems as impossible as to climb the ethereal heights where that bright orb is shining, as it shone on Eden, and shall shine when the judgment of this world is come. We say Who is sufficient for these things? The one seems at times as impracticable and impossible as the other.

Impossible! With God all things are possible. He has never promised that we shall reach the one; but His truth and His Word are pledged for it, that we shall attain to the other.

—Guthrie.

(901.) Endeavour to follow the Great Shepherd habitually. The Syrian sheep does not follow its shepherd by fits and starts; seeking to be near him only when the wolf is prowling, or when the dog is on its track; when the night shadows are falling, or the pasture is diminishing. It is generally found close to its protector and guide. It is an undeviating, trustful companionship, in sunshine and storm, in fulness and in drought, in summer and winter.

So it is, or ought to be, with the believer;—a constant, consistent, habitual following of His Lord, seeking ever to have a realising sense of His nearness. Not merely when trouble is nigh; in the hour of affliction and sad calamity, or of impending death; but in the midst of life's joyous sunshine, when verdure is on the mountain side, when the rills are singing their way down to the lower valley, and the tinkling bells, answering from fold to fold, tell of nothing but peace, and safety, and repose.

—Macduff.

(902.) Christ's example is opposed, not to temperance, but to asceticism. Even the example of Jesus Christ must be followed in the light of common sense. What He might do in one age or nation we may find perilous in a different state of society. It is our bounden duty to abstain from that which causeth our brother to offend, whether it be meat or wine. But let us always distrust those who twist the plain language of Scripture in an endeavour to prove that what Christ drank was not wine.

—Eggleston.

XIV. HOW HIS CHARACTER IS TO BE STUDIED.

(903.) In the character of our Lord, the more we examine the more we shall break upon new beauties, and fresh convictions of its loveliness. When we stand upon some eminence and look down long vistas of landscape, the eye is so enchanted with the combination that it cannot at first examine, or even perceive, the details of beauty that subsequently discovered make appreciation deeper than first impressions were delightful. It is so in the character of Christ. We are struck with the combinations of virtues : but it is after mature and pondering observation that the nice beauties and rare excellencies of that sublime life present themselves to our detection. And, to sustain the comparison, I may add, that as in the landscape many of the finest points of the picture lie in shadow and are obscured until the light (which always plays in fitting masses upon the banks of mountains) suddenly strikes upon these particular spots, and lifting them out of their dimness invests them with peculiar brilliancy and attraction to our eyes : so it is in surveying the character of our Lord. Points that have lain obscure, and have escaped our minute attention, suddenly startle us with their vivid excellence, as the light and inward illumination of God's Spirit pour life and meaning into words that have heretofore given no admonition to our hearts.
—Bellaw.

(904.) If you desire to fashion Him to your mind that your heart may love Him, I will tell you how. Sit down and read His life—not in parts ; not a chapter one day, and another the next ; not a paragraph with your coat and hat at your elbow, ready to start for New York ; but read His life straight through, giving your mind and your heart time to take in the meaning of what you read. Thus you may view Him in His loveliness, and your affections cannot fail of being touched. If you went into an artist's studio to look at the picture of some distinguished person of whose appearance you wished to get a clear idea, how do you think it would answer to have, at your first visit, all of that painted face, except the forehead, covered ? Looking at that a little while, you go away, and come again the following day. The forehead is covered now and the lower parts of the face, but the eyes are visible. You look at them a few moments and go away as before. The next day they gave you a view of the nose, exclusively ; the next you behold the upper lip ; next they gave you the lower lip, and finally the chin. Now you have seen the whole face ; but do you know how it looks ? No, you don't. You can form no idea of the effect of such a combination of features ; you can't imagine what the expression of the face is ; you don't know it from Adam's. Now, who would for a moment put up with such portrait-seeing ? We say when we come up before a picture, "Get out of the way : let me see the whole effect of this." But it is in this dissected manner that men look at the character of Christ. Not so do they study Washington, nor any other man of whose character they wish to form an opinion, and of whose personal deserts they wish to judge. Why should Christ be so unjustly treated ? Did it ever occur to you that there are four lives of Christ, each one written by men of different minds, that all forms of minds might be suited ? Study those lives by the whole, and you will find how to love Him.

—Becker.

XV. HOW HIS CLAIMS ARE TO BE TESTED.

(905.) As this image of God, the holiness of the soul, is the very end and work of a true Saviour, so the true effecting of it on all true Christians is actually their begun salvation ; and therefore the standing infallible witness of Christ, which should confound unbelief in all that are indeed His own.

This is a testimony in every holy soul, which the gates of hell shall not prevail against. He that undertaketh to cure all of the plague, or stone, or gout, or fever, that will take his medicines, and be ruled by him, is certainly no deceiver if he do that which he undertaketh. He that undertaketh to teach all men arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, music, &c., who will come and learn of him is certainly no deceiver if he do it. What is it that Jesus Christ hath undertaken ? think of that, and then tell me whether He be a deceiver. He never undertook to make His disciples kings, or lords, or rich, or honourable in the world ; nor yet to make them the best logicians, orators, astronomers, mathematicians, physicians musicians, &c., but to make them the best men : to renew them to the love of God in holiness, and thereby to save them from their sins, and give them repentance unto life. Nor hath He promised this to all that are baptized or called Christians, but only to those that sincerely consent to learn of Him, and take His counsel, and use the remedies which He prescribeth them. And is it not certain that Christ doth truly perform this undertaking ? How, then, can He be a deceiver, who doth perform all that He undertaketh ? Of this all true Christians have a just demonstration in themselves, which is His witness.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(906.) He that will but inquire into the Gospel and receive it and obey it so far as he hath reason to do it, and not be false to his own reason and interest, shall receive that renewing, sanctifying, spirit, which will be an abiding witness in himself. But if he will reject known truth, and refuse known duty, and neglect the most reasonable means that are proposed to him, he must blame himself if he continue in unbelief, and want that evidence which others have. Suppose that in a common plague, one physician should be famed to be the only and infallible curer of all that take his remedies ; and suppose many defame him, and say, "He is but a deceiver," and others tell you, "He hath cured us, and many thousands, and we can easily convince you that his remedies have nothing in them that is hurtful, and therefore you may safely try them, especially having no other help." He that will so far believe in him, and trust him now, as to try his remedies, may live ; but he that will not, must blame none but himself if he die of his disease. He that trieth, shall know by his cure and experience, that his physician is no deceiver ; and he that will not, and yet complaineth that he wanteth that experimental knowledge, doth but talk like a peevish self-destroyer.
—Baxter, 1615-1691.

XVI. HIS RELATION TO THE LAW.

(907.) The earth bringeth forth fruit of itself, but first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear. So did the blade spring out of the law of nature; the ear in the law written; but we have in the Gospel the pure grain, or full corn, which is Christ Jesus. Therefore, as the stalk or ear are of necessary use till the corn be ripe, but, the corn being ripe, we no longer use the chaff with it: so, till Christ was exhibited in the flesh, which lay hidden in the blade and spike of the law, the ceremonies had their use; but since that, by His death and passion, this pure wheat is threshed and winnowed, and by His ascension laid up in the garner of heaven—they are of no further use. The Jews were taught by those shadows that the body should come, and we know by the same shadows that the body is come; the arrow moveth whilst it flieth at the mark, but, having hit the mark, resteth in it: so the law, which did level and shoot at Christ with so many movable signs and sacraments, (as one may say) cease from her motion of practising them any more, having attained to her full end in Christ Jesus.
—Spencer, 1658.

(908.) Christ fulfilled the law. Summer fulfils spring; noon fulfils morning; the fruit fulfils the blossom; manhood fulfils infancy.

—Joseph Parker.

XVII. HIS METHOD OF TEACHING.

(909.) His mode of speaking of heaven is like that of a prince who, having been educated in a splendid court, could speak with ease of many magnificent things, at the sudden view of which a peasant would be swallowed up in astonishment, and would find himself greatly embarrassed in an attempt to explain them to his equals at home.

—Doddridge.

(910.) In a numerous collection of our Saviour's apophthegms there is not to be found one example of sophistry or of false subtilty, or of anything approaching thereunto.

—Paley.

(911.) It is very striking that the very means of instruction which our Lord adopted should have hid the truth even from His followers. The parables of Christ were sometimes obscure and confounded to His foes; that is not strange. Where there is no taste or desire for instruction, the clearest and simplest lessons may be vain. How much sooner we detect what we are familiar with than what is strange; how much sooner understand what we love than what we hate, how much sooner recognise what we expect than what we have no thought of meeting. "Therefore speak I to them in parables; because seeing they see not, and hearing they hear not, neither do they understand." It was a judgment, but not an arbitrary and cruel one. It was a punishment which the blinded deserved, and it was one which they inflicted upon themselves. Parables were among the easiest and most interesting methods of instruction. They addressed a variety of powers; and thus were suited to a variety of minds, and a variety of faculties in the same mind. They suited all ages and stages of mental development, were windows through which any kind of eyes might see the truth. But if the eye was at fault and could not see, or could not see aright, then the windows had no use; and the means of light conveyed no image, or a false one. There is often, and especially in moral matters, more in the learner than the lessons; and as an ancient heathen said, "Wise men learn more from fools than fools learn from wise men." The carnal listeners to Christ suggested more truth to Him than they received from Him. Even the symbolic illustration of the truth, which should have revealed it, concealed it. It is so still. To the gross and earthly the sign hides the reality it should make known; the instrument obscures the agent it should discover, the form weakens the power it should assist; the symbol covers up the truth it should display; and however much men may, like the Jews, admire the miracle, they, like the Jews, care nothing for the "sign." Parables would have been no judgment, if there had been no obtuseness and perverseness in the hearers. Only the weak of sight are chastised by light; only wrongdoers have "coals of fire" heaped on their heads by love.

—A. J. Morris.

XVIII. HIS SUFFERINGS AND DEATH.

1. Were necessary for our salvation.

(912.) Doubtless all things are possible to God; but yet with one limitation, that they must be things consistent with those supreme moral attributes, that truth, that righteousness, that love, stripped of which, God would not be God any more. And keeping all this in view, it is not, I think, too much to affirm, it is not overboldly said, that there was no other way but this of the Incarnation of the Son of God, followed as that was by His life of obedience, His death of propitiation, His resurrection in power, His ascension in glory, whereby men could be saved. What should we think of a king, some of whose people were in bitter bondage in a foreign land, if he, knowing that he might have them back by simply sending for them, or at most by paying a ransom of silver and gold, chose instead of this, and when this was free to him, to send his own son to serve that bitter bondage in their stead, to endure all outrages, indignities, wrongs, even death itself in obtaining their release? Would their wisdom or love shine out gloriously here? Could he reasonably demand the boundless gratitude of the ransomed on the ground of the costly sacrifice which their deliverance entailed, when that deliverance might have been effected at so much easier and cheaper a rate? No, when God chose that costliest means of our deliverance, sending His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh and for sin, we may be quite sure that at no lower price would our redemption have been possible, that nothing short of this could have satisfied that righteousness of His, which He was bound to maintain; which He could not forego, without shaking to their strong foundation those eternal pillars on which the moral universe reposes; we may be quite sure that no weaker or poorer motives than those in this way presented to man would have ever succeeded in making him holy, and thus capable of blessedness.

—Trench.

2. His death was a voluntary sacrifice for us.

(913.) It was the time of a plague. There was no remedy except what might be found by examining the body of one who had died of the disease. It was death to do it. Dr. Guyon said, "I will attempt it. In the name of humanity and religion,

I will examine this body." He did so, took the plague, and died. He put on paper his observations, put them in a vase of vinegar to prevent contagion, and in twelve hours he was gone. A grand sacrifice! Yet the Lord Jesus looked on a plague-smitten world, made a will giving all to His people, came to this plague hospital, the pure for the impure—behold love, sacrifice, rescue!

—Talmage.

3. The benefits of His death are inexhaustible.

(914.) The passion of our Lord is like a great river flowing down from a mountain, which is never exhausted.

—Vianney.

4. The intensity of His sufferings.

(915.) His suffering fell not on Him like a dew or mist, which only wets the surface of the ground, but like a pouring, soaking rain, which descends into the very bowels of it. There was pain enough in every single part to have been spread in lesser proportions over the whole man. Christ suffered only the exquisiteness and heights of pain, without any of those mitigations which God is pleased to temper and allay it with as it befalls other men; like a man who drinks only the spirits of a liquor separated and extracted from the dull inactive body of the liquor itself. All the force and activity, the stings and fierceness of that troublesome thing were, as it were, drained and distilled and abridged into that cup which Christ drank of. There was something sharper than vinegar, and bitterer than gall, which that draught was prepared and made up with. We cannot indeed say, that the sufferings of Christ were long in duration; for to be violent and lasting too is above the methods or measures of nature. But He who lived at that rate, that He might be said to live an age every hour, was able to suffer so too; and to comprise the greatest torments in the shortest space, which yet, by their shortness, lost nothing of their force and keenness; as a penknife is as sharp as a spear, though not so long. That which promotes and adds to the impressions of pain, is the delicate constitution of the faculty aggrieved. And there is no doubt but the very fabric of our Saviour's body was a masterpiece of nature, a thing absolutely and exactly framed, and of that fineness as to have the quickest and most sensible touches of every object; and withal, to have these advanced by the communion of His admirably made body, with His high and vigorous intellects. All which made Him drink in pain more deeply, feel every lash, every wound, with so much a closer and a more affecting sense. For it is not to be doubted but a dull fellow can endure the paroxysms of a fever, or the torments of the gout or stone, much better than a man of a quick mind and an exalted fancy; because in one pain beats upon a rock or an anvil, in the other, it prints itself upon wax. One is even born with a kind of lethargy and stupefaction into the world, armed with an iron body and a leaden soul against all the apprehensions of ordinary sorrow, so that there is need of some pain to awaken such an one, and to convince him that he is alive; but our Saviour, who had an understanding too quick to let anything that was intelligible escape it, took in the dolorous afflicting objects in its full dimension. He saw the utmost evil of every one of those strokes, which the guilt of our sins inflicted on Him; and what His eye saw, His heart proportionably felt: for surely they must needs have been inconceivably afflicting, in the actual endurance, which were so dreadful in their very approach, that the horror of them made the man of God's right hand, the man made strong for that very purpose, to start back, and decline the blow, could the avoidance of it have stood with the decrees of Heaven. "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me;" which yet was not the voice of cowardice, but of human nature—nature which, by its first and most essential principle, would have saved itself, might it have consisted with the saving of the world.

5. His sufferings were foreseen by Him.

(916.) As astronomers know when none others think of it, that travelling through the heavens the vast shadow is progressing towards the sun which ere long shall clothe it and hide it, so Christ knew that the great darkness which was to overwhelm Him was approaching.

—Becher.

6. How they were endured.

(917.) Observe how imperturbable He is during His crucifixion, talking to the disciple of His mother, fulfilling prophecies, giving good hope to the thief; whereas before His crucifixion He seemed in fear: the weakness of His nature was shown then, and the exceeding greatness of His power here. He teaches us, too, herein, not to turn back because we may feel disturbed at the difficulties before us; for when we are once actually under the trial, all will be light and easy.

—Chrysostom, 347-407.

7. In what sense the Father willed the death of the Son.

(918.) Again, where He says, "Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me; nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt;" and "if this cup may not pass away from Me except I drink it, Thy will be done;" He signifies by His own will the natural desire for safety, by which His human flesh shrank from the pain of death. But again He speaks of His Father's will, not that the Father willed the death of the Son rather than His life; but that the Father willed that the human race should not be restored, unless man should do some act as great as was that death. And because reason did not require that of Him which no one else could do, therefore the Son says that He willed His own death, since He chose rather to suffer it, than that the human race should not be saved; as though he were to say, "Since Thou wilt not that the reconciliation of the world should be accomplished in any other way, I say that Thou in this way wilt My Death: let Thy will then be done, i.e., let My death take place, that so the world may be reconciled to Thee."

For we often say that a man wills a thing, because he does not will another thing, which if he did, what he is said to will would not take place: as when we say that a man is willing to put out the candle, when he will not shut the window, through which the wind comes in which puts out the candle. Thus, then, the Father willed the death of the Son, because He willed that the world should only be saved by man doing some act as great as I have just mentioned. And this was to the Son who willed the salvation of men, since no other man was able to do it, the same as if the Father had commanded Him to die; and hence, "as the Father gave Him commandment, even so He did;" and

"the cup which the Father gave Him He drank," being "obedient even unto death."

—Anselm, 1093.

8. In what sense He is said to have been exalted on account of having undergone death.

(191.) When the apostle had said, "He humbled Himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross," he added this: "wherefore God also hath highly exalted Him, and given Him a name which is above every name." Similar to which is what David said: "He shall drink of the brook in the way, therefore shall He lift up His head." This, then, is not so spoken as though He could in no way have attained that exaltation, except by this obedience unto death; and that exaltation was conferred on Him solely as a reward for His obedience. For before He had suffered, He said that, "all things had been delivered to Him of the Father," and "all that the Father had were His." But since He Himself, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, had ordained that He would not but by His death display to the world the greatness of His power: when, therefore, what had been ordained to be done no otherwise than by that death, is done by it, it is not improperly said to be done on account of it.

For if we intend to do a thing, but purpose to do something else first, by which the other may come to pass; when now that which we wished to precede it has been done, if what we intended takes place, it is rightly said to be done on account of this, since that which delayed its accomplishment has been done; because it had purposed not to be accomplished, except through the means of the latter. For instance, a river, which I may cross either on horseback, or by boat, I resolve that I will not cross except by boat; and on this account delay crossing, because the boat is not there: when now the boat comes, if I cross, it is rightly said of me, The boat was ready and therefore he crossed over. And we speak thus not only when it is by means of that which we resolved should precede it, but even when it is not by means of, but only after that, that we resolve to do anything else. For instance, if a man puts off taking food, because he has not yet that day been to the celebration of the Holy Eucharist; when he has accomplished what he had made up his mind to do first, it is not improperly said to him, take your food now, because you have now done that for which you put off taking it. Far less strange a mode of expression is it, when Christ is said to be exalted on account of His having undergone death, by means of which, and after which, He had determined to bring about that exaltation.

—Anselm, 1093.

9. Why He died for us.

(920.) "Why was it?" asked Mrs. N—— of her own heart as she was walking homeward from the communion-table. "Why was it?" she almost unconsciously exclaimed aloud; "oh, I wish somebody could tell me." "Could tell you what?" said a pleasant voice behind her, and looking around, she saw her pastor and his wife approaching. "Could tell me," said she, "Why the Saviour died for us. I have never heard it answered to my satisfaction. You will say it was because He loved us; but why was that love? He certainly did not need us, and in our sinful state there was nothing in us to attract

His love." "I may suppose, Mrs. N——," said her pastor, "that it would be no loss for you to lose your deformed little babe. You do not need the deformed child, and what use is it?" "Oh sir," said Mrs. N——, "I could not part with my poor child. I do need him, I need his love. I would, rather die than fail of receiving it." "Well," said her pastor, "does God love His children less than earthly sinful parents do?" "I never looked upon it in that way before," said Mrs. N——. The pastor added, "My own little boy once wandered away, and was lost for one day. He suffered during the day but I do not think he suffered as I did. He had disobeyed, and thus was lost; but I did not feel, while looking for him, that if I failed to find him it would be sad for him, but would make no particular difference to me. I felt that I must find him, or I could not live. God loves His children as no earthly parent can. I adore Him for that love for us, but I do not wonder at it, and I have taken more interest in labouring for the conversion of sinners than I did, now that I feel that God does need His children, and that if their souls are lost, not they alone will be losers."

9. With what feelings they should inspire us.

(921.) I was reading, a day or two ago, about a farmer who was found kneeling at a soldier's grave near Nashville. Some one came to him and said: "Why do you pay so much attention to this grave? Was your son buried here?" "No," he said. "During the war, my family were all sick. I knew not how to leave them. I was drafted. One of my neighbours came over and said: 'I will go for you, I have no family.' He went off. He was wounded at Chickamauga. He was carried to the hospital and died. And, sir, I have come a great many miles that I might write over his grave these words: 'He died for me.'" Christ was our Substitute. He went forth to fight our battles. He died. Oh! that we might write over His grave to-night, each one of us: "He died for me!"

—Talmage.

XIX. HIS RESURRECTION.

(922.) His resurrection was necessary to His being believed in as a Saviour. As Christ by His death paid down a satisfaction for sin, so it was necessary that it should be declared to the world by such arguments as might found a rational belief of it, so that men's unbelief should be rendered inexcusable. But how could the world believe that He fully had satisfied for sin, so long as they saw death, the known wages of sin maintain its full force and power over Him, holding Him like an obnoxious person in durance and captivity? When a man is once imprisoned for debt, none can conclude the debt either paid by him or forgiven to him, but by the release of his person. Who could believe Christ to have been a God and a Saviour while He was hanging upon the tree? A dying, crucified God, a Saviour of the world who could not save Himself, would have been exploded by the universal consent of reason as a horrible paradox and absurdity. Had not the resurrection followed the crucifixion, that scoff of the Jews had stood as an unanswerable argument against Him. "Himself He cannot save; let Him come down from the cross, and we will believe in Him." Otherwise, surely, that which was the lowest instance of human weakness and mortality could be no competent demonstration of a Deity.

To save is the effect of power, and of such a power as prevails to a complete victory. But it is expressly affirmed, "that Christ was crucified through weakness." Death was too hard for His humanity, and bore away the spoils of it for a time. So that, while Christ was in the grave, men might as well have expected that a person hung in chains should come down and head an army, as imagine that a dead body, continuing such, should be able to triumph over sin and death, which so potently triumphs over the living. The discourse of the two disciples going to Emmaus, and expecting no such thing as a resurrection, was, upon that supposition, hugely rational and significant. "We trusted," said they, "that this had been He who should have redeemed Israel;" thereby clearly implying, that upon His death they had let that confidence fall to the ground together with Him. For they could not imagine that a breathless carcass could chase away the Roman eagles, and so recover the Jews from under their subjection; which was the redemption that even the disciples (till they were further enlightened) promised themselves from their Messiah. But the argument would equally, nay, more strongly, hold against a spiritual redemption, supposing His continuance under a state of death, as being a thing in itself much more difficult. For how could such an one break the kingdom of darkness, and set His foot upon "principalities and powers, and spiritual wickedness in high places," who Himself fell a sacrifice to the wickedness of mortal men, and remained a captive in the lower parts of the earth, reduced to a condition, not only below men's envy, but below their very feet?

—South, 1633-1716.

(923.) The death of Christ must have been the most overwhelming disaster to His disciples of which we can form any conception.

What if men were to be told that to-night the sun would be extinguished, by a decree of God that had gone forth, and that was irreversible? Who can conceive the consternation that would prevail? How men would gather! And as the sun began to reel towards the west, and show signs of irregularity, what terror would begin to come upon the boldest faces! And if, flaming with ominous flashes, the sun should go down at last, and seem to have fallen into a gulf of annihilation, what outcry would fill the now unilluminated night! And when men, having watched the east till the morning hour, saw that with it came no morning light, and that the day was undistinguishable from the night, they would begin with universal wail to proclaim their sorrow. The fields would droop; houses would be as sepulchres; business would hush in the street; the banker would forget his bank, the miser his money, the mechanic his tools, and seekers of pleasure their places of resort; the sail would hang at rest in the harbour; there would be no light; all business must perish; nothing could grow; nothing could blossom; there could be no colour in the flower, none in the sky, none in pictures, and none in the living human face; life itself would be dead while yet alive; and the world would be buried. Men would begin to see that that subtle fluid which they had scarcely thought of in its regular abundance, in fact, carried in it all the conditions of human life, and mastered all things.

Just so was it with the disciples. Not a whit less amazing and overwhelming to them was the departure of the Light of the world, in which they had put their whole life, and after whose departure they felt that though they had life, they had nothing for it to do.

But what if after three hopeless, helpless days, when men had become almost rigid with despair, some watcher should cry out in the street, "I see light dawning in the east!" and the gray twilight should begin to creep toward light? What wild tidings would spread! How the sleepers would spring up out of horrid dreams! What shouts of joy would rend the air from throngs of men, as the light flamed forth and stretched up! What tears of gratitude would fill every eye! And as the sun rose gloriously above the horizon, parents and children would lock themselves in embrace; friends would greet friends; and the whole city would be intoxicated with gladness, and would burst into every extravagant gratulation: And would not a new epoch begin? In the calendar would be placed the glorious Resurrection of the Sun.

—Becker.

(924.) I do not know where I get that feeling; but as I read this connected history, it seems to me as though the crucifixion was like one of those summer thunder-storms that we have, in which all the heavens appear to be full of darkness, and conflict, and turmoil. The terrible thunder-cracks that roll through the darkness; the great striving winds that now tug at the trees which groan under their hands, and that now beat on the house; the hissing rain; all the wild commotion of the elements—these fill the soul full of imaginations and strange terrors. And yet we sleep (I used to, as a child), and wake, and sleep; and when the morning comes, there is not a cloud in the air. It is as if the heavens were one vast bowl, or goblet, filled with the wine of life; and the sun seems steeping the very heavens. Not a leaf moves except when a drop of water falls from it and changes its equipoise. And all the birds sing, and all voices seem jubilant, and all the earth seems refreshed and more beautiful. And so it affects me when I read of the tumult of the crucifixion on Calvary, and the after quiet.

For then, there are the scenes of the garden—the ministration of angels; the sweet surprise of the different groups that came to the sepulchre. It is all tranquil. It is all joyful. Previous to that event there had been tumult, from the time of Christ's appearance on the earth; but when once He has passed the portals of the tomb; when once He has come forth from the sepulchre, it is all serene; it is all sweet. It is as it should be. Now we can see it. The Saviour has risen; and all the signs and tokens of His presence are gladness and radiance and peace.

—Becker.

(925.) His resurrection is a pledge, not merely an illustration, of the resurrection of mankind. He is the first fruits, as represented in Scripture; they are the harvest. He is the forerunner: they are the company for which He goes forth to make preparation. A forerunner is an absurdity if no one is to come after. If a man should go into a city, as it was customary to do in ancient times, crying, "Make ready! prepare!" if he should rush up to the hostelry and call out for every provision of chamber, and fuel, and raiment, and food, and he should be the only one that was to come, how preposterous

It would be! There can be no forerunner except where there is a company to follow him, for whom he goes forward to prepare. Now Christ is the forerunner, and the race is following after Him.

—Becher.

XX. HIS ASCENSION.

(926.) "Wherefore He saith, when He ascended up on high, He led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. And He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ." As when Roman heroes returned from blood-red fields, and the senate awarded them a triumph, they rode in their chariot drawn by milk-white steeds through the thronging streets of the capitol, so did Jesus Christ when He led captivity captive receive a triumph at His Father's hands. The triumphal chariot bore Him through the streets of glory, while all the inhabitants thereof with loud acclaim saluted Him as Conqueror.

"Crown Him! crown Him!
Crowns become the victor's brow!"

It was the wont of the Roman conqueror as he rode along to distribute large quantities of money which were scattered among the admiring crowd. So our glorified Lord scattered gifts among men, yea to the rebellious also He gave those gifts that the Lord God might dwell among them; in this manner, then, to grace the triumph of Jesus, the Spirit of God was liberally poured out upon the Church below.

—Spurgeon.

XXI. THE SAVIOUR OF ALL MEN.

(927.) Our Lord is the Saviour of all men, for that He hath rendered all men salvables, capable of salvation; and salvandos, designed to salvation, for that He hath removed all obstacles peremptorily debarring men from access to salvation, and hath procured competent furtherances to their attainment of it. He hath performed whatever on His part is necessary or fit in order to salvation, antecedently to the acceptance and compliance with those reasonable conditions, which by God's wisdom are required toward the instating men into a full and immediate right to salvation, or to a complete and actual fruition thereof. He made the way to happiness plain and passable; levelling the insuperable cliffs, and filling up the chasms, and rectifying the obliquities, and smoothing the asperities thereof, as the prophet foretold; so that all men, who would, might conveniently walk therein. He set the doors of paradise wide open, so that who pleased might enter in; all the bonds and restraints under which men lay, He so far loosed, that any man might be free, who would concur to his own liberty and enlargement. All the protection and encouragement which were needful toward obtaining salvation, He afforded and exhibited to every one that would embrace and make use of them. In respect to which performances He might be truly called a Saviour, although all men do not in effect become saved. For the estimation and denomination of performances are to be grounded upon their own nature and design, not upon events depending upon the contingent and arbitrary behaviour of men. As he that freely offers a rich boon is no less to be accounted a benefactor, and liberal, although his gift be refused, than if it were accepted; as he that opens the prison is to be styled a deliverer, although the captive will not go forth; as he that ministers an effectual remedy, although the patient will not use it, deserves the honour and thanks due to a physician; so is our Lord in regard to what He hath performed for men, and offered to them (being sufficient to prevent their misery, and promote their happiness), to be thankfully acknowledged their Saviour, although not all men, yea although not one man, should receive the designed benefit.

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

XXII. HIS READINESS TO RECEIVE SINNERS.

(928.) He does not exclude the greatest sinners when they come to Him, but on the contrary He gives them His first attention; as a surgeon who has been called to a field of battle to dress the wounded always first goes to the most desperate cases.

—Naudin.

(929.) I find a great many persons who attempt to come to the Lord Jesus Christ as a person would go to a king that had given out invitations for a grand levee, and expected every one who came to wear a court dress. While all the rich that had silks, and satins, and money in profusion, were getting ready and going, others would be staying at home because they had only homespun garments, or were in tatters, and had no means of better clothing themselves.

Suppose you should desire to go to the levee of the king—or the president, if you like that word better—but should hesitate because you had not better clothing; and suppose he should send out word, "Come without stopping for better clothing;" and suppose you should still hesitate, feeling that there must be some preparation necessary; and suppose he should send out again, saying to every one: "Make known your want, and I will supply it; I will send you the very garments you need; I will send you money with which to pay your expenses: only let me know what you want, and you shall have it—provision for your journey; the necessary funds for travelling; a convoy to guide and protect you; and a ticket of entrance; and finally you shall receive a hearty welcome. Only come, and all these incidental matters shall be provided for." If such a thing should take place in secular affairs, you would be in no doubt as to what course to pursue. And it ought to be more easy and more glorious in a spiritual than in a worldly sense.

Here is one who says: "I had no advantages in my early life. I was brought up among people that swore, and stole, and drank, and did everything that was wicked; and I but just escaped the clutches of destruction. I formed many bad habits which cling to me now. And yet, when I look upon the life of Christians, I say, 'It is good.' I would give all the world to be as they are, and I strive to become like them; but I do not seem to make any progress. If I only had God to help me, I think I could make some headway."

The Lord Jesus Christ is just exactly what such a person needs—a Friend; and not one who will forgive him when he has repented, but one who will help him to repent. He is not one who will reward him only when he has perfected his righteousness. He is a schoolmaster who says: "You cannot be what you desire to be till you go to school ; and I have opened a school for just such as you ; and if you will come to this school I will teach you that which you need to know." He is not like a physician who should stand saying to the man that is sick, "Come to my office when you get well." He is one who, when you say to Him, "Come and see my case—I am sick," says, "It is my nature and my mission to do that." He declared that He came to heal the sick and not the whole.

—Becher.

XXIII. A WAY OF ACCESS TO HIM THAT IS ALWAYS OPEN.

(930.) In one of the coal-pits of the north, while a considerable number of the miners were down below, the top of the pit fell in, and the shaft was completely blocked up. Those who were in the mine gathered to a spot where the last remains of air could be breathed. There they sat and sang and prayed after the lights had gone out because the air was unable to support the flame. They were in total darkness, but a gleam of hope cheered them when one of them said he had heard that there was a connection between that pit and an old pit which had been worked years ago. He said it was a long passage through which a man might get by crawling all the way, lying flat upon the ground ; he would go and see if it were passable. The passage was very long, but they crept through it, and at last they came out to light at the bottom of the other shaft, and their lives were saved.

If my present way of access to Christ as a saint is blocked up by doubts and fears, if I cannot go straight up the shaft and see the light of my Father's face, there is an old working, the old-fashioned way by which sinners have gone of old, by which poor thieves go, by which harlots go. I will creep along it, lowly and humbly ; I will go flat upon the ground. I will humble myself till I see my Lord, and cry, "Father, I am not worthy to be called Thy son, make me as one of Thy hired servants, so long as I may but dwell in Thy house." In our very worst case of despondency we may still come to Jesus as sinners. "Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners." Call this to mind and you may have hope.

—Spurgeon.

XXIV. HIS GRACE.

1. Our need of it.

(931.) The believer is like the ship ; it is not enough that he hath the sails of grace implanted, but he must have the wind of the Spirit filling his sails, otherwise he cannot make way towards the heavenly port. The believer is like a branch, that hath nothing of its own but what it receives from the root, even as itself doth so spring from the root : he is like the moon which, as appeareth from the eclipse, hath no light of itself, but increaseth, and cometh to full, as it receiveth from the sun. Let none think that believers have no further use for Christ after their first believing and receiving of Him ; nay, as Christ is the author, so He is the finisher of faith.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(932.) This concurrent testimony of many witnesses confirms me in what I think the Scriptures plainly teach, that the soil of human nature—though many spots are certainly better weeded, planted, and manured than others—is everywhere the same, universally bad, and of itself only capable of producing noxious weeds and nourishing venomous creatures. We often see the effects of culture, skill, and expense will make a garden where all was desert before. When Jesus, the good Husbandman, encloses a soil, and separates it from the waste of the world, to make it a residence for Himself, a change presently takes place ; it is planted and watered from above, and visited with beams infinitely more cheering and fertilising than those of the material sun. But its natural propensity to bring forth weeds still continues ; and one half of His dispensations may be compared to a company of weeder, whom He sends forth into His garden to pluck up ail which He has not planted with His own hand, and which, if left to grow, would quickly overpower and overtop the rest. But, alas ! the ground is so impregnated with evil seeds, and they shoot in such quick succession, that, if this weeding work were not constantly repeated, all former labour would be lost. Hinc illa lachryma ! hence arises the necessity of daily crosses and disappointments, daily changes of frame, and such multiplied convictions that we are nothing, and can do nothing of ourselves ; all are needful, and barely sufficient to prevent our hearts from being overrun with pride, self-dependence, and security.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(933.) If any of you who are unconverted doubt your need of the help of Christ to curb your sins, just try for a few days to do it alone. They will give you work of it ! You will say you never were so bad before. You never were so universally in rebellion. While your will goes with your selfish or evil desires there is no conflict—or none that makes much stir and dust. I do not know that water would ever make any noise if it were allowed to flow unobstructed ; but put rocks in its way, let logs stick up in the current, dam it up, or in any way obstruct it, and then see—such a noise, such a commotion, such a determined overflowing as it makes ; and it will get out somewhere. So with yourselves—as long as your heart is let to flow undisturbedly hell-ward, there may be but little trouble ; you may hardly be conscious that you are a rebel at all ; but lay on the bands, mark out the bounds, hold in the lines—and what then ? Why, then you will see how desperate is your case, and will soon discover that there is none but the Son of God that can help you.

—Becher.

2. Its fulness and sufficiency.

(934.) Though there be abundance of sin and guiltiness in us, yet there is abundance of grace and mercy in Christ to remove it. Be not discouraged ; though thy sins abound, His grace superabounds much more. If a beggar hear of a common dole to be given at such a place, at such a time, it affects him, and invites him to go ; but when he sees many coming from it with arms full, laps full, baskets full, this gives him wings to make all haste unto it. "If a sick man hear of a physician famous for healing and curing of all diseases, it stirs him up to go and try ; but if he meet with hundreds coming from him, and telling him, "I have been there, and I thank God I am made whole," this puts life into him, and causes him to hasten to him. Thus it is ; the Lord Jesus has provided a common dole of grace and salvation for every poor soul that stands in need of it, only He will have men come and receive it ; they shall have it for carrying away. He is that soul-saving Physician; the blind, lame, deaf, and dumb, be the disease what it will, it's all one: If Christ be the Physician, all shall be made whole.

—Bayne, 1617.

(935.) God hath laid up in Christ a rich and full treasure of grace to supply thy wants continually, "It pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell." Fulness, all fulness, all fulness dwelling; not the fulness of a land flood, up and down; not the fulness of a vessel to serve his own turn only, but of a fountain that lends its streams to others without lessening its own store.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(936.) Christ is goodness itself; a good, suitable unto all our wants. If you be poor, He is rich; if you be foolish, He is wise; if you be out of the way, "I am the way," saith He: if you want a director in the way, "I am the truth;" if you be in the dark, "I am the light;" a suitable good and an universal good. As all the sweetnesses that are in the flowers of the field and in the garden are brought in by the bees into the hive, and are there embodied in one hive; so all the attributes of God and the sweetness of them all are hived in Christ, in whom all the fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily. And He is an obtainable good, called the Rose of Sharon—the rose, not of the garden, but of the field, that every one may come at.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(937.) There is enough in Jesus Christ for to serve us all. If two, or six, or twenty men be athirst, and they go to drink out of a bottle, while one is drinking, the other envies, because he thinks there will not be enough for him too; but if a hundred be athirst, and go to the river, while one is drinking, the other envies not, because there is enough to serve them all.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(938.) When we find that Christ hath by His Spirit begun to make us know God, and love Him, and delight in Him, and praise Him, it is the easier to make us believe that He will perfect His work in us. He that promises to convey me safely to the antipodes, may easily be believed when he hath brought me past the greatest difficulties of the voyage. He that will teach me to sing artificially, hath merited credit when he hath taught me the gradual tones, the scale of music, the sol-fa-ing, the clefs, the quantity, the moods, the rules of time, &c. He that causeth me to love God on earth, may be believed if he promise me that I shall love Him more in heaven. And he that causeth me to desire heaven above earth, before I see it, may be believed when he promiseth, that it shall be my great delight when I am there. It is God's work to love them that love Him, and to reward the obedient; and I must needs believe that God will do His work, and will never fail the just expectations of any creature. All my doubt is whether I shall do my part and whether I shall be a prepared subject for that felicity. And he that resolveth this, resolveth all: he that will make me fit for heaven, hath overcome the greatest difficulty of my belief, and I should the more easily believe that he will do the rest, and that I shall surely come to heaven when I am fit for it.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(939.) Reader, stand awhile at the well-head with the poor woman of Samaria, admiring the infinite dimensions of those waters of life that are fountained up in Jesus Christ, "of whose fulness we all receive, even grace for grace."

The saints may be brimful of the Holy Spirit, as Stephen was, but it is according to measure, a vessel fulness; but Christ above or without measure, a spring fulness, which is not only repletive, but diffusive, unsearchable, unmeasurable.

The great ocean is too little to shadow out the overflowings of His fulness; for take away a drop or two from thence, it presently suffers a diminution: but though this Fountain of salvation should shed abroad His love upon all the world of the elect, as the waters cover the sea, yet it is ever full, running over. There is not the less light or heat in the Sun of Righteousness, though He daily ariseth with healing in His wings unto them that fear His name from east to west: "He is yesterday, to-day, and for ever the same." This is no hyperbole, but the language of Canaan. "Nec Christus nec calum patitur Hyperbolum."—(Luther.)

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(940.) On the deck of a foundering vessel stood a negro slave—the last man on board. He was about to step into the life-boat at her last trip. She was already loaded almost to the gunwale; to the water's edge. Observed to bear in his arms what seemed a heavy bundle, the boat's crew, who had difficulty to keep her afloat in such a roaring sea, refused to receive him unless he came unencumbered, and alone. He pressed to his bosom what he carried in his arms, and seemed loath to part with it. They insisted. He had his choice—either to leap in and leave that behind him, or throw it in and stay to perish. He opened its folds; and there, warmly wrapt round, lay two children whom their father, his master, had committed to his care. He kissed them; bade the sailors carry his affectionate farewell to his master, and tell how he had faithfully fulfilled his charge; and then, lowering the children into the boat which pushed off, the dark man stood alone on that sinking deck—and bravely went down with the foundering ship. Such arms slavery binds; such kind hearts it crushes! A noble and touching example that of the love that seeketh not her own! yet it shows how the means of salvation may be inadequate to the occasion. So no poor sinner need perish, nor lose eternal life. There is room for all in Christ. Our cry to the perishing, Come to Jesus, Come; "yet there is room."

—Guthrie.

(941.) Who can now despair of Thy mercy, O God, that sees the tears of a Manasseh accepted? I remember an old lady who would not travel by railway, because she thought that some of the bridges were in bad repair, especially the Saltash bridge near her own house. Over that bridge she could not be persuaded to pass, for fear her weight should break it down, although hundreds of tons weight were carried over it every day. At such folly everybody can smile. But when I hear a man say, "I have committed so much sin, that God cannot pardon it," I think his folly is far greater. Look at this huge train that went over that bridge, behold Manasseh laden with ponderous crimes! Mark what a train of sin there was behind him! Then look at the bridge, and see whether it starts by reason of the loaded team of sins which is rolling over it. Ah, no, it bears it up, and so would it bear the weight if all the sins that men have done should roll across its arches. Christ is "able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him."

—Spurgeon.

3. Its freeness.

(942.) If you say, "I do not know why He should save me; I am not worthy to be saved," that is a fact; you are not. If you say, "I do not think I have a right to look to Him for salvation; I have not done anything that should give me a claim on Him for so great a blessing," that is true; you have not. It is not because you deserve divine mercies that you have a right to expect them.

I take a dozen beggar boys out of the street, and they say, "I do not know why you should like me; I am unlovely, and there is nothing attractive about me." That is so. And I take you that you may become lovely. "But I am filthy and ragged." Yes, you are; and I take you that you may be washed and clothed. "But I am stupid and ignorant." So you are; and I take you to educate you. "But I am full of all manner of wickedness." I know that; and it is because you are so wicked that I am determined, with God's help, to rescue you from the devil. I take you because you are such unmitigated urchins, to give you a better chance in the world.

Now, Christ does not take us because we are so pure and sweet, and virtuous and lovely. He takes us because He cannot bear to see a soul that is destined to immortality less than high and noble; and because He means to make us what He would have us to be, He sends us to school. "They that are well," He tells us, "need not a physician; but they that are sick." If you are sick, and will accept Him for your physician, He will cure you.

—Becher.

(943.) "I come very often," said the Pitcher one day to the Spring, which it again approached to be filled with its pure water. "I hope I do not come too frequently; but I soon get emptied, and as often need to be replenished."

"You are but one of a great many that come with the same errand," answered the flowing Spring.

"It is very generous of you to give unto all that come," said the Pitcher, "and that, like myself, apply so frequently."

"I never refuse any, and send none empty away," replied the Spring. "And, however large the number that I take, I am not at all impoverished. I flow in order to supply the wants of the thirsting; and 'whosoever will, let him come.'"

Believers need to make constant application to the Lord Jesus Christ for spiritual supplies. The grace received yesterday will not meet the wants of the present day. The Christian says, like the Psalmist, "All my springs are in Thee." And the reply of the Saviour is, "Drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved."

Grace is free to all that will. Whosoever thirsts may come to the fulness which is in Christ Jesus. To this end the Gospel issues its invitations unto poor sinners, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters" (Isa. liv. 1).

—Bowden.

4. Is inexhaustible.

(944.) It is said that a Spanish ambassador, coming to see that so much cried-up Treasury of St. Mark, in Venice, fell a-groping at the bottom of the chests, to see whether they had any bottom; and being asked the reason why he did so, answered, "In this, among other things, my master's treasure differs from yours: in that his hath no bottom as I find yours to have!"—alluding to the mines in Mexico, Peru, and other parts of the western India. So it may be said, and Scripture, history, and experience do abundantly testify, that men's coffers and mints may be exhausted, but the riches that are to be found in Christ Jesus have no bottom: millions of thousands feed upon Him, and He feels it not; He is ever giving, yet His purse is never empty; always bestowing Himself, yet never wanting to any that faithfully seek Him.

—De Carbonensis, 1579.

5. Is always to be trusted in.

(945.) When once we trust in God, He takes charge of our souls, that we may trust Him to the end.

Ah! if I were starting from Europe, and a friend should come to me and say, "My only child, my daughter, is going to America, and she is alone on the ship; will you take charge of her during the voyage?" I should be sensibly touched by his confidence. And aside from my attachment to the child (if I had known her and loved her), and my regard for her parents, do you suppose I would suffer my oversight of her to intermit, though I might be in need of rest and sleep, and though I might be sick and require attention myself? Would I not, night and day, carry that charge upon my mind, to see that her wants were all supplied, and that no accident befell her? And could I live if, by any fault of mine, she walked too near the perilous edge and fell overboard, and was whelmed in the tide and lost? How could I ever look my friend in the face again?

Now when God has put His children in the arms of the Lord Jesus Christ, that He may carry them across this perilous voyage of life, and land them safe in heaven; and when Christ has promised to present them pure and spotless before the throne, do you suppose He, under whose feet is all power, will fail to fulfil His promise, and to perform what He has undertaken? If there were nothing but ourselves we might fear; but as long as we have the amplitude, the fidelity, the tenderness, and the love of Christ, we have that which is more than a match for our sin.

—Becher.

XXV. HIS LOVE.

1. Why He loves us.

(946.) It is necessary for me to believe that Jesus Christ loves me. But if you tell me that He loves me because I am so good, it is a lie. I am not good. Yet He loves me. If you tell me it is because I am going to be so good, it is false. That cannot be it. Why does He love me?

Oh, tell me, if you can, why it is that the mother loves such a little thing as she does? Look at it. It does not know how to look at anything. It sprawls its little mouth. It straggles its little hands here and there. It is a hardly shapen little piece of flesh. But oh, how the mother loves it! It is covered with kisses, that cannot kiss again. It is pressed to her bosom, that does not know even how to touch her bosom voluntarily. It is the mere possibility of something in the future; but at present, what is it? It is apparently one of the most insignificant of creatures; and yet what a tide of love goes out toward it ! Oh, what brightness is in the mother's eye ! Oh, what gentleness ! Is there anything in this world that brings out the beauty of womanhood so much as the spectacle of a great heart pouring itself out on that little something ? It is the richness of her own soul that is loving it. It is her nature. Love is there by constitution. It pours itself out on the helpless child. And is that all ? Not only does it love but it teaches the child to be lovely. The child's nursery is the mother's heart. The cradle in which every virtue and grace is rocked early is a mother's love. She makes the child lovely by loving, by waiting, and by training. I am as a lump of clay. What can the clay do of itself ? Put it upon the potter's wheel, and set it in swift revolution, and lay upon it a skilful hand, and see how the rude clay begins to take on form. See how it begins to show the most exquisite lines of the old vases. See how, by the touch of the moulding hand, it is brought to something that it is not of itself.

My God is a God who loves out of His own nature, and not on conditions. It is not needful that I should be beautiful in order that He shall love me. It is not needful that I should be patient in order that He shall love me. He loves me because of Himself. We are saved by grace. We are redeemed by goodness. Our salvation does not depend upon what we are, but upon what God is.

—Becher.

(947.) He loves us because of what He has done for us. If you would kindle within you love for any man, make sacrifices for him. In the life of Captain Marryat, we are told how when he first went to sea as a midshipman he suffered intolerable persecutions from an older midshipman named Cobbett. While their ship was in the harbour of Malta, this youth fell overboard, and was rescued by Marryat at the risk of his own life. The benefit that he had thus conferred upon his persecutor entirely changed his feelings towards him. Writing to his mother an account of his exploit, he concluded it by saying : "From that moment I have loved the fellow as I never loved friend before. All my hate is forgotten ; I have saved his life." So Christ loves us, not because of what we have done, but in spite of what we have done, and because of what He suffered on our behalf.

—R. A. Bertram.

2. Its wonderful manifestations.

(948) Christ has obliged us with two of the highest instances of His love to us imaginable :

First, That He died for us. The love of life is naturally the greatest, and therefore that love that so far masters this, as to induce a man to lay it down, must needs be transcendent and supernatural. For life is the first thing that nature desires, and the last that it is willing to part with. But how poor and low, and in what a pitiful shallow channel does the love of the world commonly run ! Let us come and desire such an one to speak a favourable word or two for us to a potent friend, and how much of coyness and excuse and shyness shall we find ! the man is unwilling to spend his breath in speaking, much less in dying for his friend. Come to another, and ask him upon the stock of a long acquaintance and a professed kindness, to borrow but a little money of him, and how quickly does he fly to his shifts, pleading poverty, debts, and great occasions, and anything, rather than open his own bowels to refresh those of his poor neighbour ! The man will not bleed in his purse, much less otherwise, to rescue his friend from prison, from disgrace, and perhaps a great disaster.

But now how incomparably full and strong must the love of Christ needs have been, that could make Him sacrifice even life itself for the good of mankind, and not only die, but die with all the heightening circumstances of pain and ignominy ; that is in such a manner, that death was the least part of the suffering ! Let us but fix our thoughts upon Christ, hanging, bleeding, and at length dying upon the cross, and we shall read His love to man there, in larger and more visible characters than the superscription that the Jews put over His head in so many languages. All which, and many more, were not sufficient to have fully expressed and set forth so incredibly great an affection. Every thorn was a pencil to represent, and every groan a trumpet to proclaim, how great a love He was then showing to mankind.

And now surely our love must needs be very cold, if all the blood that ran in our Saviour's veins cannot warm it ; for all that was shed for us, and shed for that very purpose, that it might prevent the shedding of ours. Our obnoxiousness to the curse of the law for sin had exposed us to all the extremity of misery, and made death as due to us, as wages to the workman. And the divine justice (we may be sure) would never have been behindhand to pay us our due. The dreadful retribution was certain and unavoidable ; and therefore, since Christ could not prevent, He was pleased at last to divert the blow, and to turn it upon Himself ; to take the cup of God's fury out of our hands, and to drink off the very dregs of it. The greatest love that men usually bear one another is but show and ceremony, compliment, and a mere appearance, in comparison of this. This was such a love as Solomon says, is "strong as death ;" and to express it yet higher, such an one as was stronger than the very desires of life.

Secondly, The other transcendent instance of Christ's love to mankind was, that He did not only die for us, but that He died for us while we were enemies, and (in the phrase of Scripture) enmity itself against Him. It is possible indeed that some natures of a nobler mould and make than the generality of the world, may arise to such an heroic degree of love, as to induce one friend to die for another. For the apostle says, that "for a good man one would even dare to die." And we may read in heathen story of the noble contention of two friends, which of them should have the pleasure and honour of dying in the other's stead, and writing the inward love of his heart in the dearest blood that did enliven it.

Yet still the love of Christ to mankind runs in another and a higher strain : for admit that one man had died for another, yet still it has been for his friend, that is, for something, if not of equal, yet at least of next esteem to life itself, in the common judgment of all. Human love will indeed sometimes act highly and generously, but still it is upon a suitable object, upon something that is amiable ; and if there be either no fuel, or that which is unsuitable, the flame will certainly go out.

But the love of Christ does not find, but make us lovely. It "saw us in our blood" (as the prophet speaks), wallowing in all the filth and impurities of our natural corruption, and then it said unto us, Live. Christ then laid down His life for us, when we had forfeited our own to Him. Which strange action was, as if a prince should give himself a ransom for that traitor that would have murdered him; and sovereignty itself lie down upon the block to rescue the neck of a rebel from the stroke of justice. This was the method and way that Christ took in what He suffered for us; a method that reason might at first persuade us to be against nature, and that religion assures us to be above it.

—South, 1633-1716.

(949.) In the French revolution, a young man was condemned to the guillotine, and shut up in one of the prisons. He was greatly loved by many, but there was one who loved him more than all put together. How know we this? It was his own father, and the love he bore his son was proved in this way: when the lists were called, the father, whose name was exactly the same as the son's, answered to the name, and the father rode in the gloomy tumbril out to the place of execution, and his head rolled beneath the axe instead of his son's, a victim to mighty love. See here an image of the love of Christ to sinners; for thus Jesus died for the ungodly.

—Spurgeon.

3. Its emblems.

(950.) What beautiful emblems of Christ's love are the two grandest objects of nature, sapphire sea and sapphire sky; the boundless extent of heaven's blue field cannot be measured even by the astronomer; so the length and breadth, and height and depth of the love of Christ surpass all knowledge. We know something of what is nearest us of the sky, the human side of it, as it were. That part which lies immediately above our earth is familiar to us, from the offices of beauty and usefulness which it serves; the firmament in this respect shows forth the handiwork of God in ministering continually to our wants. But the profound abysses of blue beyond, the eternal, unchangeable heavens that declare God's glory, and that seemingly have no relation to man, are utterly incomprehensible to us; the very stars themselves only give us light to show the infinity of space in which they are scattered. So the love of Christ in its human aspect, as displayed in the work and blessings of redemption, and in offices of care and kindness to us, is so far comprehensible, for otherwise we could not build our trust upon it, and St. Paul would not speak of knowing it; but its infinite fulness, its divine perfection, its relation to the universe, is utterly beyond our knowledge, and eternity itself, though spent in acquiring larger and brighter views of it, will fail to exhaust the wondrous theme. The boundless blue sky of Christ's love bends over us, comprehends our little life within it, as the horizon embraces the landscape; wherever we move, we are within that blue circular tent, but we can never touch its edges; it folds about with equal serenity and adaptability the lofty mountain and the lowly vale, the foaming torrent and the placid lake; the bold, rugged, aspiring nature, and the quiet retiring disposition, the man of action, and the man of thought, the impetuous Peter and the loving John; it softens the sharp extremes of things, and connects the highest and lowest by its subtle, invisible bonds, and yet stretches far aloft beyond the reach of sight or sense into the fathomless abyss of infinity. Or, to take the sea as the comparison, the sea touches the shore along one narrow line, and all the beauty and fertility of that shore are owing to its life-giving dew and rains; but it stretches away from the shore, beyond the horizon, into regions which man's eye has never seen, and the further it recedes the deeper and the bluer its waters become. And so the love of Christ touches us along the whole line of our life, imparts all the beauty and fruitfulness to that life, but it stretches away from the point of contact into the unsearchable riches of Christ, the measureless fulness of the Godhead, that ocean of inconceivable, incommunicable love which no plummet can sound, or eye of angel or saint ever scan; and the love that we cannot comprehend, that is beyond our reach, is as much love as that whose blessed influences and effects we feel.

—Macmillan.

XXVI. HIS TENDER MERCY.

(951.) "A bruised reed He will not break." Simple, but expressive emblem! The most fragile thing in nature is the shivering reed by the river side. The Eastern shepherd tending his flock by the streams where these reeds grow, appears to have used them for his rustic pipe. When one of them was bruised or broken, he never made the attempt to mend it. By inserting it among the others he would make his instrument discordant, and accordingly he threw it aside as worthless. Not so the Great Shepherd. When a human soul is bruised and mutilated by sin, He casts it not away. That bruised reed "He will not break." He repairs it for its place in the heavenly instrument, and makes it once more to show forth His praise.

—Macduff.

XXVII. HIS SYMPATHY WITH HIS PEOPLE.

(952.) "If," says Augustine, "a man should come up to embrace thee, to kiss and honour thee upward, and beneath with a pair of shoes beaten full of nails tread upon thy bare foot; the head shall despise the honour done unto it, and for the foot that smarteth, say, Why treadest thou upon me? So when feigned gossellers honour Christ our Head, sitting in heaven, and oppress His members on earth, the Head shall speak for the feet that smart, and say, Why treadest thou on me?" Paul had a zeal toward God, but he did tread upon Christ's feet on earth, for whom the Head crieth forth of heaven, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" Although Christ sitteth on the right hand of His Father, yet lieth He on earth; He suffereth all calamities here on earth, He is many times evil entreated here on earth.

—Bernard Gilpin.

(953.) We must not make too much of sympathy, as mere feeling. We do in things spiritual as we do with hot-house plants. The feeble exotic, beautiful to look at, but useless, has costly sums spent on it. The hardy oak, a nation's strength, is permitted to grow, scarcely observed, in the fence and copse. We prize feeling and praise its possessor. But feeling is only a sickly exotic in itself—a passive quality having in it nothing moral, no temptation and no victory. A man is no more a good man for having feeling, than he is for having a delicate ear for music, or a far-seeing optic nerve. The Son of man had feeling—He could be "touched." The tear would start from His eyes at the sight of human sorrow. But that sympathy was no exotic in His soul, beautiful to look at, too delicate for use. Feeling with Him led to this, "He went about doing good." Sympathy with Him was this, "Grace to help in time of need." —Robertson.

(954.) We look upon an ant-hill, and see all the business activities, the fears, the little wars, the takings and losings, of one side and another, and hardly think of the actors. They are scarcely more to us than the rolling sands which they disturb. We see these mimic strifes almost without a thought. And many suppose that God looks down upon this greater ant-hill, and beholds the thousand conflicts of human experience, with just as little thought and care. "No," says the apostle, "our God is not one that is indifferent to, and without sympathy for, the actual experiences of men. We have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities,"—with human weakness and with human want—"but was in all points tempted like as we are yet without sin. Let us, therefore, come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." —Becher.

(955.) In us, so far as our knowledge extends, sympathy is the most exquisite and perfect expression of love. It signifies such an interest, such a peculiar affection, that the person sympathising receives another's experience as a part of his own; whether it be joy or sorrow, he is so intimately united to another that he feels with him; that whatever feeling, pleasant or painful, trembles on another's heart, trembles upon his.

We can imagine a being to be helpful in various degrees without being sympathetic; as when a man, acting from a cold sense of duty, helps another with a sort of police helpfulness, or from considerations of general benevolence, without being greatly moved himself. It is possible for a truly benevolent man to be entirely serene (as a physician, who bends over a patient to whom he is giving great pain, may be kind and gentle), and yet not experience in himself any correspondence of feeling, and not to be, to any considerable degree, in sympathy with that patient.

But there are relationships in which men are affected by another's experience, when they come nearer than mere duty or ordinary benevolence would draw them, as when persons are connected together by bonds of personal affection. When a child falls, it hurts the mother a great deal more than it hurts the child, though nothing touches her except the sound of its fall. We often suffer more on account of others' troubles than they themselves do in those troubles, for both love and sorrow take their measure as much from the capacity of the nature that experiences them as from the power of the externally exciting cause. How much a great nature loves does not depend wholly upon how much there is to love, but upon how much there is to love with. In like manner, how much one suffers with or for another, does not depend altogether upon how much that other is suffering, but upon how much that nature which sympathises has with which to suffer.

Now the teaching here—and it only corroborates what is abundantly taught elsewhere in the New Testament—the teaching here, in respect to our Saviour, is, that He sympathises with us as His children. He feels with us, so that our experiences throw their waves upon the shore of His soul. He carries us so near to His heart that all our feelings, which are of any moment, produce their effects, in some degree, in His bosom.

It seems very strange that the Maker of all the earth should permit Himself to be a participant in all the petty experiences that belong to any human life. No man would have dared to conceive such an idea of God, and to have believed any such thing as that, if it had not been revealed in unequivocal terms; for men would have said, "It is beneath any true idea of the majesty of God to suppose that He bends His bosom to all the rippling waves of human hearts, and feels again what they are feeling in their lower courses."

A great mountain lifts itself up with perpendicular face over against some quiet valley; and when summer thunders with great storms the cliff echoes the thunder, and rolls it forth a second time with majesty increased; and we think that, to be sublime, storms should awaken mountain echoes, and that then cause and effect are worthy of each other. But so, too, oriole, or a song-sparrow, singing before it, hears its own little song sung back again. A little child, lost, and crying in the valley, hears the great cliff weeping just as it weeps; and, in sooth, the mountain repeats whatever is sounded, from the sublimest notes of the tempest to the sweetest bird-whisper or child-weeping; and it is just as easy to do the little as the great, and more beautiful. Now God is our Rock, and from His heart is reflected every experience, every feeling of joy or grief, that any human soul utters or knows. —Becher.

(956.) The sympathy of Christ includes our sin. He is sorry for us, and sympathises with us on account of our sin. Calvary, mountain of blessings, is testimony that "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." No trumpet will ever speak as the death of Christ speaks in evidence of our woes and sorrows to affect the sympathetic heart of God, and make Him sorry for us. Living, He gave Himself for us; dying, He gave Himself for us; living again, He lives to intercede for us; and the further we can remove this idea from all our hearts, and the nearer we can bring it home to our consciousness of guilt, the more nearly shall we come to the feelings of Christ toward those who are sinful. Let me, in this connection, read a verse or two preceding our text:—"The Word of God," that is, God's mind—"is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of our soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart. Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in His sight; but all things are naked and open unto the eyes of Him with whom we have to do."

What a tremendous expression of God's insight into, His familiarity with, and the universality of His knowledge of, every throb and fluctuation of the wickedness of the human soul! It is anatomised, dissected, laid open, and God looks upon it, and He sees the whole of it perfectly. And it is in view of this knowledge of God of the intensity and the interiority of our moral unworth and sinfulness that we have this exhortation: "Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need."

A man goes to his physician, and says to him, "I have, sir, very great suffering; I have very sharp pains that shoot through my breast; I have very acute pains in my spine; and my head seems to have abandoned all its uses." The physician interrogates him, and says to him, "What has been the course of your life?" The man is ashamed to tell; he says, "Well, sir, I have been exposed to dampness in various ways, and my impression is that I am troubled with neuralgia."

The physician proceeds to prescribe for him on the supposition that his difficulty is neuralgia; but as he gets no better, but a good deal worse, he says to himself, "I do not believe my physician understands my case. I do not believe the medicine he is giving me is doing me any good." But he has withheld the truth from his physician. He has not let him into the secret of his trouble. At length he goes to another physician, and says, "Can you do me any good?" This physician knows so much that he don't know anything; and after putting a few pompous questions to the man concerning his case, he says, "Yes, I can cure you," and accordingly he gives him a few remedies. But they afford him no relief. After a few weeks he says to himself, "I do not believe this physician understands my case either." And by and by, after suffering nights and suffering days, his strength becomes much reduced, and there is a prospect of a speedy termination of all his earthly hopes and expectations, when he says to himself, "What a fool I am for lying, and hiding the real cause of my difficulty!" He now goes to his physician again, and hangs down his head—he ought to have hung it down before—and explains the cause of his disease, which he had been so long concealing. The physician says, "Why did you not tell me of this before? Since you have given this explanation, your difficulty is perfectly plain to me. It is very late, but I think I know now just where to put the remedy. Now I will undertake your case, and I can cure you." It is a word of relief to him that he has told the physician all he knows about his difficulty.

Now this is the foundation of the comfort of this passage. The apostle says, "Here is this God, with clear, unblemished eye, which no darkness can shroud, from which no man's thought can be hid, which can penetrate into the deepest recesses of man's being. There is no imagination of the mind or aspiration of the heart which He does not know. The soul and body are open and naked to His gaze, and He knows perfectly whatever takes place in connection with either. Now, then, let us come boldly to the throne of grace that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help us in time of need." God sees every thought and motive on our part, and He knows what we need in order to obtain mercy, and find grace, and live, and, knowing all this, He says to us, "Now come, now come."
—Becher.

(957.) During the last sad days of the great Rebellion a lady had occasion to see President Lincoln, to prefer a request of great importance to herself, and to one that she loved better than herself. The importance of her errand made her nervous; but the fact that she must plead her case with the President himself made her more so. She had never seen him; but from a distance she had learned, as we all had, greatly to honour and respect him. In speaking of the interview afterward, she said that, as she entered the room where he sat alone, she trembled greatly; but when she looked into his face, as he rose to greet her, she forgot the President in the sight of the man. She saw that he was a kind and gentle man; and, though she could not forget that on his word hung life and death, she could tell her story freely to one who could feel for her, who, in spite of all his cares, could be, and was interested in her and her trouble. Is there not a lesson here? When we go to Jesus with our troubles and our wants, do we realise that He is a loving, gentle-hearted man? When we think of the last great day, do we remember, as we should, or get the comfort to our hearts that there is in the truth, that we are to stand before the judgment bar of Christ—that we have not an high priest that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities?

XXVIII. HIS COMPASSION FOR THE TEMPTED.

(958.) You have children. Then you will easily feel a plain illustration. A child, three or four years of age we will say, while playing incautiously at a little distance from home, is suddenly seized and carried away by a gipsy. Poor thing! how terrified, how distressed must it be! Methinks I hear its cries. The sight and violence of the stranger, the recollection of its dear parents, the loss of its pleasing home, the dread and uncertainty of what is yet to befall it. Is it not a wonder that it does not die in agonies? But see, help is at hand! the gipsy is pursued, and the child recovered. Now, my dear madam, if this were your child, how would you receive it? Perhaps, when the first transports of your joy for its safety would permit you, you might gently chide it for leaving your door. But would you disinherit it? Would you disown it? Would you deliver it up again to the gipsy with your own hands, because it had suffered a violence which it could not withstand, which it abhorred, and to which its will never consented? And yet what is the tenderness of a mother, of ten thousand mothers, to that which our compassionate Saviour bears to every poor soul that has been enabled to flee to Him for salvation! Let us be far from charging that to Him, of which we think we are utterly incapable ourselves. Take courage, resist the devil and he will flee from you. If he were to tempt you to anything criminal, you would start at the thought, and renounce it with abhorrence. Do the same when he tempts you to question the Lord's compassion and goodness. But there he imposes upon us with a show of humility, and persuades us that we do well to oppose our unworthiness as a sufficient exception to the many express promises of the Word. It is said, "the blood of Jesus cleanseth from all sin: that all manner of sin shall be forgiven for His sake; that whosoever cometh to Him, He will in no wise cast him out; and that He is able to save to the uttermost." Believe His Word, and Satan shall be found a liar. If the child had deliberately gone away with the gipsy, had preferred that wretched way of life, and had refused to return, though frequently and tenderly invited home; perhaps a parent's love might, in time, be too weak to plead for the pardon of such continued obstinacy. But, indeed, in this manner we have all dealt with the Lord ; and yet, whenever we are willing to return, He is willing to receive us with open arms, and without an upbraiding word (Luke xv. 20, 22). Though our sins have been deep-dyed like scarlet and crimson, enormous as mountains, and countless as the sands, the sum total is only this, sin has abounded, but where sin has abounded, grace has much more abounded. —Newton, 1725-1807.

XXIX. HIS CARE FOR THE WEAK.

(959.) Heathenism was always exalting the top of society, the great men, and taking no thought for the masses below them. Christianity says, "The great and the strong can take care of themselves," and so seeks to elevate the lowest and poorest. Christ never warned us against not respecting a king's crown; but His words were, "Whoso shall offend one of these little ones which believe in Me, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea." As in the family, it is not the son of twenty-one years, but the babe, whom the mother rocks to sleep in the cradle; so, in Christ's family of earth, it is not the full-grown and the mature for whom He most tenderly provides; it is the weak, and those on whom the world's law tramples, that He takes tenderly up with His strong arm, and rocks in the cradle of His love and care. —Becher.

(960.) He came not in the spirit of Elias, but with meekness and gentle insinuations, mild as the breath of heaven, not willing to disturb the softest stalk of a violet.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(961.) The other day the children were learning the Twenty-third Psalm, and we were talking together about the Good Shepherd, and how He takes care of the sheep and the little lambs. Impetuous Mamy, eager to speak her one thought, said rapidly :

"He feeds them, and drives away the lions and the bears."

"Yes," said Tiny thoughtfully, "and He carries them up hill."

"He carries them up hill !"

The words went to my heart with a strength and sweetness the little speaker did not dream of. Often, often since, their music has thrilled through my tired soul like an echo of the angel's song.

XXX. HIS DISINTERESTEDNESS.

(962.) Do you ever find, among all the persons whom Christ miraculously cured, a single one whom He retained to be afterwards near Him as His disciple, His attendant, His votary? . . . Where now is your worldly friend who will behave himself towards you in this fashion? So far from it, no sooner has he done you any service, however trifling, than he immediately lays a claim upon you for your daily attendance upon him. He requires you to be henceforth always at his elbow, and to be giving him continually every possible proof of your gratitude, of your devoted and even slavish attachment to his person. —Segneri.

XXXI. PRECIOUS TO THEM THAT BELIEVE.

(963.) To see Jesus clearly with the eye of faith, is to see the deep opening a way from Egypt's to freedom's shore ; is to see the water gush, full and sparkling from the desert rock ; is to see the serpent gleaming on its pole over a dying camp ; is to see the life-boat coming when our bark is thumping on the bank, or ground on rocks by foaming breakers ; is to see a pardon when the noose is round our neck, and our foot is on the drop. No sight in the wide world like Jesus Christ, with forgiveness on His lips, and a crown in His blessed hand ! This is worth labouring for ; praying for ; living for ; suffering for ; dying for. You remember how the prophet's servant climbed the steepes of Carmel. Three years, and never cloud had dappled the burning sky—three long years, and never a dewdrop had glistened on the grass, or wet the lips of a dying flower ; but the cloud came at last. No bigger than a man's hand, it rose from the sea ; it spread ; and as he saw the first lightnings flash, and heard the first thunders roll, how did he forget all his toils ! and would have climbed the hill, not seven, but seventy times seven times, to hail that welcome sight !

It is so with sinners so soon as their eyes are gladdened with a believing sight of Christ ; when they have got Christ ; and with Him peace. Be it that you have to climb the hill of prayer, not seven, but seven thousand times, such a sight shall more than reward all your toil. —Guthrie.

XXXII. THE EVER FAITHFUL FRIEND.

(964.) Extremity distinguisheth friends. Worldly pleasures, like physicians, give us over, when once we lie a dying ; and yet the deathbed had most need of comforts ; Christ Jesus standeth by His in the pangs of death, and after death at the bar of judgment ; not leaving them either in their bed or grave. I will use them, therefore, to my best advantage ; not trust them. But for Thee, O my Lord, which in mercy and truth canst not fail me, whom I have found ever faithful and present in all extremities, kill me, yet will I trust in Thee !

XXXIII. HOW WE CAN SERVE HIM.

(965.) Dear brethren, do you know that you could not do anything that would touch my heart so much as that which you should do to my child ? You might put a fortune upon my shoulders and I should be grateful ; but he who helps my child to begin his life aright burdens me with gratitude a thousand times more. If my child were in peril, and you should succour him in a distant city, and the tidings should come home to me, I could not find words to thank you for what you did for him. I should be grateful if you did it for me, but not so much as if you did it for my child, because my child is himself and myself too ; and my feelings for him are more than my feelings for myself. What you do for my child is the deepest and truest service that you can render me. And how do you think it is in the bosom of your God and your Saviour ? If you take up in your arms the despoiled, and the outcast, and the lost ; if you wash them in your tears ; if you are to them, in your small way, what Christ has been to you ; if you call them, and bring them back again from wrong courses ; and if you are permitted to stand in His presence in the last day, and say to Him, "Here am I, and these," what will be the joy which you shall experience? What will be that gladness, what will be that love, which will roll forth from the soul of Jesus to any one of you that watches with Him on earth, and watches with Him in behalf of His little ones? —Becher.

XXXIV. HIS EYE OUR STIMULUS.

(966.) There is a touching fact related in a history of a Highland chief, of the noble house of M'Gregor, who fell wounded by two balls at the battle of Prestonpans. Seeing their chief fall, the clan wavered, and gave the enemy an advantage. The old chieftain, beholding the effect of his disaster, raised himself up on his elbow, while the blood gushed in streams from his wounds, and cried aloud, "I am not dead, my children; I am looking at you to see you do your duty." These words revived the sinking courage of his brave Highlanders. There was a charm in the fact that they still fought under the eye of their chief. It roused them to put forth their mightiest energies, and they did all that human strength could do to turn and stem the dreadful tide of battle.

And is there not a charm to you, O believer, in the fact that you contend in the battle-field of life under the eye of your Saviour? Wherever you are, however you are oppressed by foes, however exhausted by the stern strife with evil, the eye of Christ is fixed most lovingly upon you.

—D. Wise.

XXXV. THE POWER OF HIS REPROOF.

(967.) It is innocence which enables eloquence to reprove with power; and guilt attacked flies before the face of him who has none. And therefore, as every rebuke of vice comes, or should come from the preacher's mouth, like a dart or arrow thrown by some mighty hand, which does execution proportionally to the force or impulse it received from that which threw it; so our Saviour's matchless virtue, free from the least tincture of anything immoral, armed every one of His reproofs with a piercing edge, and an irresistible force; so that truth, in that respect, never came naked out of His mouth, but either clothed with thunder, or wrapped up in all the powers of persuasion; still His person animated and gave life and vigour to His expression; all His commands being but the transcript of His own life, and His sermons a living paraphrase upon His practice.

XXXVI. CHRIST AND THE SOUL.

1. He is the Rest and Stay of the Soul.

(968.) There is no agent that takes any rest or contentment but in its proper object. If a man had all the musical raptures and melodious harmony in the whole world before him, he could not hear it with his eyes, because it is the proper object of the ear: if never so triumphant shows or courtly masks, he could not see them with his ears, because they are the proper object of the eye. So it is with the soul of man. If it were possible that all the treasures, pleasures, honours, preferments, and delights which the world doth affect were presented and tendered to the soul, yet would they not afford unto it any true satisfaction, because they be not the proper object and centre of the soul. It is the Lord only, or as a good martyr said once, "None but Christ—none but Christ can compass the soul about with true content and comfort."

—Evans.

(969.) The needle's point in the seaman's compass never stands still, but quivers and shakes till it comes right against the North Pole. The wise men of the East never stood still till they were right against the star which appeared unto them, and the star itself never stood still till it came right against that other Star which shined more brightly in the manger than the sun did in the firmament; and Noah's dove could find no rest for the sole of her foot all the while she was fluttering over the flood, till she returned to the ark with an olive branch in her mouth. So the heart of every true Christian can find no rest till Christ put forth His hand and receive her to Himself. —Clark, 1599-1682.

(970.) The hearts of believers are like the needle troubled by the loadstone, which cannot rest until it comes to the point whereunto, by a secret virtue, it is directed: for being once touched by the love of Christ, receiving therein an impression of sweet ineffable virtue, they will ever be in motion and restless until they come unto Him, and behold His glory. —Owen, 1616-1683.

(971.) There are some plants which grow right up, erect, in their own sturdy self-sufficiency; and there are some feeble ones which take hold with their hands, and clasp and climb. The soul of man is like these last. Even in his best estate he was not meant to grow insulated and stand alone. He is not strong enough for that. He has not within himself resources sufficient to fill himself. He is not fit to be his own all-in-all. The make of his mind is an outgoing, exploring, petitionary make. The soul of man is a clasping, clinging soul, seeking to something over which it can spread itself, and by means of which it can support itself. And just as, in a neglected garden, you may see the poor creepers making shift to sustain themselves as best they can; one convolvulus twisting round another, and both dragging on the ground; a clematis leaning on the door, which will by and by open and let the whole mass fall down; a vine or a passion-flower wreathing round a prop which all the while chafes and cuts it; so in this fallen world it is mournful to see the efforts which human souls are making to get some sufficient object to lean upon and twine around. One clasps a glittering prop, and it scathes him. The love of money blasts his soul, and it hangs round its self-chosen stay a blighted, withered thing. Another spreads himself more amply over a broad surface of creature-comfort, a snug dwelling, a well-furnished library, and a pleasant neighbourhood, with the command of everything which heart can wish or fortune buy; but death opens the door, and, with nothing but vacancy to lean upon, he falls over on the other side a helpless and dejected being. And a still greater number, groping about along the ground, cleave to one another, and intertwine their tendrils mutually, and by forming friendships and congenial intimacies and close relations, try to satisfy their leaning, loving nature in this way. But it answers little in the end. The make of man's soul is upward, and one climber cannot lift another off the ground. And the growth of man's soul is luxuriant, and that growth must be stifled, checked, and scanty, if he have no larger space over which to diffuse his aspirations, his affections, and his efforts, than the surface of a fellow-creature's soul. But, weedy as this world-garden is, the Tree of Life still grows in the midst of it, erect in His own omnipotent self-sufficiency, and inviting every weary, straggling soul to lay hold of His everlasting strength, and expatiate upwards along the infinite ramifications of His endless excellences and all-inviting love.

God has formed the soul of man of a leaning, dependent make; and for the healthy growth and joyful development of that soul it is essential that he should have some object far higher and nobler than himself to dispend his desires and delights upon. That object is revealed in the Gospel. That object is Immanuel. His divinity is the Almighty prop, able to sustain the adhering soul so that it shall never perish nor come into condemnation; the omnipotent support which bears the clinging spirit loftily and securely, so that the whirling temptations which vex it cannot rend it from the Tree of Life, and that the muddy plash, which soils and beats into the earth its sprawling neighbours, cannot tarnish the verdant serenity and limpid glories of its flowering head. And just as His Divine strength is the omnipotent prop of the adhering soul, so His Divine resources and His human sympathy make Him the all-sufficient object over which each emotion and each desire of regenerate humanity may boundlessly diffuse itself. And however delicate your feelings, however eager your affections, and however multitudinous the necessities of your intricate nature, there is that in this heavenly Friend which meets them every one. There are in His unimaginable compassions, and in His benignant fellow-feelings, holds sufficient for every craving tendril and eager clasper of the human heart to fix upon and wreath around.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

2. How He is appropriated by the soul.

(972.) My conception of Christ is, that He is mine: not mine in any sense which appropriates Him to me alone; but mine as really and truly as though I were the only human being in the universe. My father was absolutely mine, although my next younger brother could say the same thing, and though every brother and sister could say the same thing. I had the whole of him, and each of my brothers and sisters had the whole of him. And I have the whole of my God. The God of all the heaven, and the God of the whole earth, and of time, and of physical law and its sequence, and of all invisible laws and their sequences—He is my God.

—Beecher.

3. How He dwells in the soul.

(973.) This matter is likened, in the Bible, to hospitality. "I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear My voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with Me." God comes to men's souls; He comes to the soul-house of men; He enters there; He holds communion with them. It is as if a benefactor entered into a dwelling to bring joy, treasure, relief—whatever gift he might please to bestow. Christ comes to me, transforming all that is visible and all that is invisible in me. I do not believe that God is a person who sits in one place as a man's body does. I stand here in my body; but that is not me. My thoughts are running quickly to and fro. They stretch from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same. I am where my thoughts are, and where my affections are. I am conscious that my inner manhood spreads abroad, and is already superior to time and space. And my God is not a person in such a sense that He is fixed. Everywhere the affluent mind of God pervades the universe. He enters into my mind. He touches the springs of life and being in me. And it is the quality of the Divine indwelling to develop in men their superior nature—not their animal; to give authority and power to their faculties—love, and hope, and faith, and conscience, and the moral sense; to set them free from the dominion of the appetites and passions. I believe there is such a thing as an indwelling God. In other words, I believe there is such a thing as the direct sympathetic action of the Divine mind on certain parts of our mind.

Let a little child be in the room with a slate making figures, and let that child, if it be musically inclined, hear the mother sing in a low tone, and its thoughts begin to sing the tune that the mother is singing,—involuntarily. Let the child sit musing, and let the mother begin to tell some interesting story, and she does not need to say to the child, "Now, listen!" It will listen in spite of itself. If you sigh in the presence of another man, he will be likely to sigh too. If you sing, he will feel a desire to sing. If you reason, he will think reason. If you laugh, he will smile. If you cry, the shadow falls on him. You reflect your mood on those who are round about you. And God's mind has power upon the minds of those who are in communion with Him. If the heart be open, and the moral nature be sensitive, God acts upon the thought and feeling, so that you are guided by Him. And I fain would believe that there is a loving Christ who dwells in me, and takes care of all the conditions that affect me, and fills me with a Divine stimulus and influence.

—Beecher.

4. How He manifests Himself to the soul.

(974.) Since God is everywhere, in what sacred and peculiar sense is He present to the believing heart? "Lord, how is it that Thou dost manifest Thyself to us, as Thou dost not unto the world?" The principle on which He does so is illustrated by some of the common facts of life. A man is present to his friend, as he is not to a stranger, though he may be at the same moment speaking to both. The light which floods the landscape with a deluge of beauty is present to him who sees it, as it is not to the blind man walking at his side. Music, though it may ripple round the deafened ear, is only present to him who hears it. The discourse of the naturalist on his experiments, of the scholar on his books, of the mathematician who is talking with raptures on the beauties of a theorem, will bring things into the presence of initiated listeners, which are still remote from the minds of those in the very same company who have no sympathy with the theme. So, "two women may be grinding at a mill;" "two men may be in the field;" one a believer, the other an unbeliever; and although the Great Spirit is near to them both, there is a sense in which He is present to the one as He is not to the other; for, in the case of the believer, the causes of estrangement have been taken away, a new relation exists, a new life has been born and God is present as a Friend, whose love has been accepted, and whose conversation is understood with all the intelligence of a kindred nature.

—Stanford.

(975.) I have received a letter from a lady who some time ago came to me with reference to her religious feelings. She writes of the benefit that she has derived, and the great happiness that she has experienced; and then she propounds the question: "How shall I be able to continue the consciousness of Christ's presence with me?" She avers that at times she has had great joy, and that she has now an abiding faith, which is the fountain of life to her; and she asks: "How shall the intermittent periods be shortened? How shall I have a continued sense of the presence and power of the Lord Jesus Christ?"

As our Master promised that He and His Father would come to His disciples, and abide with them, this inquiry is a legitimate one; but the first step toward a practical solution of it is, to inquire how far one may live under the dominion of any feeling—for I bear in mind that our senses have no relation to this matter. It is a question of the exercise of our reason and imagination—such an exercise of them as is styled, in the Word of God, faith, or the realisation of an invisible presence or truth. And the question arises, first, How far is it possible for the human mind to live in that state continuously? When it is said that a person is always conscious of the presence of Christ, what is the meaning, the scope, and the power of that word always? Does it mean every hour? Does it mean every half-hour? Does it mean every quarter of an hour? Does it mean every period of five minutes? Does it mean every minute? Does it mean every second? Manifestly not.

Let us take some of the most undoubted experiences. We will take, for instance, the experience of a mother's love for her child, which I suppose is as vivid and continuous as any affection. Would you say that there is not a moment of the day in which the mother does not think of the child? It may be that, when it is an infant in her hands, its physical wants may demand her attention every moment; but let the child be two or three years old, and competent to run hither and thither, and take some care of itself, and may there not be times when the mother, especially if it devolves upon her to do the work of the household, will be thinking of how to provide for the child its food or its raiment, and of other family duties? Is not maternal love, which is the most nearly continuous of any feeling, an intermittent feeling? Is it not one that comes and goes? Is it not one that, under ordinary circumstances, passes out of the mind and comes back again many and many a time in a single day, although the object of it is present all the time?

There was formerly, at the lower end of New York City, looking out on the Bay, a revolving light; and I used to stand on Brooklyn Heights and watch it, to see the different colours come and go. There was first a red light; then that would go away, and a white light would appear; and then that would pass out of sight, and a dimmer side would come round.

It is very much so with a mother's affection. And there is no feeling in the world that ever was continuous, or that ever will be, unless the person who has it is insane. Physicians will tell you that when your child has any feeling on which its mind dwells continually, it is in a morbid condition. Prolonged feeling is a sign of mania. The law of healthful feeling is one that demands change. The mind is multiform. It is subject to many feelings. One comes, and subsides; then a third comes and takes its place, and subsides; and so on. Thus feelings act and intermit. And as this is the case in our daily experience of affection towards those that are with us and can minister the knowledge of their presence through our senses; so, much more is it the case with our daily experience of affection toward any being that is invisible. As, where a child or a dear friend is in a distant land, there may be many hours, and even days, when that child or friend is absent from your apprehension; so, much more, where our approach to God, or Christ, or the invisible Spirit, is rather through the mediation of duties and acts than by direct thought, the Divine Being is likely to be absent from our thought.

My first reply, then, to the question, "How shall I maintain the conscious presence of Christ with me all the time?" is this: There is no such thing, literally, as that. You may maintain such a sense of Christ as shall diffuse an influence through the heart all day long, acting as the most vivid earthly affections do; but the most vivid earthly affections, according to the law of the mind, are alternative, and not unintermitting.

—Becher.

XXXVII. THE COMPLETENESS OF HIS LIFE.

(976.) How few can say at death that they have finished their work? Indeed, no one in human nature ever could say that but Jesus. The emblem of every life may well be, in one aspect of it at least, a broken pillar. The historian dies leaving a volume half ready for the press; the novelist lays down the pen in the midst of his tale; the statesman quits the senate with his work only half done. Thus each man's life is a fragment, and he is cut off like a bird shot in the middle of its flight, or a lark brought down in the middle of its song. But Christ's work was all done. Everything He had planned He had performed. He had filled fully the whole programme which He had made out for Himself at the beginning, and having left nothing unperformed, He yielded up the ghost.

XXXVIII. HIS SUPERIORITY TO ALL OTHER TEACHERS.

(977.) Go to your natural religion. Lay before her Mahomet and his disciples arrayed in armour and in blood, riding in triumph over the thousands and tens of thousands who fell by his victorious sword. Show her the cities which he set in flames, the countries which he ravaged and destroyed, and the miserable distress of all the inhabitants of the earth. When she has viewed him in this scene, carry her into his retirements. Show her the prophet's chambers, his concubines and wives. Let her see his adultery, and hear him allege revelation and his Divine commission to justify his lust and oppression. When she is tired with this prospect, then show her the blessed Jesus humble and meek, doing good to all the sons of men, patiently instructing both the ignorant and the perverse. Let her see Him in His most retired privacies; let her follow Him to the Mount, and hear His devotions and supplications to God. Carry her to His table to view His poor fare and hear His heavenly discourse. Let her see Him injured, but not provoked. Let her attend Him to the tribunal, and consider the patience with which He endureth the scoffs and reproaches of His enemies. Lead her to His cross, and let her view Him in the agony of death, and hear His last prayer for His persecutors, Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do! When natural religion has viewed both, ask, "Which is the prophet of God?" But her answer we have already had, when she saw part of this scene through the eye of the centurion who attended at the cross; by him she spake and said, "Truly this man was the Son of God."—Sherlock, 1641-1707.

(978.) Jesus of Nazareth is worthy to be the perpetual text of all preaching, the perpetual theme of all religionists, and the perpetual object of devout studentship. The same can be said of no other man that ever lived, no matter what was the extent of his genius, the order of his talents, or the fashion of their exercise. Plato is not the constant theme of philosophy, for there has been and are other philosophers that divide with him the honours. Aristotle is not the sole representative of logic, for there have been and are logicians that stand his peer. Napoleon does not monopolise the admiration of those that study the art of war, for there have been, and perhaps there are now, other military chieftains whose achievements are of so high an order that they command the admiration of all military men. And so in whatever sphere we find the great representative men of the world, we find that no one has been or is great enough to monopolise opinion and command universal homage. Whether you look at philosophy, poetry, music, science, art, or religion, you find that however great any actor has been, there have been other actors, both before and after, that divided fame with him, and had a common share in the applause and the remembrance of men. Only in respect to Jesus of Nazareth can it be said that one man had all, and was all, that one in his order could have and be. As a religionist, as a religious teacher,—teaching in the twofold method of example and instruction both,—Jesus was so opulent in gifts, so remarkable in manner and method, so magnificent in every class of equipment demanded by His mission, that He represented and represents all there was and all there is to be represented to the devout attention of mankind.

As the sun in summer fills the whole realm of Nature, flooding the world from pole to pole with luminance, so He filled the realm in which He moved, so that between its either pole there was at no point lack of radiance. And this is admitted by all. The world—or that portion of it that has knowledge of Him—whose thought is intelligent enough to apprehend Him, whose every heart is pure enough and sensitive enough to appreciate Him, gives by its universal suffrage pre-eminence to His name. There were wise men before He was born; and His highest eulogy is found in the fact that they were only wise enough to have visions and dreams of His coming. They were as a hill whose fame in the neighbourhood is, that from its top the residents of the hamlet can see the earliest signs of the morning. The world acknowledges their lame because it perceives that from the summit of their teaching it was enabled to catch the first glimpse of His rising. The fame of the old prophets and seers, of the far-seeing men of the olden time, is that they foretold His advent. There have been wise men since He lived on the earth; but their wisdom is acknowledged, not in the fact that they were wise enough to add anything to His teaching, but wise in apprehending the meaning of His teaching; apt in its explanation and powerful in its enforcement. The great men of the Church to-day are great because they can do this. They are great because they can catch the line of His thought, explain it, enforce it. And in this only are they great. Without Him they could do nothing; without Him they would be nothing. They are reflectors—polished surfaces—placed at such an angle that they can take of the beams poured down upon them from the great luminary over their heads, and send, in showers and glances, the radiance thus borrowed horizontally over the world. —Murray.

XXXIX. THE ULTIMATE TRIUMPHS OF HIS KINGDOM.

(979.) The Scriptures give us to expect that the earth itself, as well as its redeemed inhabitants, shall at a future period be purified, and reunited to the whole empire of God. We are taught to pray, and consequently to hope, that, when "the kingdom of God" shall universally prevail, "His will shall be done on earth as it is now in heaven;" but if so, earth itself must become, as it were, a part of heaven.

That we may form a clear and comprehensive view of our Lord's words, and of this part of the subject, be it observed that the Scriptures sometimes distinguish between the kingdom of God and that of Christ. Though the object of both be the triumph of truth and righteousness, yet the mode of administration is different. The one is natural, the other delegated: the latter is in subserviency to the former, and shall be finally succeeded by it. Christ is represented as acting in our world by delegation: as if a king had commissioned his son to go and reduce a certain rebellious province, and restore it to his dominion. The period allotted for this work extends from the time of the revelation of the promised seed to the day of judgment. The operations are progressive. If it had seemed good in His sight, He could have overturned the power of Satan in a short period; but His wisdom saw fit to accomplish it by degrees. Like the commander of an invading army, He first takes possession of one post, then of another, then of a third, and so on, till by and by the whole country falls into His hands. And as the progress of a conqueror would be more rapid after a few of the strongest fortresses had surrendered (inasmuch as things would then approach fast to a crisis, to a breaking up, as it were, of the powers of the enemy), so it has been with the kingdom of Christ, and such will be its progress before the end of time. In the early ages of the world but little was done. At one time true religion appears to have existed only in a few families. Afterwards it assumed a national appearance. After this it was addressed to all nations. And before the close of time all nations shall be subjected to the obedience of Christ. This shall be the "breaking up" of Satan's empire. Now, as on the conquest of a rebellious province, the delegated authority of the conqueror would cease, and the natural government of the empire resume its original form, so Christ is represented as "delivering up the kingdom to His Father, that God may be all in all." This is the ultimatum of the Messiah's kingdom; and this appears to be the ultimate object for which He taught His disciples to pray: but as the final end involves the preceding gradations which lead on to its accomplishment, in directing them to pray for the coming of God's kingdom, He directed them to pray for the present prevalence of His own.

As on the conquest of a rebellious province some would be pardoned, and others punished; as every vestige of rebellion would be effaced, and law, peace, and order flow in their ancient channels; such a period might with propriety be termed "a restitution of all things." Such will be the event of the last judgment, which is described as the concluding exercise of the delegated authority of Christ.

And as on the conquest of a rebellious province, and the restitution of peace and order, that province, instead of being any longer separate from the rest of the empire, would become a component part of it, and the king's will would be done in it as it had been done without interruption in the loyal part of his territories; such is the representation given with respect to our world, and the holy parts of God's dominions. A period will arrive when the will of God shall be done on earth as it is now done in heaven. This, however, will never be the case while any vestige of moral evil remains. It must be after the general conflagration; which, though it will destroy every kind of evil, root and branch, that now prevails upon the face of the earth, and will terminate the generations of Adam, who have possessed it, yet will not so destroy the earth itself but that it shall survive its fiery trial, and, as I apprehend, become the everlasting abode of righteousness—a part of the holy empire of God. This was to be the mark on which the disciples were to keep their eye in all their prayers: but as, in desiring a perfect conformity to Christ in their own souls, they would necessarily desire the present progress of purity in the use of all the appointed means; so in praying that God's will might be perfectly done on earth, even as it is done in heaven, they would pray for the progressive prevalence of righteousness in the world, as that by which it should be accomplished.

—Andrew Fuller, 1754-1815.

XL. HIS SECOND COMING.

(980.) Meditate of Christ's coming to judgment. Surely thou wilt not easily sleep while this trumpet, that shall call all mankind to judgment, shall sound in thy ear. The reason why men sleep so soundly in security is, because they either do not believe this, or at least do not think of it seriously, so as to expect it. The servant that looks for his master will be loth to be found in bed when he comes; no, he sits up to open the door for him when he knocks. Christ hath told us He will come, but not when, that we might never put off our clothes, or put out the candle; "Watch therefore, for ye know not what hour the Lord doth come."

—Gurnall, 1617-1677.

(981.) I have thought on it many a time, as a small emblem of that day, when I have seen a prevailing army drawing towards the towns and castles of the enemy. Oh! with what glad hearts do all the poor prisoners within hear the news and behold their approach! How do they run up to their prison windows, and thence behold their friends with joy! How glad are they at the roaring report of that cannon which is the enemy's terror! How do they clap each other on the back, and cry, "Deliverance! deliverance!" While, in the meantime, the late insulting, scorning, cruel enemies begin to speak them fair, and beg their favour; but all in vain, for they are not at the disposal of prisoners, but of the general. Their fair usage may make their conditions somewhat the more easy, but yet they are used as enemies still.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(982.) This great event is constantly represented in the New Testament as near, and the view is natural and true. Never does the meeting with a beloved friend come so close to us as when we have just parted from him. Love makes the tears of farewells sparkle into welcomes; and if we could only retain the same impression of Christ's loss, His return would be as nigh. It is moreover in the New Testament the great event which towers above every other. The heaven that gives back Christ gives back all we have loved and lost, solves all doubts, and ends all sorrows. His coming looks in upon the whole life of His Church, as a lofty mountain peak looks in upon every little valley and sequestered home around its base, and belongs to them all alike. Every generation lies under the shadow of it, for whatever is transcendently great is constantly near, and in moments of high conviction it absorbs petty interests and annihilates intervals.

—Ker.

XXI. HIS GLORY.

1. It is now inconceivable by us.

(983.) Any view of Christ which the greatest preacher in the highest flights of genius ever set before his audience, must be feeble compared with the reality. Paint and canvas cannot give the hues of a rainbow, or the beams of the sun—unless by representations so poor as in many instances to excite contempt, and in all astonishment, that any artist could attempt what so far exceeds the powers of cold, dull paint. No more can words describe the Saviour's glory. Nay, what is the most glowing and ecstatic view that the highest faith of a soul, hovering on the borders of another world, ever obtained of Christ, compared to the reality? It is like the sun changed by a frosty fog-bank into a dull, red, copper ball—shorn of the splendour that no mortal's eyes can look on.

—Guthrie.

2. The future disclosures of it that await us.

(984.) We know from the testimony and observation of multitudes, that there are those who, by faith, walk in a more intimate realisation of the Lord Jesus Christ in them than they do by sight of the bodily forms round about them.

Nevertheless, there is to be a disclosure far above this, and far more glorious than this. We are to see Christ as He is. That intimates that we see Him now as we imagine Him to be. We see Him now by our illustrations and figures, by our analogies and hints; but the day is coming when we shall see Him as He is. All these little sketches will be filled up and outmeasured. The dim points of light which give glory now will be like twinkling stars, and the thing itself will be like the sun in the morning. The whole heaven will be full of Christ—beautiful as He is, and fruitful as He is, in all joy and peace. There is to be a disclosure, compared with which the disclosures of this world will be as twilight compared to mid-day. —Becker.

XLII. HIS DELIVERANCE OF THE KINGDOM TO THE FATHER.

(985.) No one ever seems to have had so grand and magnificent a sense of the final outcome of God's moral government over this world as the Apostle Paul. "Then cometh the end, when He shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father: when He shall have put down all rule, and all authority and power. For He must reign, till He hath put all enemies under His feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For He hath put all things under His feet. But when He saith all things are put under Him, it is manifest that He is excepted which did put all things under Him. And when all things shall be subdued unto Him, then shall the Son also Himself be subject unto Him that put all things under Him, that God may be all in all." Who can give an interpretation of that? He that dare, let him do it; but not I. I should as soon think of setting a mouse at surveying the chain of the Andes, and making a topographical report, as to take this magnificent vision of the consummation of God's mediatorial government in the universe, including this world, and what others we know not, and undertake, without experience, and without anything else but the blazonry of these grand figures, to give any precise idea of what it was—only this: that after a campaign, magnificently planned and nobly conducted, the general comes back to his king, and having defeated everything in the field, and having subdued all the provinces, and holding in his hands the keys of the cities, lays them at his king's feet, and then takes his place near by his seat. That is the figure. So, when the vast work of God on earth and in heaven shall have been done, in the far and grand future, Christ shall come back, and shall lay before God the tokens of universal victory, and God shall be all and in all. Whether it shall be by the resumption of the Son, or whether by some co-equality, or some other steps, no man knows, and no man need try to know. Sufficient it is, that it shall be a scene of unequalled grandeur and glory.

—Becker.

CHRISTIAN, THE.

I CAN A MAN KNOW THAT HE IS A CHRISTIAN?*

(986.) A good man may be in such a temptation, that he shall not be able to see the lifting up of his own hand in prayer. Sometimes it is so with him, that he cannot read his own graces, nor see them. Though the fish lie playing upon the water, and you may see them in a fair sunshine, yet in a storm, or night, ye see them not, though they be in the pond or river still. So here—Though when the light of God's countenance doth shine upon the soul, he is then able to see his own graces; yet if it be a storm, or the night of temptation, he cannot see them—Why? not because they are not in his heart and life as before, but because he is in the dark.

—Bridges, 1600-1670.

(987.) The evidences of a man's Christianity (if he is a Christian) are not so difficult and serious a matter as men think. Why, any one who has sense sufficient to judge whether he is a good citizen or not, or whether he is the affectionate son of his own parents, can tell whether he is a child of God. "If ye love me, ye will keep my commandments." "Ah!" you sigh, "but I don't always keep them." Well, ask that little child how he knows that he loves his parents; he will answer you, "Because I love to do what they want me to do." "Why, my dear child, you are always doing what they don't want you to do. You can't prove your love to them by that rule." The poor child hangs its head, and says, "I don't know as I can." He cannot answer you. You ask again, "My child, how do you know that you love your parents?" "Why, why I do love to please them better than anything else in the world." "Ah! but I have just shown you that you do not always try to please them; how can you say that this is your proof of love to them?" The child is silenced; but in his little heart he knows that in spite of his disobedience he does desire to do his parents' will; and that he does love them, whether he perfectly obeys them or not. He thinks, perhaps, "I am a poor child, a hard child to manage; I give them a great deal of trouble, but I love them; I am their own child after all. They would never give me up; and nothing on earth could take me from them."

Faith is the life of a child, and that is why the Saviour declares, "Except ye become as little children, ye shall not enter the kingdom of heaven." When, therefore, you examine yourself by the rule of obedience, and find that you are not perfect there, see if it is your greatest desire to honour Christ by keeping His commandments, and if you are trying to do so, and if it is the grief and pain of your life that you fail as you do. If you wish, more than anything else, to be His, if you yearn to have Him for your Friend, if you feel that you must and will belong to Him or to nobody, you need no more remarkable "witness." If you were not His before, you are so now; so enjoy Him afresh—'tis sweet making love again.

—Becker.

(988.) Suppose one of the sheep in a fold were to go to the shepherd, and say, "I think I'm your sheep, because you get six pounds of wool off me;" and another should say, "And I think I'm your sheep, because you get four pounds of wool from me;" and a third, "I hope I am your sheep, but I don't know, for you only get three pounds of wool from me; and sometimes it is but two." Finally, suppose one poor scraggy fellow comes who don't know whether he is a sheep or a goat, and makes his complaint; the shepherd would say, "I know who are the best sheep, and who are the worst. I wish you could all give me ten pounds of wool; but whether you give me ten pounds or one, you are all mine. I bought you, and paid for you, and you are all in my fold, and you every one belong to me." It is not how much a sheep brings his owner which proves him his. The proof that the sheep belongs to the shepherd is, that the shepherd bought him and takes care of him.

—Becker.

* See Adoption, Assurance.

(989.) He that is endeavouring to keep the commandments of the Lord Jesus Christ, and has an intelligent understanding of what those commandments are, is a Christian.

What makes a man a husbandman? A man buys a piece of ground in the country. It is rocky, and a great deal given to weeds, eminently fertile in Canada thistles. There is on it an old run-down barn full of rats and mice, and all sorts of vermin; and a dilapidated, tenantless house. The man goes on to his place, and lives in this miserable house, and has the rheumatism and all manner of complaints, and never ploughs a furrow, nor sows a seed, nor eradicates a weed. He crawls out of his rickety, leaky shanty every morning, and walks round, and looks over his rocky, thorny, thistley farm, that is run down and good for nothing, and brings forth only vicious weeds; and he says, "I am a husbandman." I say that he is not. He owns twenty acres of dirt, and rocks, and weeds, but he is no husbandman.

Take another man. He has made a poor selection of land. He has a cold, clayey soil, full of springs, and poorly drained. As it slopes to the north, the sun does not strike it till the latest part of the day. He plants a few things, and works hard to cultivate them, but they do not come to much. Every spring he puts in some potatoes, but he gets out only about as many as he puts in. He raises a little grass and grain, but it takes all his time to raise a little. He has no capital, and he makes no headway. And yet, I declare that that man is a husbandman. He is a very poor one, to be sure; but he is trying to be a good one. According to the soil he has, and the strength he has, he does very well. He has but one talent, and the Lord will require of him only according to that one talent.

Another man has a rather better slope to the south, and his soil is warm in spots, though in other spots it is cold. It is rocky, and on the whole, rather poor. There is a patch of four or five acres that he bestows his labour upon. This patch is the garden of the farm, and is kept in a very good condition. But the rest of the land is uncultivated. His fences are neglected, and he loses some of his crops on account of his negligence. Nevertheless there are spots on his farm that produce well. He is therefore a better husbandman than the first or second man: and yet, he is a very imperfect one. He cultivates only a portion of his land. He does not subdue it all, and see that it is secured from waste.

Another man has a piece of ground very much like that of the man last mentioned; but he has more ingenuity, he is more thorough, and he raises more crops. The annual product of his farm is twice as great. He is a better husbandman.

Another man is in advance of all these. He is a very good farmer. He is getting rich. His soil is excellent, he tills it well, and he has heavy crops.

Another man is fairly fat. He literally rolls in abundance. He tickles the ground, and it laughs, and yields bountifully. He does not know where to put his crops. He is a jolly old farmer. He has enough to take care of himself, and all that depend upon him. His bounty overflows, and all his labours are blessed by it. He is more a husbandman than all the rest that I have named.

And yet the feeble, broken-down man, who really tries to raise a crop, but cannot on account of his poverty and weakness, is a husbandman, although he is a very poor one.

Now I take it that this figure of husbandry, which is the Lord's figure, may be fitly applied to Christians.

That man who begins life under disadvantages of disposition and of early training can make a certain fight. It will be a feeble fight; but it will be a fight. He meets with discouragements or every hand, and he sees others going ahead of him, and he is conscious of his imperfections and failures, and he says, "I am a poor Christian, I am making but little headway; but I am making a fight, though it is a feeble fight." He is making a very feeble fight; and yet, very likely he will stand in the last day higher than many of you who make a better one. The Lord will say, "It is required of him according to what he hath, and not according to what he hath not."

Another man has a better disposition, and had a better early training. Though he has some infelicities of disposition and some bad habits, yet some of the graces were natural to him. He cultivates parts of his disposition, and other parts he neglects. On the whole, he is in the Lord's husbandry. He is better than the other man, but is not very good.

Another man has his whole nature broken up, and under some sort of cultivation. Every part of it is bearing harvests—is yielding spiritual fruit to the glory of God. He is a better Christian, but he is no more really a Christian than that man who is endeavouring under less favourable circumstances to live Christianly.

So to some men you may say, almost from their birth, "You are not far from the kingdom of God." It takes but a little—only a step, as it were—to bring them into the holy precincts. Others have to travel a great while before they get into the Celestial City. Much depends upon the differences of organisations and variations of condition. The thing which we are to look at, therefore, in ourselves, is not so much "Am I or am I not a Christian?" as it is, "Being a Christian, and endeavouring to do the will of God, at what point am I standing? Am I really attempting to subdue my whole nature to the law of the Lord Jesus Christ, and to be as sweet, as meek, as gentle, and as fruit-bearing in love as my Master, and to be one with Him?"

—Becker.

II. HIS CALLING.

All Christians are called, 1. To be saints.

(990.) We are apt to form mistaken notions of God's saints. We are apt to think of them as if they were beings of a different order from ourselves, raised above the level of human infirmity. And from this mistaken notion flows great practical mischief. Not to speak of the manifold evils of saint worship, which may be supposed to have passed away at the Reformation (though the tendency to it is always alive in the human heart), a wrong estimate of saintliness discourages us for the pursuit of it, as seeming to put it entirely out of our reach.

This wrong estimate comes chiefly from our considering them as creatures of the past, not mixed up with the affairs and troubles of life. Whatever we look at from a distance is beautiful by the perspective. It is so in bodily sight. A country which was dull, tame, or harsh, when it lay immediately around us, borrows soft and mellow tints from the atmosphere as we recede from it; the blue distance conceals its plain features. It is so with the mental retrospect, which we call memory. Memory has a notorious trick of dropping or smoothing over disagreeables. The days of our childhood, which had their rubs, and their tears, and their faults, like all other days, seem to us always beautiful and innocent in virtue of this trick of memory. The same law of the mind operates to throw round the saints a false and an imaginary lustre. We imagine that no man is or can be a saint who is mixed up in the daily intercourse of society, who is fighting hand to hand with us in the battle of life. Why not? What one sound reason can be assigned why there should not be nowadays men as zealous, as devoted, as simple-minded as the Apostles and saints of the primitive Church?

—Goulburn.

2. To serve God.

(991.) What is a servant? Is he one who spends his existence in raptures, in reveries, or in the contemplation of his own emotional life? Is he one who wastes all his days in mere sorrow over his master's frowns, or mere joy at the thought of his master's smiles? Is he the steward who leaves his accounts in confusion, the porter who forsakes his watch, or the workman who sits down in the midst of his unfinished work to indulge in dreamy meditation on his own ecstasies or agonies or apathies? Such, with some, seems to be the perfect standard of a Christian; but is it the true ideal of a servant? Judged by the laws of common sense, service is a practical, not a sentimental thing; it consists in doing, not in feeling; and it is a solemn thought for us all, especially for those who have been taught that the mere experience of happy or sorrowful feeling is the sum of all religion—that none are seen in the courts of heaven but servants—that is, those who are engaged in obedient activity. There, as the Lord's Prayer has taught us, the will of God is done. His servants do it perfectly, because they love Him perfectly. It is in the very essence of love to labour. It never can be still, never can be useless, never can contain itself, never can spare itself, never cease to spend itself for the object to which it is devoted.

—Stanford.

3. To adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour.

(992.) Believers are earnestly enjoined in Scripture to adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour by a walk and conversation becoming the Gospel. But how? it may be asked. There are some things so perfect in themselves that they are injured, not improved, by any touch of man. Who can give a purer whiteness to the lily, or gild the burnished gold, or make more lustrous the sparkling diamond? We cannot improve upon nature; we cannot adorn it in the sense of making it more perfect; but we can explain it, we can make use of it for spiritual imagery, we can exhibit it in new lights, and display it in a thousand ways before unknown; so that in the exquisite setting of the poet's verse, it may shire with even more than its native charm. And in the same way we can deal with the doctrine of God our Saviour. We cannot improve the Gospel of Christ. It is all perfect—all complete—wanting nothing. God said again and again regarding Jesus, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;" and He Himself, looking back from the cross upon the whole course of His obedience and suffering, said with His dying breath, "It is finished;" indicating not merely the completion of His work, but also its perfection. It is so exquisitely fair and proportioned, that it stands in need of no embellishment; it is marred and destroyed in its nature and effect by any additions that man may make to it. But though we cannot improve the doctrine of our Saviour, we can make its power upon our own heart and life visible; we can explain and manifest it to others with such illustration and enforcement as may be in our power; and crown it with the history of what by it God has done for our soul. We are to clothe the spiritual life of the Gospel—the precepts, the examples, the atoning death, the justifying righteousness of Christ, with an outward conduct becoming its purity and dignity. We are to embody the spiritualities of the unseen life in forms of daily life and conversation, such as will worthily represent their glory and grace. A beautiful character impresses itself upon the very features of the body, so that, looking upon the lines of the countenance, we can read the soul within, and are attracted to admire and love it; and thus should the life of faith within—the reflex loveliness of Christ's character in the soul—exhibit itself in the homely garb of our outward everyday life; in order that those who cannot see the seal of the Spirit—the inward evidence of the doctrine of Christ, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it—may see its outward luminous sign in a living epistle, known and read of all men. Every Christian's life should be like the opal, exhibiting its pure transparency, the beautiful hues of grace; or like a prism, refracting the clear bright light of heaven into a seven-coloured spectrum of honesty, truthfulness, purity, kindness, meekness, heavenliness, usefulness.

—Macmillan.

4. To be fruitful in all good works.

(993.) Look where you will in God's Book, you shall never find any lively member of God's Church compared to any but a fruitful tree—to the fruitful vine, the fat olive, the seasonable sapling planted by the rivers of waters. The goodly cedars, strong elms, fast-growing willows, sappy sycamores, and all the rest of the fruitless trees of the earth—i.e., all fashionable and barren professors whatsoever—may shoot up in height, spread far, show fair, but what are they good for? They may be fit for the forest, the ditches, the hedgerows of the world; not for the soil of God's Israel. That is a place for none but vines, for trees of righteousness, fruitful trees (John xv. 5, 8).

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(994.) If herbs watered do still continue dry, we justly say they are dead: so, likewise, we cannot avow or assure ourselves to be Christians, watered with the Spirit of Christ, so long as, instead of bearing fruit by amendment of life, we continue dry and withered.

—Cawdray, 1598-1664.

(995.) The soul that has the life and the love of Christ in it cannot help producing fruit. It does so, not by an outward arbitrary law, but by the sweet inward vital law of life and growth. And therefore it is that the free, unconstrained outpourings of the heart in a godly life—the natural, spontaneous, practical responses of the love of believers to the love of Christ—are more frequently in the New Testament called fruits than works. “Let my beloved come into His garden and eat His pleasant fruits.” Fruitfulness is the peculiar distinction and glory of Christ’s disciples. It is the result towards which all their efforts tend—the ultimate and highest object of their existence. They are united to Christ, quickened by His Spirit, enjoy all the means and privileges of grace, the dew of Divine love, the sunshine of Divine righteousness, the showers and breezes of Divine mercy, in order that they may bring forth fruit; and that more and more abundantly. Nay, the husbandman does not hesitate to dig about them and prune them by His afflictive dispensations, in order that on the branches which formerly yielded only leaves may cluster thickly and heavily the peaceable fruits of righteousness. A barren Christian is a contradiction in terms and anomaly in the spiritual vineyard. Wherever there is life it must go on and on growing from one stage to another; not resting at any one point of attainment, but advancing until it has covered every branch and twig with fruit. Fruitfulness is a necessity of its nature, without which it must become dwarfed and stunted—must wither and die; An indication of its growing perfection, for there is no plant perfect until it has brought forth all the fruit it can. Faith without works is dead; as the blossom that has become abortive and forms no fruit fades and falls off the tree. There cannot be a worse sign of a vine than when all its sap is expended in the production of leaves and shoots, and of a Christian than when all his grace evaporates in words, and all his faith in profession. Fruitfulness is the great object for which the vine is cultivated; and if it comes short of this the graces and beauties of its foliage will not be regarded as a compensation—it will be rooted out and destroyed; and so diligence in adding to his faith, knowledge, patience, temperance, brotherly kindness, and charity, is the great object for which the Christian is planted in the house of the Lord—rooted in the love of Christ; and if he fails of accomplishing this purpose of his existence, the mere form of godliness will not atone for it, or prevent the dread sentence going forth, “Cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?” “Every branch in Me (that is, in Christ, not by a real and vital union, but by a visible and professional union, by an external alliance with His Church, and by the use of His ordinances) that beareth not fruit He taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit He purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. . . . I am the Vine, ye are the branches: he that abideth in Me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without Me ye can do nothing.”

—Macmillan.

5. To make constant progress in holiness.

(996.) The life of believers, after conversion, is an active life: none of them can say, Now I have no more ado, having received Christ; I may walk at random, and live as I list; no, by no means; after Israel were come through the Red Sea, they had a wilderness to walk through; and so it is with every believer, while here in this world: but though he hath a journey to go, yet he hath the greatest encouragement to walk forward; for he is in Christ, in whom he hath all fulness.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(997.) The purity of the Christian is not an evanishing, but a permanent purity. All the religion that many have is evanishing and superficial; it comes and goes like a flash of lightning. True purity is constant, it continues and grows; for, “He that hath clean hands shall wax stronger and stronger.” The righteous holdeth on his way, like a vessel sailing towards such a port, though it meets with many blasts to drive it hither and thither, and sometimes very far back; yet it goes on again, and makes out the harbour designed: so, though the believer may meet with blasts of temptation and corruption, that may set him far back; yet he holds on his way, God in Christ is the centre of rest to which he moves; yea, he hath taken up his rest in Him, and there he resolves to stay for ever: he hath chosen God in Christ for his portion, and he is determined to abide by his choice.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

6. To be like Christ.

(998.) We are not, saith Austen, to be like Christ in working miracles, but in a holy life. A Christian should be both a loadstone and a diamond: a loadstone, in drawing others to Christ; a diamond, casting a sparkling lustre of holiness in his life. Oh let us be so just in our dealings, so true in our promises, so devout in our worship, so unblameable in our lives, that we may be the walking pictures of Christ. Thus as Christ was made in our likeness, let us labour to be made in His likeness.

—Watson, 1696.

III. THE CHRISTIAN AND CHRIST.

1. His union with Christ.

(999.) What a wonderful mystery is this, that believers should be united to, and made one with God, as the Father and the Son are one? Not in respect of partaking of His essential and incommunicable properties, which creatures are incapable of, but in respect of reality and truth: believers are as really united to Christ, as the branches of a tree are unto the root. As the stock and the graft are really joined together, and are one within the other, and made one body, so are believers really united to God, God dwelling in them and they in God, and are made one spirit with Him through Christ. He that is joined to the Lord is one spirit. And again, by one spirit are we united, &c. —Austen, 1656.

(1000.) The graft and stock of the fruit-tree are so joined together as that they are the one within the other, and so made one entire body; the graft is within the stock in respect of its substance (the stock encloseth some part of it). And the stock is within the graft, by its sap and moisture giving nourishment to it, whereby it thrives and brings forth good fruits: so they being joined, and one within the other, are made one body or substance.

This similitude shadows out unto us, that believers, by ingrafting into Christ, do live in Him, and He in them, and are thereby made one with Him.

—Austen, 1656.

2. His life is hid with Christ in God.

(1001.) As a man, standing upon the sea-shore, sees a great heap of waters, one wave riding on the back of another, and hears, too (especially if it be in stormy weather), the loud roarings thereof, but all this while, though he see the waters, he doth not see the infinite riches that lie buried in the bottom thereof: so it is that wicked men see the want, but not the wealth of God's people—their conflicts, but not their comforts. They easily take notice of the troubles that usually attend upon the bodies of the children of God, but they cannot possibly discover the rejoicings of the spirit that are in their souls; neither indeed can they, for they are spiritually discerned.

—Needler, 1655.

(1002.) Standing by the telegraphic wires, one may often hear the mystic wailing and sighing of the winds among them, like the strains of an Æolian harp, but one knows nothing of the message which is flashing along them. Joyous may be the inner language of those wires, swift as the lightning, far-reaching and full of meaning, but a stranger intermeddles not therewith. Fit emblem of the believer's inner life; men hear our notes of outward sorrow, wrung from us by external circumstances, but the message of celestial peace, the divine communings with a better land, the swift heart-throbs of heaven-born desire, they cannot perceive: the carnal see but the outer manhood, but the life hidden with Christ in God, flesh and blood cannot discern.

—Spurgeon.

3. His love for Christ.

(1003.) There is a ruling passion in every mind. When they were probing among his shattered ribs for the fatal bullet, the French veteran exclaimed, "A little deeper, and you will find the emperor." The deepest affection in a believing soul is the love of its Saviour. Deeper than the love of home, of kindred, of rest and recreation, of life, is the love of Jesus. And so, when other spells have lost their magic, when no name of old endearment, no voice of onwaiting tenderness, can disperse the lethargy of dissolution, the name that is above every name, pronounced by one who knows it, will kindle its last animation in the eye of death.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(1004.) Love to Christ is an abiding motive. It is neither a fancy, nor a sentiment, nor an evanescent emotion. It is a principle—calm, steady, undecaying. It was once a problem in mechanics to find a pendulum which should be equally long in all weathers—which should make the same number of vibrations in the summer's heat and in the winter's cold. They have now found it out. By a process of compensations they make the rod lengthen one way as much as it contracts another, so that the centre of motion is always the same: the pendulum swings the same number of beats in a day of January as in a day of June; and the index travels over the dial-plate with the same uniformity, whether the heat try to lengthen, or the cold to shorten, the regulating power. Now the moving power in some men's minds is sadly susceptible of surrounding influences. It is not principle, but feeling, which forms their pendulum-rod; and according as this very variable material is affected, their index creeps or gallops, they are swift or slow in the work given them to do. But principle is like the compensation-rod, which neither lengthens in the languid heat, nor shortens in the brisker cold, but does the same work day by day, whether the ice-winds whistle or the simoon glows. Of all principles, a high-principled affection to the Saviour is the steadiest and most secure. Other incentives to action are apt to alter or lose their influence altogether.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

4. His dependence on Christ.

(1.) Its comprehensiveness.

(1005.) All the sap and nourishment that the branches of a tree have, they receive it from the root. This shadows out unto us, that our life, growth, strength, and all our spiritual acts, are from Christ. He is the root and stock of every believer, and all spiritual life is from Him; not only the principles of grace, but also the workings of grace. As at first we were stark in sins and trespasses until He gave us life, so being quickened we cannot grow nor act but by influences from Him. "We are not sufficient of ourselves to think anything as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God." A good thought is the least and lowest act of grace, and yet that we cannot do of ourselves; good thoughts and desires are as buds or blossoms upon a tree, which show themselves before the fruits; now if trees cannot bud of themselves, how much less can they bring forth fruits? —Austen, 1656.

(2.) Its continuity.

(1006.) The Christian's way to heaven is something like that in our nation (called the Washes), where the sands (by reason of the seas daily overflowing) do so alter that the traveller who passed them safely a month ago, cannot without great danger venture again, except he hath his guide with him; where then he found firm land, possibly a little after coming he may meet with a devouring quick-sand. Truly thus the Christian who gets over a duty at one time with some facility, his way smooth and plain before him, at another time may find a temptation in the same duty enough to set him, if he had not help from heaven to carry him safe out of the danger. O Christian, it is not safe for thee to venture one step without thy stay, thy hand of faith leaning on thy beloved's arm: trust to thy own legs and thou fallest; use thy legs, but trust to His arm, and thou art safe.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1007.) "It is God that worketh in you to will and to do of His good pleasure." He makes the heart new, and having made it fit for heavenly motion, setting every wheel (as it were) in its right place, then He winds it up by His actuating grace, and sets it on going, the thoughts to stir, the will to move, and make towards the holy object presented; yet here the chariot is set, and cannot ascend the hill of action, till God puts His shoulder to the wheel. "To will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good I find not." God is at the bottom of the ladder, and at the top also, the author and finisher: yea, helping and lifting the soul at every round, in his ascent to any holy action. Well, now the Christian is set on work, how long will he keep close to it? Alas, poor soul, no longer than he is held up by the same hand that empowered him at first. He hath soon wrought out the strength received, and therefore to maintain the tenor of a holy course, there must be renewing strength from Heaven every moment; which David knew, and therefore when his heart was in as holy a frame as ever he felt it, and his people by their free-will-offering declared the same, yet even then he prays that God would "keep this for ever in the imagination of the thoughts of the heart of His people, and establish their hearts to Him." He adored the mercy that made them willing, and then he implores His further grace to strengthen them, and tie a knot that these precious pearls newly strung on their hearts, might not slip off. The Christian, when fullest of divine communications, is but a glass without a foot; he cannot stand, or hold what he hath received any longer, than God holds him in His strong hand. Therefore Christ when bound for heaven, and ready to take His leave of His children, bespeaks His Father's care of them in His absence, "Father, keep them," as if He had said, "they must not be left alone, they are poor shiftless children, that can neither stand nor go without help."

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1008.) A mariner who puts forth to sea, losing sight of land, beholds nothing but a waste of waters around him. The night comes on, and clouds and darkness gather in upon him. And the channel through which he is passing may be a narrow and dangerous one. But still he has an infallible guide on board; he has his chart and his compass to consult with. So the Christian pursuing his course has darkness shrouding his path-way, and storms and tempests threatening his progress: but he, too, has an infallible guide, the Holy Spirit within him, and tracts of light opened upon him in the Scriptures. The mariner, whilst he furnishes his ship with everything likely to be useful in the voyage, masts and sails, rudder and compass, trusts to the winds of heaven to give effect to his preparations, to give, as it were, energy and life to the vessel he navigates: because he knows that without the wind his preparations are useless; so, without due preparation, the most favourable gale would blow in vain for him. He regulates the sail as the wind requires, and holds to the rudder, never loses sight of the compass, and watchfully keeps the narrow way to which it confines him by night and by day. So the wise Christian, after all due preparation on his own part for his voyage, looks up as one continually dependent on the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, the one source of all his spiritual life and motion. He is careful to watch the least breathing of the Spirit upon his soul, that he may not quench it, but yield himself up to its full impression. And adding to this his faith all diligence and watchfulness, he is wafted onwards in safety, amidst the storms and wrecks around him in an evil world.

—Salter.

(1009.) The young convert may be compared to a child whom his father is leading over a rugged and uneven path. After proceeding for some time without much difficulty, he forgets that it has been owing to his father's assistance—begins to think that he may now venture to walk by himself, and consequently falls. Humbled and dejected, he then feels his own weakness, and clings to his father for support. Soon, however, elated with his progress, he again forgets the kind hand which sustains him, fancies he needs no more assistance, and again falls. This process is repeated a thousand times in the course of the Christian's experience, till he learns at length that his own strength is perfect weakness, and that he must depend solely on his heavenly Father.

—Salter.

(3.) Is the ground and source of his safety.

(1010.) This way of God's dealing with His saints, adds to the fulness and stability of their strength. Were the stock in our own hands, we should soon prove broken merchants. God knows we are but leaking vessels; when fullest, we could not hold it long; and therefore to make all sure, he sets us under the streamings forth of His strength, and a leaking vessel under a cock gets what it loseth. Thus we have our leakage supplied continually. This was the provision God made for Israel in the wilderness; "He clave the rock, and the rock followed them." They had not only a draught at present, but it ran in a stream after them; so that you hear no more of their complaints for water; "This rock was Christ." Every believer hath Christ at his back, following him with strength as he goes, for every condition and trial. One flower with a root is worth many in a posie, which, though sweet, yet do not grow, but wither as we wear them in our bosoms. God's strength, as the root, keeps our grace lively, without which, though as orient as Adam's was, it would die.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1011.) A kite soaring on high is in a situation quite foreign to its nature; as much as the soul of man is, when raised above this lower world to high and heavenly pursuits. A person at a distance sees not how it is kept in its exalted situation: he sees not the wind that blows it, nor the hand that holds it, nor the string by whose instrumentality it is held. But all of these powers are necessary to its preservation in that preternatural state. If the wind were to sink it would fall. It has nothing whatever in itself to uphold itself: it has the same tendency to gravitate to the earth that it ever had, and if left for a moment to itself, it would fall. Thus it is with the soul of every true believer. It has been raised by the Spirit of God to a new, a preternatural, a heavenly state; and in that state it is upheld by an invisible and Almighty hand, through the medium of faith. And upheld it shall be, but not by any power in itself. If left for a moment, it would fall as much as ever. Its whole strength is in God alone; and its whole security is in the unchangeableness of His nature, and in the efficacy of His grace. In a word, "it is kept by the power of God, through faith, unto salvation."

—Salter.

(1012.) Up the side of a trellis climbed a slender plant. It seemed as though sensible that its support must be in holding fast thereunto. Sometimes the rough winds tore away its little tendrils, so that its head was bent low towards the earth; but again it succeeded to catch hold: ay, and those very trials served to strengthen its future grasp, by causing it to entwine the more closely and firmly about its stay. So it grew up, because the root was deep in the ground. Nestling among its green leaves it bore flowers lovely to the eye, fragrant to the smell, and sweet to the taste as the honey drop. And when again the rude winds came, it proved equal to the emergency. Weak in itself, it was able to withstand the conflict; because of the firm support it received from the trellis, unto which it clung with stronger arms of holding trust.

How often feeble faith is buffeted by fears and spiritual foes! But, its holdfast is still on the Saviour, whilst its language is ever—

"Other refuge have I none,
Hangs my helpless soul on Thee;
Leave, ah! leave me not alone,
Still support and comfort me.

"All my trust on Thee is stayed,
All my help from Thee I bring;
Cover my defenceless head
With the shadow of Thy wing."

—Bowden.

(4.) Takes away all reason for pride.

(1013.) Had God given His saints a stock of grace to have set up with, and left them to the improvement of it, He had been magnified indeed, because it was more than God did owe the creature; but He had not been omnified as now, when not only the Christian's first strength to close with Christ is from God, but he is beholden still to God for the exercise of that strength, in every action of his Christian course. As a child that travels in his father's company, all is paid for, but his father carries the purse, not himself; so the Christian's shot is discharged in every condition; but he cannot say, This I did, or that I suffered; but God wrought all in me, and for me. The very comb of pride is cut here; no room for any self-exalting thoughts.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1014.) Doth the Christian's strength lie in God, not in himself? This may for ever keep the Christian humble, when most enlarged in duty, most assisted in his Christian course. Remember, Christian, when thou hast thy best suit on, who made it, who paid for it. Thy grace, thy comfort, is neither the work of thy own hands, nor the price of thy own desert; be not for shame proud of another's coat.
—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(5.) Its absoluteness does not destroy his moral agency.

(1015.) "If all grace be from Christ in regard of fresh assistance too, why is it said that we repent, believe, obey: for if all grace, in regard of the very work, be from Christ; if Jesus Christ do work all our works, why is it not rather said, that Christ repents, believes, obeys?"

I answer, No. You know the persons that are responsible: if I owe a man a thousand pounds, and have never a penny to pay it; and another man comes and tends me the money, and goes along with me to the creditor, the bond is taken up, and discharge made; he is not said to have paid the money, but I am said to pay the money that am responsible. So, now, you are responsible: and therefore, though ye have all strength from Christ to do it, yet you are said to repent, and believe, and obey. The devil is not said to commit adultery, and commit murder, yet by his instigation it is done. The sun works with the tree, when the tree brings forth fruit; and yet it is not said that the sun brings forth fruit: because the sun works as an universal cause, and the tree as a particular cause. So now, though Jesus Christ does work in all our workings, yet He is not said to repent, or believe, or to obey: because He works as an universal cause, and you work as a particular cause. Only behold here the mirror of grace: all is of Christ, and yet all is ours; all is ours in denomination, and all is Christ's in operation; all is ours in regard of encouragement, and all is Christ's in regard of glory; all is ours in regard of reward, and all is Christ's in regard of honour. Here is grace! Here is the mystery of grace! but still all, whatsoever grace a man hath, he hath it from Jesus Christ.
—Bridges, 1600-1679.

(1016.) Is the Christian's strength in the Lord, not in himself? Surely then the Christless person must needs be a poor impotent creature, void of all strength and ability of doing anything of itself towards its own salvation. If the ship launched, rigged, and with her sails spread, cannot stir till the wind come fair and fills them, much less can the timber, that lies in the carpenter's yard, hew and frame itself into a ship. If the living tree cannot grow except the root communicates its sap, much less can a dead rotten stake in the hedge, which hath no root, live of its own accord. In a word, if a Christian, that hath his spiritual life of grace, cannot exercise this life without strength from above, then surely, one void of this new life, dead in sins and trespasses, can never be able to beget this in himself, or concur to the production of it. The state of unregeneracy is a state of impotency: "When we were without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly" (Rom. v. 6). And as Christ found the lump of mankind covered with the ruins of their lapsed estate (no more able to raise themselves from under the weight of God's wrath which lay upon them, than one buried under the rubbish of a fallen house, is to free himself of that weight without help), so the Spirit finds sinners in as helpless a condition, as unable to repent, or believe on Christ for salvation, as they were of themselves to purchase it. Confounded, therefore, for ever be the language of those sons of pride who cry up the powers of nature, as if man, with his own brick and alime of natural abilities, were able to rear such a building, whose top may reach heaven itself. "It is not of him that willeth or runneth, but God that sheweth mercy" (Rom. ix. 16).

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

5. In what spirit he approaches Christ.

(1017.) Once I went to Jesus, like a coxcomb, and gave myself fine airs, fancying if He was something, so was I; if He had merit, so had I. And I used Him as a healthy man will use a walking-staff, lean an ounce upon it or vapour with it in the air. But now He is my whole crutch, no foot can stir a step without Him. He is my all, as He ought to be, if He will become my Saviour; and He bids me cast, not some, but all my care upon Him.

My heart can have no rest unless it leans upon Him wholly, and then it feels His peace. But I am apt to leave my resting-place, and when I ramble from it, my heart will quickly brew up mischief. Some evil temper now begins to boil, or some care would fain perplex me, or some idol wants to please, or some deadness or some lightness creeps upon my spirit, and communion with my Saviour is withdrawn. When these thorns stick in my flesh, I do not try, as heretofore, to pick them out with my own needle, but carry all complaints to Jesus, casting every care upon Him. His office is to save, and mine to look for help.

If evil tempers rise, I go to Him as some demoniac; if deadness creeps upon me, I go a paralytic; if dissipation comes, I go a lunatic; if darkness clouds my peace, I go a Bartimeus; and when I pray, I always go a leper, crying, as Isaiah did, Unclean! Unclean!

—Berridge, 1716-1793.

IV. *SOME CHARACTERISTICS OF THE CHRISTIAN.*1. He has his supreme delight in God.

(1018.) It is observable that, in the courts of kings, children and ruder people are much taken with pictures and rich shows, and feed their fancies with the sight of rich hangings and fine things; but the grave statesman passeth by such things as not worthy taking notice of—his business is with the king. Thus it is that, in this world, most men stay in the outer rooms, and admire the low things of the world, and look upon them as pieces of much excellence; but the spiritually-minded man looketh over all these things that are here below—his business is with God. Let them dote upon the world that are in love with it: whom hath he in heaven but God? and there is none upon earth that he desireth besides Him.

—Spencer, 1658.

2. The glory of God is his constant aim.

(1019.) A man that goes to sea designs some certain port, whether he guides his course; in this way he meets, it may be, with storms that drive him out of his course, and sometimes directly backwards; but his design still holds, and in the pursuit thereof he applies his skill and industry to recover all his losses. So is it with a soul under the conduct of grace. Its fixed design is to live unto God, but in its course it meets with cross winds of temptations and various artifices of sin. These drive him backwards sometimes, but where grace has the rule, it will weather all these oppositions; it will "restore the soul," bring it again into order, recover it from the confusions and evil frames that it was drawn into.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

(1020.) An habitual intending God as our end, depending on His support, and subjection to His government, will carry on the soul in a sincere and constant course of godliness, though the actual most observed thoughts of the soul be fewer in number about God, than about the means that lead unto Him, and the occurrences in our way. The soul of man is very active and comprehensive, and can think of several things at once; and when it is once clear and resolved in any case, it can act according to that knowledge and resolution, without any present sensible thought; nay, while its actual, most observed thoughts are upon something else. A musician that hath an habitual skill, can keep tune and time while he is thinking of some other matter. A weaver can cast his shuttle right, and work truly, while he is thinking or talking of other things. A man can eat and drink with discretion, while he talks of other things. Some men can dictate to two or three scribes at once, upon divers subjects. A traveller can keep on his way, though he seldom thinks distinctly of his journey's end, but be thinking or discoursing most of the way upon other matters; for before he undertook his journey he thought both of the end and way, and resolved then which way to go, and that he would go through all both fair and foul, and not turn back till he saw the place. And this habitual understanding and resolution may be secretly and unobservedly active, so as to keep a man from erring, and from turning back, though at the same time the traveller's most sensible thoughts and his discourse may be upon something else. When a man is once resolved of his end, and hath laid his design, he is past deliberating of that, and therefore hath less use of his thoughts about it; but is readier to lay them out upon the means, which may be still uncertain, or may require his frequent deliberation. We have usually more thoughts and speeches by the way about our company, or our horses, or inns, or other accommodations, or the fairness or foulness of the way, or other such occurrences, than we have about the place we are going to: and yet this secret intention of our end will bring us thither.

So when a soul hath cast up his accounts, and hath renounced a worldly, sensual felicity, and hath fixed his hopes and resolutions upon heaven, and is resolved to cast himself upon Christ, and take God for his only portion, this secret, habitual resolution will do much to keep him constant in the way, though his thoughts and talk be frequently on other things: yea, when we are thinking of the creature, and feel no actual thought of God, it is yet God more than the creature that we think of; for we did beforehand look on the creature as God's work, representing Him unto the world, and as His talents, which we must employ for Him, and as every creature is related to Him: and this estimation of the creature is still habitually (and in some secret, less-perceived act) most prevalent in the soul.

Though I am not always sensibly thinking of the king when I use his coin, or obey his laws, &c., yet it is only as his coin still that I use it, and as his laws that I obey them. Weak habits cannot do their work without great carefulness of thoughts; but perfect habits will act a man with little thoughtfulness, as coming near the natural way of operation. And, indeed, the imperfection of our habitual godliness doth make our serious thoughts and vigilancy and industry to be the more necessary to us.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1021.) Objection. "But a man cannot be always thinking on God, and therefore not always intending Him as our end, and therefore cannot do all for Him."

Answer, 1. If sin disable us, that is no excuse.
2. A man may habitually intend an end, which he doth not actually think of. Yea, he may have an actual intention, which yet he doth not observe, because of other more sensible thoughts that are upon his mind. And yet his aforesaid intention may be still effectual to cause him to use the means as means.

For example, a man that hath a journey to go, is not always at the end of it, by an actual observed intention in every step of his way; but perhaps may be much of the way taken up with thoughts and discourse of other things, and yet he doth truly intend his journey's end, in every step of the way, and use every step as a means to that end. And so it is with a true Christian in the work of God, and the way to heaven.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1022.) The believer's purpose to glorify God and enjoy Him for ever, is an habitual, constant purpose. Whatever winds may drive him from the thing he purposes; yet, no wind can drive him from his purpose when once it is wrought of God in his heart. He may be drawn to sin; but he can never be drawn to a purpose of living in sin; nay, if some strong corruptions prevail against him, and lead him captive, yet he can confidently appeal to Heaven it was against his purpose, and against his prayers, and against his tears, and against his hope, that such an iniquity prevailed against him.

It is with him as it is with a mariner that sets out for such a distant haven, with a full purpose to sail straight to it; but, against his purpose, he is carried to this port and that port, which he never designed; yet still his purpose remains, and he never rests till he come to the place he designed.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(1023.) The sun-flower has no set days for following the sun and drinking in his radiance; neither has it any set days for exhaling its own perfume. It swings its censer of incense in the still air all summer long. So with the Christian. His heart is a true sun-flower, following the Great Spiritual Luminary from dawn to eventide, drooping its head in sadness when the night shadows fall, and ready to expand the folded blossom again, at the summons of the morning. He does not give God the Sabbath merely, and closes his leaves and petals to holy influences all the week. He seeks to begin it, carry it on, and end it under the consciousness of the Divine favour.

—Macduff.

3. He is fruitful and useful.

(1024.) The grateful soul of a healthy Christian is not a desert that drinks of the dews of heaven, and produces no verdure in return, but every cloud seems to drop upon it fatness and fertility; so that each season of spiritual enjoyment is followed by some instance of grace, and zeal for the glory of his Redeemer. His piety is such, that like the rose he breathes forth sweetness of his very nature; not the sickliness of a fulsome profession, but the healthy perfume of a tree the Lord has planted, and is nurturing to His own glory.

—Salter.

(1025.) Can any of us be said to be bringing forth much fruit? Not if compared with Him; not if compared with His requirements; not if compared with His example; but much if compared with ourselves and our past history—much, because it is continually getting more, our past successes being only the starting points for future success—ever increasing and progressive results. If a tree which has stood in utter barrenness since first the husbandman planted it in the soil suddenly puts forth fruit; although it may be little compared with his wishes, and compared with the fruit of the other trees in the garden, yet that scanty produce is much when compared with its own unfruitful past; and so when a soul which has long been standing as a cumberer of the ground suddenly brings forth fruit unto holiness, that fruit may be little compared with the Master's requirements and desires—little compared with the abundant returns which other and saintlier spirits yield, yet it is much when compared with its profitless past, and it contains the pledge of more and more, in an increasing ratio, through the coming years.

—J. W. Boulding.

4. He resembles Christ.

(1026.) If we examine a growing vine very minutely and attentively, we shall be struck with the remarkable resemblance which exists between all its parts. They all seem to be framed after the same pattern, and to be mere repetitions of each other. Even in the minor part of the tree—the leaf, the flower, the fruit, the seed, we find the same wonderful general likeness. This mutual correspondence, however, exists in a perfect state only when the tree is fully and fairly developed. It is modified by a great variety of circumstances, natural and artificial. When the tree is placed in a thick crowded plantation, pressed by others on every side, and prevented from assuming its natural form and proportions; when it grows in poor and unsuitable soil; when it has not free access to the air and light of heaven, it will not exhibit this feature of mutual resemblance between all its parts so distinctly. Some parts will be stunted, others overgrown, and the harmony and order of the whole will be deranged, but the typical correspondence will still, to some extent, be retained. Applying this quality of the vine and its branches to Christ and His people, we find that the same remarkable resemblance exists between them also. Each Christian bears at every stage of growth some likeness to Christ, to whom he is united by a living faith. In the indistinct—the unformed lines, sketched in the character of the weakest believer, there are some traces of what will be hereafter a full portrait of the altogether lovely One, though as yet rude and comparatively unattractive. The vital change which he has undergone is complete in nothing, but it has begun in all the parts of his nature. The leaven of regeneration is sending its transforming power, silently and slowly perhaps, but surely, throughout his whole being. The image in which he was created, and to which he is redeemed, is more and more restored in the soul. Yes! each believer is a type or miniature more or less true and perfect of the Divine original; and all believers have a general family likeness; they have features of resemblance to each other and to Christ which cannot be mistaken or concealed, and which prove, beyond the possibility of doubt, their common origin and mutual relationship. They are not, like the image which Nebuchadnezzar saw in a dream, composed of the most heterogeneous materials; its head of fine gold, its breast and its arms of silver, its belly and its thighs of brass, its legs of iron, and its feet part of iron and part of clay. They are like the vine and its branches, whose every part is typical of the whole.

—Macmillan.

(1027.) The character of Christ, as He lived upon earth, is like a perfect many-sided crystal. Whichever way you look at it, it is without flaw. Whichever way you turn it, some new beauty of colour is reflected from the rays of light shining through it. The character of the Christian is like a crystal too, but a small one, full of cracks and flaws, which break up and disfigure the brilliant gleams reflected from the sunlight. The Christian must be like Christ, or he is nothing, but it is a likeness with a vast distance between—the likeness of an infant to the strong man; the likeness of a feeble sapling to the full-grown giant oak.

—Hooper.

(1028.) You are to accept as a Christian every one whose life and disposition are Christ-like, no matter how heretical the denomination may be to which he belongs. Wherever you find faith, and righteousness, and love, and joy in the Holy Ghost, you are to look upon them as the stamped coin of Christ's kingdom, and as a legal tender from God to you.

—H. W. Beecher.

5. He has his "conversation in heaven."

(1029.) The eyes of the world see no farther than this life, as mine see no farther than this wall when the church door is shut. The eyes of the Christian see deep into eternity.

—Flannery.

(1030.) "Let your conversation"—your daily life—"be"—where? "in heaven." To meet this requirement is distinctly set forth as the mark of the truly regenerate soul. "They that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh, but they that are after the spirit"—who have the spiritual mind, who are born of God—they "mind heavenly things;" they live in their mind in heaven. It is not so hard as to be unreasonable; it is clearly what is required of us, and it is not unreasonable.

Just consider for a moment. Suppose that there were somewhere a land beyond the seas to which we were destined to emigrate, we know not how soon; it may be next year, it may be this year, it may be next week, it may be to-morrow. It is a fairer land than this, a sunnier clime, peopled by a purer, holier, happier race than surrounds us here. If we were destined—we know not how soon—for emigration to that land, should we not be thinking about it often and much? Should we not be living in the anticipation of it? Should we not be feeling already that it was our land; that it was our home? Would not our thoughts and our hopes be there as in our home?

—David Thomas, B.A., 1811-1875.

V. SOME OF HIS DUTIES.

1. He should be single in his aim.

(1031.) When Christians have two aims they are like two rivers which flow near the city of Geneva, the Arve and the Rhone. The Rhone comes flowing along a beautiful blue—a blue which painters give to Italian skies, and to the rivers of Switzerland. It is no exaggeration, they are as blue as they are painted. The Arve comes down from the glacier, a chalky, dirty white. I stood sometime ago at the place these two rivers join. It was not long before the Arve had quenched the Rhone; all that beautiful blue had fled away and nothing but white was seen. "Evil communications corrupt good manners." If your life be made up of two streams, worldliness running in like the Arve, and you hope to have spirituality running in like the blue Rhone, you will soon be mistaken.

—Spurgeon.

2. He should be blameless in his life.

(1032.) The eclipses of the sun are seldom without witnesses. If you take yourselves to be the light of the Church, you may well expect that men's eyes should be upon you. If other men may sin without observation, so cannot you.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1033.) In the opening verse of chapter vii. (Eccles. vii. 1.) Solomon had emphatically said that a good name is better than precious ointment. It may have been this very comparison which afterwards suggested the striking and most important thought to which expression is given, in the outset of the passage at present before us (i.e., Eccles. x. 1). The very sweetness of a precious ointment—the very exquisiteness and delicacy of its odour—exposes it to be the more easily injured. It may be so tainted by the corruption of even a dead fly, as to have its perfumes spoiled. By so seemingly trifling a cause, may all the cost and skill bestowed on it by the apothecary be rendered of no avail. And how true a picture does this illustration exhibit of the fatal injury which a little folly is sure to inflict upon the good name of the man who is held in reputation for wisdom and honour. Indiscretions that would never be noticed in men of inferior character, are ruinous to him. Nor is it difficult to understand how this result should arise. On a soiled garment, even a fresh stain makes no very conspicuous mark; but a spot catches the eye at once on a snow-white robe.

—Buchanan.

3. He should make the Word of God the rule of his life.

(1034.) Be sure to keep thy eye on the right rule thou art to walk by. Every calling hath a rule to go by, peculiar to itself, which requires some study to get an insight into. without which a man will but bungle in his work. No calling hath such a sure rule and perfect law to go by as the Christians; therefore in earthly professions and worldly callings, men vary in their way and method, though of the same trade, because there is no such perfect rule, but another may super-add to it. But the Christian hath one standing rule, the Word of God, "able to make the man of God perfect"; now he that would excel in the power of holiness must study this. The physician consults with his Galen; the lawyer with his Littleton; and the philosopher with his Aristotle; the masters of these arts. How much more should the Christian with the Word, so as to be determined by that, and drawn by that, more than by a whole team of arguments from men? —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

4. He must be crucified to, and separate from, the world.

(1035.) Our crucifying of or to the world, requireth not any secession from the world, nor a withdrawing ourselves from the society of men, nor the casting away the property of the necessities which we possess. It is an easier thing to throw away our Master's talents, than faithfully to improve them. The Papists glory in the holiness of their Church, because they have many among them that have vowed never to marry, and have no property, and have separated themselves into a monastical society; a high commendation to their Church, when men must be sainted with them, if they will do no mischief, though they make themselves useless to the rest of the world. The servant that hid his talent in a napkin was condemned by Christ as wicked and slothful; and shall he be commended by us for being extraordinarily devout? Will you reward that servant that will lock up himself in his chamber, or hide his head in a hole, when he should be busy at your work? Or will you reward that soldier that will withdraw from the army into a corner, when he should be fighting? The world swarms on every side with multitudes of ignorant and impenitent sinners, whose miserable condition crieth loud for some relief, to all that are any way able to relieve them. And these religious monks make haste from among them, and leave them to themselves to sink or swim, and they think this cruelty to be the top of piety. Unworthy is that man to live on the earth, that liveth only to himself, and communicateth not the gifts of God to others. And yet do these idle, unprofitable drones esteem their course the life of perfection. When we must charge through the thickest of our enemies, and bear all the unthankful requitals of the world, and undergo their scorn and persecutions, these wary soldiers can look to their slain, and get out of the reach of such encounters; and when they have done, imagine that they have got the victory. To live to ourselves, were it never so spiritually, is far unlike the life of a Christian; a good man is a common good, and compassionate to the miserable, and desirous to bring others to the participation of his felicity. To withdraw from the world to do God service, is to get out of the vineyard or shop that we may do our Master's work.

(1036.) If we are crucified to the world, our delight in it is crucified. It seemeth not to us a matter of such worth, as to be fit for our delight. Children are glad of toys, which a wise man hath no pleasure in. To have too sweet contentful thoughts in the creature, and to apprehend it as our good, and to be rejoiced in it, is a sign that so far we are not crucified to it. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1037.) A man that is dead to the world will not hate or be much displeased with those that hinder him from the riches, or honours, or pleasures of the world. He makes no great matter of it, and taketh it for no great hurt or loss. And therefore rather than study revenge, he can patiently bear it, when they have taken away his coat, if they take away his cloak also. He doth not swell with malice against them that stand in the way of his advancement, or hinder his rising or riches in the world. He will not envy the precedence of others, or seek the disgrace or ruin of them that keep him low. No more than a wise man will hate or seek to be revenged of him that would hinder him from climbing up to the top of a steeple, or that will take a stone or a bush of thorns out of his way.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1038.) When we are crucified to the world, our expectations of good from the world are crucified. Before we looked for much from it, we thought if we had this pleasure, or that honour; if we had such lands, buildings, friends, or provision, then we were well, or at least much better than now we are! Oh, how good did we think that these were for us! And therefore we still lived in hope of more. But when we are crucified to the world, we give up these hopes. We see then that we are deceived. We did but hope for nourishment from a stone. The breasts are dry which we thought would have refreshed and satisfied us. When we see that the world is an empty thing, a mask, a picture, a dream, a shadow, we turn away from it, and look no more after it, but look for content in something else. As a child that seeth a painted apple may be eager of it till he try that it is savourless, and then he careth for it no more. Or if a beautiful crab deceive him, when he hath set his teeth in it, he casteth it away; so when a Christian findeth the folly of his former expectations, and tasteth the vexations of the creature which he was so greedy of, and withal is acquainted by a lively faith, where he may be better, away go all his expectations from the world; and he promiseth himself no more content or satisfaction in it.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1039.) A person defending believers associating with worldly society said believers are called to be the salt of the earth. Yes, said M. d'Alet, and yet if salt be cast into the ocean from which it was originally drawn, it will melt away and vanish entirely.

(1040.) A fisherman informs us that the trout always exhibits the colour of the water in which it lives. In like manner professed believers reflect faithfully the quality of the influences under which they live. He that is immersed in the stagnant waters of questionable indulgences and of a life fashioned by the prevailing customs around him, will in faded tints betray the unfavourable, shameful conditions under which he is working out the problem of life.

(1041.) As Christians are to think of living for awhile in the world, it is not unreasonable for them to be affected with its occurrences and changes. Some plead for a kind of abstracted and sublimated devotion, which the circumstances they are placed in by their Creator render equally impracticable and absurd. They are never to notice the affairs of government, or the measures of administration; war, or peace; liberty, or slavery; plenty, or scarcity; all is to be equally indifferent to them: they are to leave these carnal and worldly things to others. But have they not bodies? Have they not families? Is religion founded on the ruins of humanity? When a man becomes a Christian, does he cease to be a member of civil society? Allowing that he be not the owner of the ship, but only a passenger in it, has he nothing to awaken his concern in the voyage? If he be only a traveller towards a better country, is he to be told, that because he is at an inn which he is soon to leave, it should not excite any emotion in him, whether it be invaded by robbers, or consumed by flames before the morning? "In the peace thereof ye shall have peace;" and are not Christians to "provide things honest in the sight of all men?" Are they to detach themselves while here from the interests of their fellow-creatures; or to "rejoice with them that rejoice, and weep with them that weep?" Is not religion variously affected by public transactions? Can a Christian, for instance, be indifferent to the cause of freedom, even on a pious principle? Does not civil liberty necessarily include religious? and is it not necessary to the exertions of ministers and the spreading of the gospel?
—Jay.

5. He must make an open profession of religion.

(1042.) Sometime ago when in a mine, looking through its dark corridors, I every now and then saw the glimmer of a moving lamp, and I could track it all through the mine. The reason was that the mine carried it on his hat,—it was a part of himself, and it showed where he went. I said,—Would that in this dark world every miner of the Master carried his lamp to show where he was!
—Cuyler.

6. He must not fear to be singular.

(1043.) He is unworthy of heaven that will not live well without company, nor do good but by example, nor move a step before his neighbours. Cowards stand still looking who should go first; and they are mere jades that will not go except the way be led them. He was a brave and bold Israelite that first did set his foot into the channel of the sea, leading the rest all along that moist and uncouth walk: he is a soldier of courage that first mounts the breach.

—Adams, 1654.

(1044.) Conscious that it is only sovereign grace which makes them differ from others, none are less likely to make a parade of their good works than God's people. Indeed, I have known some of these run into the opposite extreme—forgetting that the light which flashes over the sea from lighthouse-towers, on rugged headland or sunken rock, is not kindled to be hid, but seen. A candle, as our Lord says, is set on a candlestick, not under a bushel, that it may light the house; and, however singular our conduct may appear to the world, or whatever occasion it may afford scoffers to sneer, the Christian should never allow himself to be deterred from obeying his Master's behests, following in his Leader's steps, and so making His light to shine that, not he, but His Father in heaven, may be glorified.
—Guthrie.

7. He must not be afraid of ridicule.

(1045.) Religion is no ignominious, disgraceful thing. Satan labours to cast all the odium and reproach upon it that he can; that it is devout frenzy, folly in grain; "As for this sect, we know that it is everywhere spoken against." But wise men measure things by the end; what is the end of a religious life? It ends in a kingdom. Would a prince regard the flightings of a few fanatics when he is going to be crowned? You who are beginners, bind their reproaches as a crown about your head, despise their censures as much as their praise; a kingdom is a-coming.
—Watson, 1696.

8. He must not be daunted by the difficulties of the Christian life.

(1046.) There was never a good thing easily come by. The heathen man could say, "God sells knowledge for sweat;" and so He doth honour for jeopardy. Never any man hath got either wealth or learning with ease. Therefore the greatest good must needs be most difficult. How shall I hope to get Christ if I take no pains for Him? And if, in all other things, the difficulty of obtaining whets the mind so much the more to seek, why should it in this alone daunt me? I will not care what I do, what I suffer, so I may win Christ. If men can endure such cutting, such lancing, and searing of their bodies, to protract a miserable life yet awhile longer, what pain should I refuse for eternity?

9. He should be interested in the diffusion of the Gospel.

(1047.) A Christian ought to rejoice when he hears of the Gospel's spread, and he ought to grieve when he hears of obstructions to its progress. In other words, if we are Christians, we shall have the same interest in the Gospel that a politician has in the politics and progress of the party he belongs to. If you watch a politician, he says, I move under a certain banner; I am associated with an existing or a deposed prime minister, and I rejoice that such a one has been elected there, and such a one rejected here. In short, a thorough politician is full of his party. He opens the paper the first thing in the morning, in order to see what his party has gained or lost. His whole heart is in the party. Let us borrow a leaf from his book; let our chief thoughts and affections be in that cause which knows no party, and seeks no partisanship.

—Cumming.

10. He must reflect the Divine character.

(1048.) Believers are mirrors to reflect the glory of God. A mirror, if placed opposite to a luminous object, will reflect its rays, and show distinctly its image. Such is the Christian man under the Gospel. Looking steadily to God, and beholding Him face to face, there is nothing to shut out the rays of His glory, like beams of light, from shining upon them. And now they reflect His light in the imitation of His perfections, and become as so many mirrors, where His image, which they have contemplated in the Gospel, shines forth to the glory of their God.
—Salter.

11. He must seek to diffuse happiness around him.

(1049.) Go into the worst street in New York, where filth and vice and corruption abound, and where there is the crying of children, and the barking of dogs, and the quarrelling of men and women, and let a band of music come in at one end and march through, playing as they march, and the sound of the music will put an end to the crying and barking and quarrelling, and all will stand for the moment intent; and when the band has swept out, and the music has died away on the air, they will take a new breath, and will have to start new quarrels. They cannot weld the old ones on to the new ones.

Now, Christian men ought to carry themselves so that their presence shall be like that of a band of music. They ought to be so full of Christian graces, so full of the Holy Ghost, so full of all that makes manhood beautiful, and that irradiates life with hope and cheer, so full of sweetness, and patience, and temperance, and forbearance, so full of the spirit of honouring each other, and preferring one another, and bearing each the other's burdens, so full of godliness, that all the city shall stand still and hear these musicians of God play. And when they go away, the impression which they leave behind them should be such that all who have seen them and heard them sing shall long to see them and hear them sing again. Oh, if Christian men were only keyed to the command, Thou shalt love God with all thy heart and mind and soul, and thy fellow-men as thyself; if every man loved every other man as a mother loves her babe to whom she gives days and nights, her whole time, her strength, her very life; if every man loved his neighbour as himself; if love abounded in every man, according to the idea of the apostle, what a different conception there would be of Christian life!
—Brecher.

(1050.) Blessed is every man who carries himself as the mignonette carries itself, homely and small, but with more fragrance than it can keep, filling the air with sweetness, and rejoicing every man who passes by. A Christian man, though he be humble and inconspicuous, like the mignonette, should be full of the fragrance of love, and gentleness, and peace. Or, if he be more aspiring, let him be as the honey-suckle, that never climbs so high that it forgets to blossom, and never blossoms so high that it cannot send down fragrance in showers to the low-lying creatures beneath it. Whether you be high or low, let there be enough of the influence of God shed abroad in your heart for you and for those round about you. So shall you be children of your Father which is in heaven.

—Becher.

12. He must live in a state of constant preparedness for death.

(1051.) A Christian must stand in a posture to receive every message which God shall send. He must be so prepared, as to be like one who is called to set off on a sudden journey, and has nothing to do but to set out at a moment's notice; or like a merchant who has goods to send abroad, and has them all packed up and in readiness for the first vessel that is to sail.
—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(1052.) We should always stand "with our lamps burning, and our loins girt." A Christian should always be as a ship that has taken in its lading, and is prepared and furnished with all manner of tackling, ready to sail, only expecting the good winds to carry him out of the haven. So should we be ready to set sail for the ocean of eternity, and stand at heaven's gate, be in a perpetual exercise of faith and love, and be fitly prepared to meet our Saviour.
—Salter.

VI. HIS DISCOURAGEMENTS.

(1053.) The state of the most advanced Christians is often very unsatisfactory. The affections that, true as the needle to the pole, should point steadily to heaven, go wheeling about like a weather vane that shifts with shifting winds. Sinful thoughts and bad desires spring up, thick as weeds in showery weather—faster than we can cut them down; and every attempt to keep the heart pure, aoly, heavenly, ends in miserable failure—extorting the question, "Who is sufficient for these things?" It is disheartening. We go into our gardens, and see the flowers growing into beauty by sunny day and silent night; week by week of autumn the fields around us assume a more golden tint, ripening for the harvest; and year by year, childhood in our homes rises into youth, and youth into bearded manhood;—but our poor souls seem standing still. There is no appreciable progress; and we begin to ask, Are we never to grow fit for heaven? Is our hope of it but a pious dream, a beautiful delusion? Daily called to contend with temptation, the battle often goes against us; in these passions, and tempers, and old habits, the sons of Zeruiah are too strong for us. Not that we do not fight. That startling cry, The Philistines are on thee, Samson! rouses us; we make some little fight; but too often resisting only to be conquered, we are ready to give up the struggle—saying, It is useless; and like Saul in Gilboa's battle, throw away sword and shield. We would; but that, cheered by a voice from above, and sustained by hope in God's grace and mercy, we can turn to our souls to say, Why art thou cast down, my soul; why is my spirit disquieted within me?—rise; resume thy arms; renew the combat; never surrender! "Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God."
—Guthrie.

VII. HIS IMPERFECTIONS.

(1054.) How often do we see a tree well covered with the early shoots and young leaves, but yet with many of last year's dead leaves still hanging on to the branches, intermixed with the latest and best of the summer growth, as if to remind one that even this tree, fresh in the glory of its summer clothing, was but a little while ago unsightly with dead and useless leaves. Nor will the tree rid itself of these till the full tide of sap has filled the branches with full-grown verdure, when the old leaves will drop to the earth, and no longer be cumbersome.

The Christian, like the tree, bears fresh leaves of a new heart, and even the good fruit of a godly life, and seems at first to be all but faultless; but how often, on nearer view, do evil ways, bad habits, and wicked passions, come to view and disfigure the beauty of the Christian man or woman, so that companions are reminded of the late winter of an unrenewed life, of the remainders of evil old leaves not yet all stripped off or blown away by the breath of the Divine chastisement. Nor will the Christian stand in perfect clothing, and without any evil thing, till the Divine influence has permeated every part of the soul, and driven from it the remaining traces of the old Adam.
—Austen, 1656.

(1055.) The present is a mixed condition during which the believer feels like a sick man under his recovery, thankful for his deliverance and life; the fears of death have passed away, the poison of disease no longer rages within him; disease has no longer its fatal grasp on its victim, he has shaken it off, but he is very much enfeebled by it—he finds himself still a very weak creature; alas! he is feeling the sad remains of sin, his former complaint, so that he "cannot do the things that he would;" he cannot work as he would, nor enjoy himself as he would; he must still be attentive to the prescriptions of his Heavenly Physician, and must wait the day of perfect restoration.
—Salter.

(1056.) How truly may it be said to the most experienced, aged, honoured Christian, as the Lord said to Joshua, "Thou art old and well-stricken in years, and yet there is much land to be possessed." Sin still has more or less power over you, and it should have none; your corruptions are wounded, dying of mortal wounds, but they are not yet dead; your affections are set on heaven, yet how much are they still entangled with earthly things; your heart, like the needle of a sailor's compass to the Pole, points to Christ, but how easily is it disturbed, how tremblingly and unsteadily does it often point to Him; your spirit has wings, but how short are its flights, and how often, like a half-fledged eaglet, has it to seek the nest, and come back to rest on the Rock of Ages; your soul is a garden in which, when north and south winds blow to call out its spices, Christ delights to walk, but with many a beautiful flower how many vile weeds are there—ready to spring up, and fill 'o keep down—requiring constant care and watching.
—Guthrie.

VIII. HIS CORRUPTIONS.

(1057.) In material fruit trees the sour nature of the wild plants that are grafted upon does still continue in the stock, or root, and is not taken away by ingrafting, it is only restrained and kept under by the graft. The nature of the graft is predominant in the tree, and overrules in bringing forth fruits according to its own kind (although with some small degree of the sour nature of the stock mixed with it), and the two natures of the graft and stock continue mixed together as long as the tree lives.

This is another similitude of the state of mystical fruit trees, and shadows forth unto us this proposition : That corrupt nature abides in believers as long as they live, and is but in part subdued by grace.

We find by experience that after a plant is engrafted, both the graft and the stock will shoot forth, and if the graft grow vigorously and strongly, then the shoots of the stock are but weak, but if the shoots of the stock break out strongly, then the graft grows but weakly, therefore, the husbandman takes pains often to cut off the shoots that grow upon the stock, so that the graft may grow the better.

This is another similitude of the state of mystical fruit trees, and shadows forth unto us this proposition : That while the spiritual part in us acts and grows strongly, the fleshly part acts but weakly ; so also, if the flesh be strong, the spirit is weak.

This should teach us often to take notice of the actings of our spirits, whether the stock or the graft bud the faster. If we were watchful daily, and took pains with our spirits to keep them up in a spiritual frame in communion with God, then (by degrees) the shoots and growths of the spiritual part would become strong, and the shoots of the flesh weak and feeble. Oh, that this were well weighed and practised by Christians ! It is the very life, spirit, and power of godliness, thus to walk with God, in communion with Him : hereby we are enabled to do, and suffer all things for God, and to resist, and keep under the flesh and all enemies ; this is the life of our life, and heaven upon earth.

—Austen, 1656.

(1058.) When Venice was in the hands of the Austrians, those alien tyrants swarmed in every quarter ; but the Venetians hated them to the last degree, and showed their enmity upon all occasions. When the Austrian officers sat down at any of the tables in the square of St. Mark, where the Venetians delight on summer evenings to eat their ices and drink their coffee, the company would immediately rise and retire, showing by their withdrawal that they abhorred their oppressors. After this fashion will every true Christian treat his inbred sins ; he will not be happy under their power, nor tolerate their dominion, nor show them favour. If he cannot expel them, he will not indulge them.

—Spurgeon.

IX. HIS CONFLICTS.

(1059.) A child has all the members of a perfect man ; yet are they in a very feeble and imperfect state : and it is by the exercise of his powers that he has those powers strengthened and enlarged. And thus it is with every child of God. He is born a babe, and though every gracious principle exists within him, he is so feeble as scarcely to be able to withstand temptation, or to exercise his powers to any great extent. But, through the remains of sin within him he is led to frequent conflicts with it : by exercise his powers are increased ; and by progressive increase, they are perfected. Thus, from "a babe," he grows up to maturer age and stature, and becomes "a young man ;" and from "a young man," "a father."

—Simeon.

(1060.) The conflicts of the Christian, "the flesh lusting against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh," continue to the end of life, and may be compared to a conflagration which is opposed by engines where the supply of water is scarcely equal to the demand, and not incessantly followed up. Sometimes the fire yields to the well-directed stream, and at other times it breaks forth with renewed fury, and seems to defy the efforts of those who would arrest its progress.

—Salter.

(1061.) The spirit and the flesh, grace and nature, heavenly and earthly influences, are sometimes so fairly balanced, that like a ship with wind and tide acting on her with equal power, but in opposite directions, the believer makes no progress in the divine life. He loses headway. He does not become worse, but he grows no better ; and it is all he can do to hold his own. Sometimes, indeed, he loses ground ; falling into old sins. Temptation comes like a roaring sea squall, and finding him asleep at his post drives him backward on his course ; and further now from heaven than once he was, he has to pray, Heal my backsliding, renew me graciously, love me freely. For Thy name's sake, O Lord, pardon mine iniquity, for it is great.

—Guthrie.

(1062.) The aim of the true Christian is to have his Saviour always before his eyes as a pattern for imitation. His course is beset with difficulties ; hindrances and disappointments await him at every turn. In the New Testament the Christian's career is uniformly represented as one of continual struggle. St. Paul compares him to one who contends in the athletic games of the Greeks—to a soldier engaged in grim combat with an unsparing foe. It is, indeed, encouraging to the living wayfaring follower of Christ to read these descriptions of the saint's career in the time of the apostles, because it shows him that the troubles which he is enduring are only the troubles which are incidental to the Christian brotherhood in all time. But, on the other hand, the Scriptural view of the Christian's career is not a little saddening, because it confirms him in the humiliating conviction, which he has been taught by his own experience, that he cannot attain to anything like a state of absolute purity and sinlessness, of perfect obedience to the will of God. The Christian is, in truth, like a traveller who wishes to reach before sunset some high mountain-top. He toils painfully on. He gets to one peak after another. At each eminence he flatters himself that he is close to his journey's end. But no sooner does he pause to look forward once more than he beholds the coveted summit still far off in the distance ; and when night sets in he sees the mountain-top still towering high up unreachd. So the Christian overcomes one fault after another, one sin after another. He persuades himself at each struggle that, this one evil habit vanquished, he shall have reached that perfection at which he is aiming, and that the remainder of his course will be smooth and easy. But he finds that no sooner is one sin conquered than another springs up. So he passes his whole life, and death finds him still engaged in the struggle. Perfection is, indeed, not for man. Even the strictest followers of George Fox, in their strictest days, although they asserted that perfection was possible, contradicted their own statement by explaining that perfection is progressive. Still, under every disappointment, the perfect Saviour must ever be the model of the imperfect Christian, because he knows that though he cannot reach the standard set by Christ, yet, by constantly striving towards it, he shall reach a higher degree of holiness and purity than he would have been able to attain had he imitated anything short of perfection. The true painter is never content to copy from other men's pictures. He goes direct to Nature. He knows that he can never catch the living hues of his great model; but he also knows that he should fall immeasurably lower in his heart if he were satisfied to imitate other painters' productions. Let not the Christian despair because he cannot get rid altogether of his sinfulness. We are not meant to get rid altogether of our sinfulness. Earth is not heaven. It is a place of pilgrimage and warfare and struggle.

—Hooper.

X. HIS CONSOLATIONS.

1. He is sure of all needful things.

(1063.) "Seek first the kingdom of heaven, and these things shall be added unto you." That is, as you need them. He casts them into the other (more grand blessings) as a tradesman would do thread and paper, or a skein of silk, unto a parcel of rich commodities that a customer buys of him.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1064.) Because he is a king's son, he shall have an education suited to his character and prospects.

—Cecil, 1743-1810.

2. It doth not yet appear what he shall be.

(1065.) Our children that lie in the cradle are ours, and bear in them those lines which shall yet make them to appear, the boy like the father, and the daughter like the mother; and we are God's, growing up, we trust, into the lineaments which shall make us like unto Him. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be."

—Becker.

3. Where sin abounds, there grace shall much more abound.

(1066.) When the darkness of the night falleth, it covereth the whole world, dimmeth the colour and fashion of all creatures, feareth and discomforteth them, yet is it not of such power as to quench the least light in the world. For the darker the night is, the clearer do the stars shine; yea, the least light of a candle withstandeth the whole night, and giveth light round about in the midst of darkness. A little spark also of a coal cannot the darkness cover, much less is it able to quench it. Now is God the true, everlasting, and heavenly light. Through faith doth God dwell in our hearts, and Christ's disciples are called the lights of the world. Hereout followeth it, that though the prince of spiritual darkness thrust in with his noisome poison and plagues, yet he can neither apprehend nor destroy any faithful man or woman, but shall be smitten back and driven away perforce.

A little vein of water breaketh forth out of the ground sometime scarce a finger big; and when the water is gathered into a ditch or pond, it springeth nevertheless. And though the water become heavy of certain hundredweight, and move about the fountain, yet can it not drive back the fountain, but it driveth the whole weight of the water backward and forward, and springeth still continually, till the ditch be so full that it go over. And if the other water be foul and troubled, it cannot mingle itself among the fresh clear water of the fountain; but the same remaineth pure and fair, till in time it come far from the head spring.

Now is God the only plentiful Fountain of all life, and the faithful are very flowing wells. For Christ saith, "Whoso believeth on Me out of his body, as saith the Scripture, shall flow streams of water of life," which words He spake of the Spirit, that they which believe on Him should receive. Thus no mischance of this world can spoil any faithful man of his comfort and life; forasmuch as God, the Eternal Well-Spring of life, dwelleth and floweth in his heart, and driveth all noisome things far away from it. —Wermulerus, 1551.

(1067.) Being employed in the garden, I was affected to see how much the weeds came on faster than the herbs and plants. Just so do corruptions thrive and grow in my soul. Yet this comforts me—the herbs, most of them, are better rooted than the weeds; they are not so easily pulled up. The good part shall not be taken away. If I am growing on the root Christ, no man shall ever be able to pull me thence—"kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation."

—Salter.

(1068.) In Scotland last year, while steaming up one of the great lochs, close by the shore I saw a great bed of water-lilies near the bank, which were discoloured with dust from the road running just above them; all their beauty was spoiled. As the steamer passed, a great wave rolled over the lilies, entirely submerging them, and I exclaimed, "Oh, they are all broken in pieces!" but as the wave rolled back, the lilies burst again upon my view, riding gracefully upon the waters, radiant with beauty and white as the driven snow. The only effect of the wave had been to wash away the dust and bring them out in their virgin purity. So with the Christian soul sealed by God. It cannot be destroyed, but the dust of sin that covers it will all be washed away, and it will be made fit to stand and live in God's presence.

—Armitage.

4. Ultimately he shall be entirely like Christ.

(1069.) "I shall be satisfied," &c. The likeness, "after the image of him that created him," must be restored, that man may be once more "satisfied." At present the believer is like the marble in the hands of the sculptor, but though day by day he may give fresh touches, and work the marble into greater emulation of the original, the resemblance will be far from complete until death. Each fresh degree of likeness is a fresh advance towards satisfaction. It must then be that when every feature is moulded into similitude, when all traces of feebleness and depravity are swept away for ever, the statue breathes, and the picture burns with Deity: it must be that then we "shall be filled." We shall look on the descending Mediator, and, as though the ardent gaze drew down celestial fire, we shall seem instantly to pass through the Refiner's furnace, and leaving behind all the dishonour of the grave, and all the dross of corruptible humanity, spring upwards, an ethereal, rapid, glowing thing, Christ's image, extracted by Christ's lustres.

—Mehill, 1798-1871.

(1070.) An artist delights in his own work, and would not leave one single flaw or defect in it designedly (Phil. i. 6). Oh, then look upon me, Thou wise Creator ! Knowing Thou canst do no less than a human artist, remove these impediments which discredit Thy work. Thou canst bring out of darkness light, and I believe Thy work shall be finished at last, and glorify the name of its Maker (1 Pet. v. 10).

—Salter.

(1071.) Even in the true beginnings of grace, there is little appearance of coming glory : it is there, all there ; but only as the acorn implies the great boughs and green leaves. For the root of the matter may be where much natural evil lingers : and even God's grace often leaves, to the last, much that is unamiable, in the case of some who were not amiable from the first : much that is foolish, in the case of very sincere believers who were fools to begin with : much that is bitter, unfair, uncharitable, and even dishonest, in human beings with true zeal for what they honestly think Christ's cause : and how different all these people will need to be when they enter heaven. You cannot suppose a soul in heaven so bulky, that no one would ever speak to it who could help it : but it is unquestionable that there are good Christians in the world, to whom no one would speak if they could help. And even the rare believer who adds the beauty of saintly holiness to a beautiful amiability of nature and to all the graces of the finest culture, will yet sometimes show that the old man is not quite crucified : break out into thoughts, words, doings, that would not do in heaven. But though the best believer is not now holy enough for the home above, you cannot say anything from that, He will be so. "The souls of believers are at their death," if never before, "made perfect in holiness."

And there are many analogies to the great regenerating and sanctifying change. Look at an acrid apple : does that look like the peach which cultivation can bring it to ? Look in the factory at a mass of rotten flax : is that anything like the finest of man's textile fabrics that it may be made into ? Look at a mass of rusty iron : is there any promise there of the delicate mechanism of a watch's wheels and springs ?

And so, in the penitent soul, bowed down on account of sin, trembling in the presence of God who hates sin, there is little promise of the glorified spirit, perfect in holiness, and desiring no greater happiness than to be for ever with the Lord. In the sharp, white face of the dying believer—or in the mouldering clay, there is little promise of the spiritual body raised incorruptible and immortal. But in the proud self-righteous persecutor of the Church, there was just as little of the great apostle of the Gentiles. In the traitor that profanely denied his Master there was little promise of the fearless St. Peter, who, when his day of martyrdom came, was allowed the choice of the manner of his death ; and chose the cruellest he could think of, that he might fare worse than his Lord. In the wretched blasphemer of the African coast there was no appearance of the zealous minister of Christ, John Newton ; and in the wild cursing tinker of Bedford no promise that he, in God's good time, should write that most familiar volume, which sets out with a charm so wonderful the progress of the soul in its pilgrimage towards God.

But these are cases which time has cleared up, and that even we now see the end of ; and it touches ourselves more nearly, to think that He who in other days saw how much more was to be made than appeared at first, of St. Paul, St. Peter, Newton, Bunyan, and multitudes more, sees yet the first promise of the happy saint in many a soul where the eye of man could make out very little appearance of it now. In the narrow-minded ignorant believer now, we can see no trace of the untrammelled understanding of the spirit set free from prejudice and error ; and in the bitter partisan sectary, not entirely careful to speak the truth of those who differ from him, in whom yet is found, though sorely overgrown with misapprehensions and ill-feeling, the root of the matter, we can see little promise of that perfected love, in which he will yet spend eternity with those whom here, Pharisee-like, he held at arm's length, and regarded only as rivals and opponents. But He who knows what is in man, and what the Blessed Spirit can make of man, can discern even now, looking over the harvest-field which is the world, true grace growing under the most unpromising forms ; and ripening towards glorious developments never suspected here.

—Boyd.

XI. HIS RENEWAL IN THE DIVINE IMAGE.

(1072.) The restoration of God's image rather resembles the growing likeness to its beautiful original in the canvas of the artist. At first the outline, and slowly the form and features of the human face divine appear, though with some confusion ; gradually they rise to more distinctness and precision, and the likeness stands confessed. So the Divine Artist, the Holy Spirit, restores the deformed and misshapen soul, and successively imparts to it every moral beauty and perfection of God ; and the soul is once more confessedly like God "in knowledge, in righteousness, and true holiness."
—Salter.

XII. HIS DIGNITY AND WEALTH.

(1073.) The difference between the egg and the bird, the acorn and the oak, is not near so great as the difference between the kingdom of grace and of glory. And yet a man that had never seen or known the production of such creatures would little believe, if you should show him an acorn, that that would come to be an oak. And it is no marvel if a carnal heart will not believe that the weak, despised graces of the saints do tend to such an inconceivable glory.
—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1074.) The very relation of a godly man to his everlasting glory is an honour ten thousand times surpassing the honour of all the kingdoms of the world. If you did but know that one of your poor neighbours should certainly be a king, would you not presently honour him, even in his rags ? You may know that the saints shall reign with Christ, as sure as if an angel from heaven had told you so, and more ; and therefore how should a saint be honoured ? If God had but legibly marked out some among you for salvation, and written in their foreheads, "This man shall be saved," would not all the parish reverence that man ? Why, a heavenly mind and the love of God, self-denial and holy obedience, are heaven-marks infallible, as true as the Gospel, and written by the same hand as the Gospel was—I mean by the Spirit of God Himself.
—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1075.) In the present state, the least part of a saint's worth is visible. As the earth is fruitful in plants and flowers, but its riches are in mines of precious metal, and the veins of marble hidden in its bosom, true grace appears in sensible actions, but its glory is within. The sincerity of aims, the purity of affection, the impresses of the Spirit on the heart, the interior beauties of holiness, are only seen by God. Besides, such is the humility of eminent saints, that the more they abound in spiritual treasures, the less they show; as the heavenly bodies, when in nearest conjunction with the sun and fullest of light, make the least appearance to our sight.
—Salter.

(1076.) An aged Christian man was on his death-bed, and was happy in the prospect of soon entering into the joy of his Lord. He had a brother who had made the world the great object of his life, and who, of course, was very poor toward God; and with all his worldly shrewdness, was so short-sighted as to have made no provision for the world to come, and had no idea of enjoying an inheritance beyond the grave.

His dying brother had given greater attention to the acquirement of true riches than to the realisation of worldly wealth; and in his infirmities and sickness he required that Christian friends should minister to his necessities, as the holy women ministered of their substance to the Lord.

When his rich brother came to see him, he upbraided him for giving so much attention to the things of God, and giving away so much of his substance for religious purposes, and subjecting himself to poverty, when, if he had followed his advice and example, he might now have been in the enjoyment of plenty, instead of being, as he termed it, a burden to his friends.

With great calmness and earnestness the dying saint replied—waving his wasted hand toward his poor, self-deceived brother: "Quiet! quiet! Whist, whist, Tam! I have a kingdom not begun upon, and an inheritance that I have not yet seen."

Who was the richer of the two brothers?

XIII. IS THE NOBLEST WORK OF GOD.

(1077.) Men can admire a statue; it is breathing with life, and the fire of genius has succeeded in imparting almost animation to the figure. You remember that once it was but an unmeaning block of marble, but the sculptor's imagination has succeeded in portraying a man, and the human face divine meets your enraptured eyes. You are filled with rapture and astonishment at the power of genius to call forth such a beautiful creation of art. And have you no eyes to see, nor heart to appreciate, the noble work of God in the new creation of a soul that was dead in trespasses and sins? That man was once a blank in the creation of God; he was spiritually dead, but now he has a soul instinct with the breath of heaven, which lives for its Maker, which hears and obeys His voice, and beats high with the generous sentiments of redeeming love. It is a soul that is restored to its original place in the creation, fulfilling the high purposes of its God, and glowing with ardour to live for His honour and glory. It has not, like the statue, the mock appearance of life; it is not a beautiful illusion of your fancy which vanishes at one effort of your sober reason. It has not its useless and inanimate form to reign and hold its empire only in your imagination. No! look on it, it is the living work of God; it has His own resemblance imparted to it; it is immortal, and destined to run an endless race of glory, to the everlasting praise of the infinite Jehovah—behold it—angels are enamoured with it, and yet you, who can break forth in rapture at that lifeless statue, can see no beauty here; no loveliness to draw forth your love; no admiration of this soul "born of God!"

XIV. IS LORD OF THE WORLD.

(1078.) No one is so truly master and lord of this world, as the man to whom the world is crucified in Christ; no one, other things being equal, has so true and exquisite an enjoyment of the beauties of nature and the bounties of Providence as the man who in his heart gives up all for Christ. So long as the soul is satisfied to aspire after any object besides that Divine Being for whom it was created,—so long as its deepest and choicest affections are set upon created and perishable things,—it is like an untuned viol in an orchestra, whose notes make discord with all the tuneful strings around. But when the soul is yielded up to God, and pervaded with His love, its chords vibrate in sweet harmony with the breathing, swelling chorus of nature, providence, and grace.
—L. H. Wiseman.

XV. HIS REAL WORTH IS UNAFFECTED BY ADVERSE CIRCUMSTANCES.

(1079.) A piece of plate may become battered and scratched, so that its beauty is hopelessly gone, but it loses not its real worth; put it into the scale, and its weight and not its fashion shall be the estimate of its preciousness; throw it into the melting-pot, and its purity will show its actual value. So there are many outward circumstances which may spoil the public repute in which a Christian is held, but his essential preciousness remains unchanged. God values him at as high a rate as ever. His unerring balance and crucible are not guided by appearances. How content may we be to be vile in the sight of men if we are accepted of the Lord!

—Spurgeon.

XVI. IS OF ALL MEN THE HAPPIEST.

(1080.) The gracious person hath a more curious palate, that fits him to taste a further sweetness in, and to draw more pleasure, from any creature enjoyment than an unholy person can do. The fly finds no honey in the same flower from whence the bee goes laden away; nor can an unholy heart taste that sweetness which the saint doth in a creature. He hath indeed a natural fleshly palate, whereby he relisheth the gross carnal pleasure the creature affords, and that he makes his whole meal on; but a gracious heart tastes something more. All Israel drank of the rock, "and that rock was Christ." But did all that tasted the water's natural sweetness taste Christ in it? no, alas, they were but a few holy souls that had a spiritual palate to do this. Sampson's father and mother ate of the honey out of the lion's carcass, as well as Sampson, and maybe liked the taste of it for honey as well as Sampson, yet he took more pleasure sure than they; he tasted the sweetness of God's providence in it, that had delivered him from that very lion that now affords him this honey.

—Gurnall, 1617-1779.

(1081.) The Christian has a sons perennis within him. He is satisfied from himself. The men of the world borrow all their joy from without. Joy wholly from without is false, precarious, and short. From without it may be gathered, but like gathered flowers, though fair and sweet for a season, it must soon wither and become offensive. Joy from within is like smelling the rose on the tree, it is more sweet and fair, and I must add it is immortal.

—Sneller.

(1082.) A drowning man, plucked from the jaws of death, is happy with three feet of bare rock beneath him; happier than others with thousands of broad acres. The wrecked, borne shoreward in the life-boat that is making for the land through roaring seas and winter storms, are happier than Egypt's queen when the sun gleamed on her golden galley, and silken sails swelled in the summer breeze, and the world's great conqueror knelt a suitor at her feet. And there is no humble Christian, no lover of Jesus, but is happier with the hope of heaven, with Christ in him "the hope of glory," than the men of the world when their corn and their wine do most abound; and all things go well with them. Though a beggar, the child of God parts not with that hope for all the wisdom and the wealth of Solomon. To get within that blessed door; to have a place, not nearest the king, but on the outside of the circle around the throne; to bear the lowest title among heaven's nobles; to be the weakest child of God's family, the humblest servant in Christ's house, the dimmest, smallest jewel in His crown, the least, and less than the least, of all saints, is a hope that sets the heart a-singing—

"Transported with the view, I'm lost In wonder, love, and praise."

—Guthrie.

(1083.) What a glorious prescription, "Rejoice evermore!" Christianity is not a sepulchral thing, a gloomy life, a depressed condition of social existence. It is impossible that it can be so as the world brands it, with such a prescription as this from an apostle's lips, "Rejoice evermore." True, the Christian has his sorrows; but these are not unsweetened. True, the Christian life has its shadows and its showers; but these are not unmingled with bright beams of heavenly light; and the saddest aspects of a Christian's daily life are but the April showers of spring that usher in the approaching bright and beautiful summer—the everlasting and the heavenly sunshine. Christian life is not a penance, as the Romanist thinks it, but a privilege, as God describes it. It is not a reluctant sacrifice wrung from us, but a joyous and free-will offering gladly and gratefully rendered by us. And therefore the light of our life is not a dim, but a bright religious life. The injunction of our apostles is, "Rejoice always;" and the prayer of the apostle's Lord, "That my peace may remain in you;" and again, "That my joy may abide in you, and that your joy may be full." And Peter, catching up the thoughts of his Lord still shining with undiminished lustre on the leaves of memory, answers in his Epistle, "Whom, having not seen, we love; in whom, though now we see Him not, yet believing, we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." And the apostle Paul, echoing the same grand sentiment, says, "We joy in God. Rejoice; and again I say, Rejoice." This shows us, that of all happy men upon earth the Christian should be happiest. His sorrows come from sin, his griefs spring from evil; his sunshine, his gladness, and his joy are the spontaneous and moral elements of his true Christian and holy life.

—Cumming.

(1084.) No man knows half the fulness of his own being until inspired to a Christian life. If you will walk with me in January over the fertile places in the fields, and through the forests, you will see what man is in his natural state. The earth is full of roots, not one of which knows how to live. The trees are full of buds, every one of which is closed and bandaged so that it cannot expand. All things are populous, but all things are curdled, congealed, restrained. Although, in his natural state, man is full of high, godlike powers, yet they are in a condition of bondage and inactivity; and the coming of religion to him is like the coming of spring to the soil and the forests, when all things begin to grow. When a man attains some degree of ripeness in his spiritual nature, he may be likened to the fields and the forests in midsummer; and when he has passed through life under the stimulating influences of religion, he may be likened to plants and trees in autumn, when they yield their fruit in exceeding abundance, and in a state of perfect ripeness.

—Becher.

XVII. THE COMFORT OF SINCERITY.

(1085.) What we want to be is not to look Christians, or to pretend Christians, or to profess Christians, but to be Christians. You need not then so carefully guard yourself, you need not be on the ceaseless watch what you do. Take an anagram; read it from the right or from the left, or from the top or from the bottom; it reads the same thing. Take a Christian, look at him at one angle, or look at another angle, look at him in any light or in any direction, and he is a Christian still. The great secret of getting rid of a vast amount of trouble and inconvenience, is being a Christian; and when you are a Christian your eye will be single, your body will be full of light, and all influences, sanctified and blessed by the Holy Spirit of God, will be sanctifying, and will bless all that are connected with you.

—Cumming.

(1086.) Up to a certain point, being a true Christian is a terrible thing. The advantage lies in carrying it far beyond that point where fruit is to be reaped. As long as the nights are long and the days are short we have the stern certainties of winter; as long as the days are long and the nights are short we have the sweet, precious, genial hours of summer; but when the days and the nights are just about alike, and the equinox comes on, and light and darkness strive for the mastery, that is the time for storms to rage. And so, in Christian experience, so long as the night is longest, you have the peace of darkness; and when the day is longest, you have the peace of light; but when the night and the day are of about the same length, and they strive to see which shall rule, that is the time for storms. The hardest way to live is to be half a Christian and half a sinner. The easiest way to live is to be wholly a sinner or wholly a Christian. Harmonise on one side or the other, if you want quiet. Take the middle ground, if you want perpetual gales.

—Becher.

XVIII. HIS KNOWLEDGE OF DIVINE THINGS.

(1087.) A faithful man hath three eyes : the first, of sense, common to him with brute creatures ; the second, of reason, common to all men ; the third, of faith, proper to his profession ; whereof each looketh beyond the other ; and none of them meddleth with the others' objects. For, neither doth the eye of sense reach to intelligible things and matters of discourse, nor the eye of reason to those things which are supernatural and spiritual ; neither doth faith look down to things that may be sensibly seen. If thou discourse to a brute beast of the depths of philosophy never so plainly, he understands not : because they are beyond the view of his eye, which is only of sense : if to a mere carnal man, of divine things ; he perceiveth not the things of God, neither indeed can do ; because they are spiritually discerned ; and, therefore, no wonder if those things seem unlikely, incredible, impossible to him, which the faithful man, having a proportionable means of apprehension, doth as plainly see as his eye doth any sensible thing. Tell a plain countryman that the sun or some higher or lesser star is much bigger than his cart wheel ; or, at least so many scores bigger than the whole earth ; he laughs thee to scorn, as affecting admiration with a learned untruth. Yet the scholar, by the eye of reason, doth as plainly see and acknowledge this truth, as that his hand is bigger than his pen. What a thick mist, yea what a palpable and more than Egyptian darkness, doth the natural man live in ! What a world is there that he doth not see at all ! and how little doth he see in this, which is his proper element ! There is no bodily thing, but the brute creatures see as well as he ; and some of them better. As for his eye of reason, how dim is it in those things which are best fitted to it ? What one thing is there in nature which he doth perfectly know ? what herb, or flower, or worm that he treads on, is there, whose true essence he knoweth ? No not so much as what is in his own bosom ; what it is, where it is, or whence it is that gives being to himself. But for those things which concern the best world, he doth not so much as confusedly see them ; neither knoweth whether they be. He sees no whit into the great and awful Majesty of God. He discerns Him not in all His creatures filling the world with His infinite and glorious presence. He sees not His wise providence, overruling all things, disposing all casual events, ordering all sinful actions of men to His own glory. He comprehends nothing of the beauty, majesty, power, and mercy of the Saviour of the world, sitting in the Humanity at His Father's right hand. He sees not the unspeakable happiness of the glorified souls of the saints. He sees not the whole heavenly commonwealth of angels ; ascending and descending to the school of God's children, waiting upon them at all times invisibly ; not excluded by the closeness of prisons nor desolateness of wildernesses ; and the multitude of evil spirits, passing and standing by them, to tempt them unto evil ; but, like unto the foolish bird when he hath hid his head that he sees nobody, he thinks himself altogether unseen ; and then counts himself solitary, when his eye can meet with no companion. It was not without cause, that we call a mere fool a natural : for however worldlings have still thought Christians God's fools, we know them the fools of the world. The deepest philosopher that ever was, saving the reverence of the schools, is but an ignorant sot to the simplest Christian ; for the weakest Christian may, by plain information, see somewhat into the greatest mysteries of nature, because he hath the eye of reason common with the best ; but the best philosopher by all the demonstrations in the world, can conceive nothing of the mysteries of godliness, because he utterly wants the eye of faith. Though my insight into matters of the world be so shallow that my simplicity moveth pity, or maketh sport unto others, it shall be my contentment and happiness that I see further into better matters. That which I see not is worthless, and deserves little better than contempt ; that which I see is unspeakable, inestimable, for comfort, for glory.

XIX. IS CERTAIN TO COMMAND RESPECT.

(1088.) There is something in a holy life which wonderfully conciliates the minds of men. At first, indeed, like a strong influx of light, it offends their eyes ; and the beholders, unable to bear the effulgence of its beams, turn away from it, or perhaps desire its utter extinction. But when it has shone for a long time before them, and they have had sufficient opportunity to contemplate its worth, they are constrained to acknowledge, that "The righteous is more excellent than his neighbour ;" and they begin to venerate the character, whose virtues at first were occasions of offence.
—Simon.

XX. HIS INFLUENCE FOR GOOD.

(1089.) He who is godly is both a diamond and a loadstone ; a diamond for the sparkling of his grace ; and a loadstone, for his attractive virtue in drawing others to the love of God's precepts.
—Watson, 1696.

(1090.) Experienced Christians have told me that they were not so much convinced by a preacher, or a book, as by a fact : that they marked, and kept their eye on, some humble, upright, pious Christian, living above the world, while greatly tried in it, and demonstrating that he was an overcomer of the world by the principle of grace within him.
—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(1091.) "Let your light shine." If the sun shines on a dull brick or stone, they reflect none of its beams ; there is nothing in them capable of this ; nor is there in an ungodly man any natural power of reflecting the light of God. But let the sun shine upon a diamond, and see what rays of sparkling beauty it emits. Just so the Christian, who has the grace of the Spirit ; when God shines on his soul, beams of celestial loveliness are reflected by him on the world.
—Salter.

(1092.) There is ever a fresh fragrance flowing from the rose of Sharon, increasing in sweetness : so is it with the Christian, whose heart is filled with love to Christ, because he is of one spirit with Christ. There is a holy atmosphere, as it were, about him. Wherever he goes, he is a blessing. He is like a fragrant flower brought into a room, the refreshing odour of which diffuses itself among all the company. He is like the sandal tree, which diffuses its fragrance to everything that touches it.

—Salter.

(1093.) For the purpose of teaching a truth that should inspire and animate our prayers, God has often wrought out His ends by most unlikely means. There are objects in nature not less astonishing for the smallness of the worker than the greatness of the work. Such are the coral walls around those lovely isles that, carpeted with flowers, clothed with palms, and enjoying an everlasting summer, lie scattered like gems on the bosom of the Pacific. These, with the ocean roaring in its fury before them, and behind them the lagoon lying like a molten mirror broken only by the dash of a sea-bird or the dip of a passing oar, are stupendous ramparts. Compared to them our greatest breakwaters dwindle into insignificance. One of these reefs off the coast of New Holland is a thousand miles in length, and how many hundred feet in depth I know not: yet the masons that build these are creatures so small as to be almost invisible. Such mighty works does God accomplish by instruments so mean! a sight that helps a believer—though he has to say with Nehemiah, “I have a great work to do”—to take heart and hope, and say with Paul, “I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.”

—Guthrie.

Let me illustrate this by an example. An extensive tract of country in one of our distant colonies was occupied many years ago by forests, where the traveller found only the scantiest means of subsistence. It was inaccessible to all, but the few savages who roamed its gloomy solitudes. It is no longer so. Beautiful and fruit-bearing trees now occupy the forest glades, and, providing abundance of nutritious food, have opened up the country to civilised man, and to its savage tribes the blessed influences of the Gospel. It was thus the change was brought about, as I have read or remember the story. Long years ago there lived there a devout man, one who had left his native land, but not, like many others, the profession of its religion behind. Animated with love to Christ and an eager desire to save souls, he was wont to leave the settlement and penetrate those forests to carry the Gospel to their wandering tribes. Ever aiming at doing good, nor confining himself, as is the habit of some, to one way of doing it, he sought, Christ-like, to benefit the bodies as well as the souls of men. So on leaving home he was accustomed, beside his Bible, to carry a store of the stony seeds of those trees that now bless and beautify the country; and though, exposed to perish of famine or fall by the club of the savage, he might never live to see them blossom, ever and anon, as he emerged into a sunny glade, he planted a seed, leaving it to the care of God, the dews, and showers of rain. And now, though his bones have long mouldered into dust, in trees that bear beauty in their blossoms and life in their fruit, his works, done with prayer to God and from love to man are still following him on earth. While others, who lived to enrich themselves and accumulate fortunes that have sunk amid the wreck of time, are forgotten, this good man's memory, like these trees, blossoms in perennial beauty. He has his name inscribed, not on a mouldering tombstone amid emblems of decay, but on the ever-living face of nature, and on the hearts of grateful generations that sit under the shadow of his piety and enjoy its fruits.

Even so by labours accomplished in the spiritual field the Christian may live after he is dead. Leaving behind them works which shall continue for ages to preserve their memory and follow them here, many through their good words, though dead, are yet speaking,—through their good works, though dead, are yet working. There is no good work or word, indeed, but contains a germ of immortality, and may produce results God only has a mind to measure. Like the tiny stream, which small and shallow where it leaves its cradle, grows as it goes, till, fed by many tributaries, it at length swells into a river that, sweeping by the lands of many tribes, and bearing the sails of many nations on its bosom like the Amazon or Mississippi, makes its floods felt far out from shore, freshening the briny sea, good words have been spoken, and good works done that have grown from small beginnings into incalculable importance. Living through long periods of the world's history, they carry their blessed influences far beyond the land of their birth, even to the ends of the earth. In proof of this let me adduce two remarkable examples, namely, Sabbath schools, and the British and Foreign Bible Society.

—Guthrie.

(1095.) The influence of the Christian on posterity is undying. His kind words, like his good deeds, can never die. He who has grown like a cedar in Lebanon will, like the cedar, long after it is cut down, send forth a sweet fragrance.

—Pearson.

XXI. HIS RELATION TO THE LAW.

(1096.) [On a cancelled bond.] While this obligation was in force, I was in servitude to my parchment; my bond was double to a payment, to a penalty: now, that is discharged, what is it better than a waste scroll; regarded for nothing, but the witness of its own voidance and nullity?

Nor otherwise is it with the severe law of my Creator. Out of Christ, it stands in full force; and binds me over, either to perfect obedience which I cannot possibly perform, or to exquisite torment and eternal death which I am never able to endure. But now that my Saviour hath fastened it cancelled to His Cross, in respect of the rigour and malediction of it, I look upon it as the moment of my past danger and bondage: I know by it how much was owed by me; how much was paid for me. The direction of it is everlasting: the obligation by it unto death is frustrated. I am free from curse, who never can be free from obedience. O Saviour, take Thou glory, and give me peace.

(1097.) As there is need of no law to compel the body to eat or drink, to digest, to sleep, to go, to stand, to sit, or to do the works of nature, for it is ready to do them of itself when the case so requireth, without respect either of reward or punishment, and may not unjustly be said, as concerning these things, not to be under a law: even so, after the same sort altogether, doth the godly man behave himself concerning the works of godliness. He is carried to the doing of them by his new nature, which is of the Spirit, albeit there were no law at all, and all, both hope of reward and fear of punishment, were taken away.

—Cawdray, 1598-1664.

XXII. HIS SAFETY.

(109£) A Christian lives in two worlds at one and the same time—the world of flesh and the world of spirit. It is possible to do both. There are certain dangerous gases, which from their weight fall to the lower part of the place where they are, making it destructive for a dog to enter, but safe for a man who holds his head erect. A Christian, as living in the world of flesh, is constantly passing through these. Let him keep his head erect in the spiritual world, and he is safe. He does this so long as the Son of God is the Fountain whence he draws his inspiration, his motives, encouragement, and strength.

—George Philip.

(1099.) A terrific tempest swept along; the force of which rent dwellings, uprooted trees, and spread devastation and ruin on every side. And the roaring sea rose in huge waves, which rolled with angry violence upon the great rocks as though they would hurl them from their foundations. On the foaming billows a little creature was washed about; sometimes upon the crest of the mountain wave, and then far down in the trough of the briny deep. Still it rose from its partial submersion; it was tossed about terribly, but never lost utterly; hidden sometimes, and then re-appearing! Could it not be rent asunder like the great dwellings, or torn to pieces like the great trees, or destroyed with the destruction which cast strong-holds into ruins? No, it was so light, so buoyant, that it could not sink into the deep waters; so it lived till the storm was no more, and then floated in a calm and tranquil haven. It was a little cork, which no floods can possibly drown.

Love to God is assailed by every force of sin and temptation; but "many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it." Grace survives every sorrow; and from the last tempest of death it will arise in its Divine life to repose in the place where "the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary be at rest."

—Bowden.

XXIII. AN EXILE.

(1100.) Here we are like branches torn from their stem; like strangers wandering in a foreign land; like fettered captives in a prison, waiting their deliverance; like children, banished for a time from their paternal inheritance and mansion; in a word, like members separated from their body.

—Massillon.

(1101.) The believer, living in this world, resembles the son of a great king whom some sad event tore from his royal parent in his cradle; who knows his parent only by the fame of his virtues; who has always a difficult and often an intercepted correspondence with his parent; whose remittances and favours from his parent are always diminished by the hands through which they come to him. With what transport would such a son meet the moment appointed by his father for his return to his natural state!

—Saunders.

XXIV. A PILGRIM.

(1102.) If men have been termed pilgrims, and life a journey, then we may add that the Christian pilgrimage far surpasses all others in the following important particulars: in the goodness of the road—in the beauty of the prospects—in the excellence of the company—and in the vast superiority of the accommodation provided for the Christian traveller when he has finished his course. —Colton, 1832.

XXV. HIS ASPIRATIONS.

(1103.) A Christian who is pure is upon earth like a bird that is kept fastened down by a string. Poor little bird! it only waits for the moment when the string is cut to fly away. —Vianney.

(1104.) A good Christian ought not to be able to endure himself in this world; he languishes on earth. If a little child were down there in the church, and its mother was in the tribune, it would stretch out its little arms to her and if it could not get up the staircase leading to her, it would ask for help, and would not rest till it was in its mother's arms. —Vianney.

XXVI. THE PRIZE THAT IS SET BEFORE HIM.

(1105.) What a glorious prize is this set before us—what a glorious incentive for our immortal energies! Life! the only thing worth calling life—the life of God in the soul—a life whose infancy is on earth, and its perfected manhood in heaven. What is there worthy of aspiration in comparison with this? What though other earthly blessings be wanting, if you have this everlasting possession? What though outward things may elude your grasp, and perish in the very using, if you have "the better part" which is indestructible? What would the sculptor care though his packing-case be broken, if the priceless marble group which it contains escape uninjured? What would the mother care though her cradle be burnt in the flaming house, if her living child, her living treasure be spared? What though the thief have escaped with the casket, if the jewel remain? "Let the movables go," says a good man, "the inheritance is ours!" Be indifferent to what the world gives or withholds. Learn that a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. Life is not, as the world estimates it, composed of wealth, riches, honours, possessions; these are but the accidents of life—the outer shell—the perishable and corroding gilding. But it is the inner wealth of peace with God—the assurance of His love—a pure heart, a peaceful conscience, the humble hope of eternal fellowship and communion with Him above. —Macduff.

XXVII. THE TRIUMPH THAT AWAITS HIM.

(1106.) When the Olympic combatant had nobly sustained the conflict, and achieved the victory, a thousand joys awaited him, and a thousand honours were heaped upon his head; such as in one short day repaid him for privations, hardships, and toils, numberless and apparently intolerable. The year was called by his name. That name was sounded amidst the clangour of trumpets and the sweeter strains, whether of the warbling flute or of that living lyre which it was given to the minstrelsy of Greece alone to waken into music. It was inscribed on monuments, and emblazoned in trophies, and entwined with fairest emblems. Henceforth he was the child, not of his family, but of the State. His future patrimony was the common treasure of his rejoicing country. As he advanced within the city of his birth, the very walls were levelled to admit his chariot. The loftiest gates and proudest columns, which told of the glory and the joy of other days, were deemed unworthy to receive him. A new untrodden path was opened, to signalise and to welcome his approach. And thus, preceded by heralds, lighted by torches, and attended by the rush of his applauding fellow citizens, did he make his joyous return to the home of his childhood and the habitation of his fathers. Never, perhaps, amidst the annals of mankind, was a scene more fraught with all that could captivate the senses, or rejoice the heart. Never was a glory more exalted, or a bliss more sweet. But what is this compared with the triumph of the Christian conqueror, when he shall have run not an earthly but a heavenly race; when he shall break from the grasp, not of mortal but infernal antagonists; when he shall have "fought the good fight, and finished his course, and kept the faith, and henceforth there is laid up for him," not a perishable garland, but a deathless crown—"that crown of righteousness that fadeth not away!" What is even this, however dazzling or however rapturous, compared with the glory of that day, when thus "an entrance shall be administered unto him abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour!" —M^r All.

XXVIII. THE WISDOM OF HIS CHOICE.

(1107.) It is not much that the good man ventures: after this life, if there be no God, he is as well as the bad; but if there be a God, is infinitely better; even as much as unspeakable and eternal happiness is better than extreme and endless misery.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(1108.) Indisputably, the firm believers in the gospel have a great advantage over all others,—for this simple reason, that if true, they will have their reward hereafter; and if there be no hereafter, they can be but with the infidel in his eternal sleep, having had the assistance of an exalted hope through life, without subsequent disappointment, since (at the worst of them) "out of nothing nothing can arise," not even sorrow.

—Lord Byron:

Letter to J. Shepherd, Pisa, Dec. 8, 1821.

XXIX. HIS DEATH.

(1109.) It is storied of Godfrey, Duke of Bouillon, that when, in that his expedition to the Holy Land, he came within view of Jerusalem, his army, seeing the high turrets, goodly buildings, and fair fronts (though but, as it were, as so many skeletons of far more glorious bodies), being even transported with the joyfulness of such a sight, gave a mighty shout, that the earth was verily thought to ring with the noise thereof. Such is the rejoicing of a godly man in death, when he doth not see the turrets and towers of an earthly, but the spiritual building of a heavenly Jerusalem, and his soul ready to take possession of them. How doth he delight in his dissolution, especially when he sees grace changing into glory, hope into fruition, faith into vision, and love into perfect comprehension! Such and so great are the exultations of his spirit, such mighty workings and shoutings of the heart, as cannot be expressed!

—Spencer, 1658.

(1110.) It is our happiness, as Christians, that however we may change our place, we shall never change our object. Whatever we lose, we shall not lose that which we esteem "better than life." God has made to us this gracious promise—"I will dwell in them, and walk in them." And though we may endure much affliction, and pass through many deep waters, yet this is our honour and comfort—"The Lord is with us!" And then, what is difficulty?—what is tribulation?—what is death?—Death to a Christian is but an entrance into the city of God! it is but joining a more blessed company, and singing in a more exalted strain than he can do in this world.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(1111.) That death which men dread is to them swallowed up in victory. It is but the passing shadow between faith and sight, hope and full fruition, transient and transparent as the last filmy cloud that veils for a moment the sunrise. The chamber of death is none other than the house of God and the very gate of heaven. Oh, the dying of the Christian is not a fading away; it is an apotheosis, a transfiguration, a bursting into blossom. It is a triumph, and not a sadness. It is like the setting of the sun on a calm summer evening, which makes the western sky ablaze with splendour, and glorifies even the dark clouds that gather round His descent. It is like the changing of the sombre green foliage of summer into the gorgeous brightness of the autumnal trees, investing even the sadness of decay and death with an unearthly beauty. Who, on beholding such a marvellous proof of the transforming and sustaining power of grace, would not exclaim with Balaam's earnestness, and more than Balaam's purpose of attainment: "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my latter end be like his?"

—Macmillan.

XXX. HIS FUTURE PERFECTNESS AND GLORY.

(1112.) When we see one in the streets, from every dunghill, gather old pieces of rags and dirty clouts, little would we think that of those old rotten rags, beaten together in the mill, there should be made such pure fine white paper as afterwards we see there is. Thus, the poor despised children of God may be cast out into the world as dung and dross, may be smeared and smutted all over with lying amongst the pots; they may be in tears, perhaps in blood, both broken-hearted and broken-bowed; yet, for all this, they are not to despair, for God will make them one day shine in joy, like the bright stars of heaven, and make of them royal, imperial paper, wherein He will write His own name for ever.

—Balcanquhal, 1623.

(1113.) A pure soul is like a fine pearl. As long as it is hidden in the shell at the bottom of the sea, no one thinks of admiring it. But if you bring it into the sunshine, this pearl will shine and attract all eyes. Thus the pure soul, which is hidden from the eyes of the world, will one day shine before the angels in the sunshine of eternity.

—Vianney.

(1114.) You look on a poor, praying, self-denying believer, but you look not before you on a saint that shall reign with Christ, and judge the world, "when He cometh to be glorified in His saints, and admired in all them that believe." You see them "sow their seed in tears," but you see it not springing up; nor do you foresee the joyful harvest. You see them following Christ through tribulation, bearing His cross, and despising the shame; but you see them not yet sitting down with Him on their thrones. The fight you see, but the triumph you see not. You see them tossed at sea, but you know not how sure a pilot they have; nor do you see the riches of their freight. You see sickness or persecution unpinning their corruptible rags, and death undressing them, but you see not the clothes which they are putting on. You see them laid asleep by death; but you see not their awaking; nor the rising of their sun, when "the righteous shall have dominion in the morning." The man that is dead to the world you see; but you see not "the life that is hid with Christ in God," nor their "appearing with Him in glory, when Christ, who is their life, appears." Your unbelieving souls imagine there will be no May or harvest because it is now winter with us. You think the rose and beauteous flowers, which are promised us in that spring, are but delusions, because you know not the virtue of that life that is in the root, nor the powerful influence of that Sun of the believer. You see the dead body, but you see not the soul, alive with Christ, retired into its root. You see the candle put out, and know not whither the flame is gone, and think not how small a touch of the yet living soul will light it again.

—Salter.

(1115.) The mind of a natural man is darkened and disturbed by passion, and, except some occasional feelings of terror, gives no indication of the existence of the Deity. It is like the ocean lying under a threatening sky, and ruffled with the wind, which gives no distinct reflection of the lights of the heavens, yet catches and flashes back an occasional gleam, which indicates their existence. When the soul is restored to the favour of God, through faith in Jesus Christ, it is as when God says to the sea, "Peace, be still," and immediately its fury subsides, and its heaving billows begin to rock themselves to rest, while the clouds gradually disperse, and the sun shines out upon it, and its reflections become more distinct and more general, and the whole scene assumes an air of greater cheerfulness. But when the soul shall be for ever delivered from the influence of all agitating passions, and shall be brought into the presence of God, it will be as a calm expanse of water lying under a serene sky, with the sun beaming full upon it, which then gleams and sparkles with a brightness that is overpowering to human vision. Then every feature in the majestic and lovely character of God will have its respondent reflection on the souls of His people: and as the untroubled ocean reflects in succession the various exhibitions of the works of God, presented by a revolving and perpetually changing sky, so their souls will be the subjects of ever-varying affections, excited by a continued succession of new and wonderful displays of the character and attributes of the Deity.

—Salter.

(1116.) In the little tiny seed we can but ill descry the beauteous or stately tree which is to spring from it. Had we never known the beauties of a full-blown rose, we could not foretell from looking on the bud the future splendour of the flower, nor trace the blaze of a meridian day in a morning sky. So when we consider the soul in her feeble state, disfigured and defaced, and with but little of heaven's comeliness upon it—we could never anticipate, from its close alliance with a perishing body, that "this corruptible shall put on incorruption," and the soul shine forth in all the glories of the divine image.

—Salter.

(1117.) "The night is far spent and the day is at hand." How beautifully this figure describes the Christian's earthly experience. The night of his natural condition is past, the day of his glorification is at hand. At present, his experience partakes of a commingling of the elements of the past night, and of the elements of the coming day. But there is an increasing ascendancy of the light of the day over the darkness of the night. And this transition from night to day is produced, not by the introduction of darkness into light, but of light into darkness. The glorious light of the gospel shines into our hearts, and gives us foreglimpses of heaven. The coming day shall have no night. Let us awake and await the coming of day. "For now is our salvation nearer than when we believed."

(1118.) We know not what shall be. As yet the veil is over us. We can only catch a faint gleam of the splendour of the inheritance of the sons of God. We are like men standing outside some mighty temple, seeing now and then the glory streaming through its gorgeous windows, and hearing faintly the music rolling through its gorgeous dome. But soon the veil shall be lifted, and we shall "know even as we are known."

(1119.) When gold was first discovered in California, they used to saw timber in New England, and frame it into buildings ready to be put up, and stow them into the hold of ships, and carry a whole village in one ship, to be put up in that new region. And suppose a man, on hearing that there was a whole village in the hold of a ship, had gone down to see what a village looked like? When he gets where it is, all that he can see is an immense heap of bricks, and lime, and tools, and planks, and boards, and timbers with all sorts of holes in them; and he goes up and says, "Well, if that is a village, deliver me from a village!" He laughs at it. No man can convince him that it is a village. Now, land your stores, and take these timbers that have been fitted, and these boards that have been planed, and painted, and fixed, on the far-off New England shore, and carry them up under the shadow of an evergreen hill, and put them together, making of them cozy white houses, with their little yards, and their flowers; and then bring this man out of the ship, and say, "There is the village, cut out on one shore, and set up on another!" Would he not change his mind?

This is God's sawyard. He is sawing out timber; and you are that timber. To-day he is ripping you with the saw. To-morrow he is smoothing you with a plane. The next day he is rubbing up the surface with some kind of a rasp. He plies you with hammer, and nails, and screws, and bolts, and all sorts of instruments. This great world carries you like the hull of a ship. You are sailing to that land where all these things, which are being fitted and prepared here, are to be set up. And you can never imagine from what you see here what is to be there. You would not know yourself if you were to see yourself as you are to be. If a man could be projected outside of himself, and walk by himself, as he will be in the other life, he would say, "Who is that?" He would not know himself, such is the exceeding glory of that change which will be wrought in us, when all parts of our being have been developed and educated, and we are what God thought of and meant when He invented man.

—Becher.

CHRISTIANITY.

1. The last and most glorious of the Divine revelations.

(1120.) God at sundry times, and in divers manners, spake unto the fathers by the prophets; but the complete revelation of His will and His grace was reserved for the appearance of His "only begotten Son" in our world. As the evening star precedes, in the firmament, the breaking forth of the heavenly host in all their splendour; so the announcement of the first promise was preparatory to the brighter light which beamed on the patriarchal age: and as the light of the full-orbed moon walking in all her brightness conceals from the view the twinkling stars, so the light of the Mosaic dispensation, and the prophetic revelations with which it was accompanied, eclipsed all the splendour which had preceded it. But even resplendent as the glory of Sinai was, it cannot endure comparison with the unspeakably more transcendent glory which was shed upon the Church and the world when the great "Sun of righteousness" Himself arose with healing under His wings. These were only as the light of the stars, or of the moon, which disappear and are hid in the cloudless radiance of meridian day (2 Cor. iii. 7-11).

—Ewing.

(1121.) The main distinction between real Christianity and the system of the bulk of nominal Christians chiefly consists in the different place which is assigned in the two schemes to the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel. These, in the scheme of nominal Christians, if admitted at all, appear but like the stars of the firmament to the ordinary eye. Those splendid luminaries draw forth, perhaps, occasionally a transient expression of admiration when we behold their beauty, or hear of their distances, magnitudes, or properties; now and then, too, we are led, perhaps, to muse upon their possible uses; but, however curious as subjects of speculation, it must, after all, be confessed they twinkle to the common observer with a vain and idle lustre; and except in the dreams of the astrologer have no influence on human happiness, or any concern with the course and order of the world. But to the real Christian, on the contrary, these peculiar doctrines constitute the centre to which he gravitates! the very sun of his system! the origin of all that is excellent and lovely! the source of light, and life, and motion, and genial warmth, and plastic energy! Dim is the light of reason, and cold and comfortless our state while left to her unassisted guidance. Even the Old Testament itself, though a revelation from heaven, shines but with feeble and scanty rays. But the blessed truths of the Gospel are now unveiled to our eyes, and we are called upon to behold and to enjoy "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ," in the full radiance of its meridian splendour. The words of inspiration best express our highly-favoured state: "We all, with open face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord."

—Wilberforce.

2. Indisputable facts concerning it.

(1.) It is a system of wonders.

(1122.) Christianity is a system of wonders. It enjoins upon man to acknowledge himself vile,—yea, abominable; yet commands him to aspire to a likeness to God! Without such a counterpoise, his elevation would render him fearfully vain, or his abasement hopelessly abject.

—Pascal.

(2.) As a system of morality it is unsurpassed.

(1123.) All systems of morality are fine. The Gospel alone has exhibited a complete assemblage of the principles of morality, divested of all absurdity. It is not composed, like your creed, of a few commonplace sentences put into bad verse. Do you wish to see that which is really sublime? Repeat the Lord's Prayer.

—Napoleon I.

(3.) No other religion does more to promote virtue and the national welfare.

(1124.) There was never law, or sect, or opinion, did so much magnify goodness as the Christian religion doth.

—Bacon, 1560-1626.

(1125.) The great received articles of the Christian religion have been so clearly proved, from the authority of that divine revelation in which they are delivered, that it is impossible for those who have ears to hear, and eyes to see, not to be convinced of them. But were it possible for anything in the Christian faith to be erroneous, I can find no ill consequences in adhering to it. The great points of the incarnation and sufferings of our Saviour produce naturally such habits of virtue in the mind of man, that, I say, supposing it were possible for us to be mistaken in them, the infidel himself must at least allow that no other system of religion could so effectually contribute to the heightening morality. They give us great ideas of the dignity of human nature, and of the love which the Supreme Being bears to His creatures, and consequently engage us in the highest acts of duty towards our Creator, our neighbour, and ourselves.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

(1126.) No religion ever appeared in the world whose natural tendency was so much directed to promote the peace and happiness of mankind. It makes right reason a law in every possible definition of the word. And therefore, even supposing it to have been purely a human invention, it had been the most amiable and the most useful invention that was ever imposed on mankind for their good.

—Lord Bolingbroke, 1678-1751.

(1127.) What other science can even make a pretension to dethrone oppression, to abolish slavery, to exclude war, to extirpate fraud, to banish violence, to revive the withered blossoms of paradise? Such are the pretensions and blessings of genuine Christiarity; and wherever genuine Christianity prevails, they are experienced. Thus it accomplishes its promises on earth, where alone it has enemies: it will therefore accomplish them in heaven, where its friends reign.

—Gregory, 1774-1841.

(1128.) The following is related of the celebrated Dr. Belknap:

Upon a certain occasion, in the presence of a vast and brilliant assemblage, a person more noted for his self-esteem than for his learning, was speaking against the Christian religion in terms of the severest scorn and derision.

Unfortunately for the orator, his remarks were overheard by the doctor who, stepping up to him, asked: "Well, sir, have you found a religion that is better?" The scoffer, considerably abashed by this unlooked-for question, was forced to acknowledge that thus far he had not. "Well," responded the doctor, "when you have, let me know, and I will join you in adopting it."

The rebuke was as wise as it was just.

(4.) Its effects upon society have been highly beneficial.

(1129.) The influence of Christianity has been very efficient toward the introduction of a better and more enlightened sense of right and justice among the several governments of Europe. It taught the duty of benevolence to strangers, of humanity to the vanquished, of the obligation of good faith,—of the sin of murder, revenge, and rapacity. The history of Europe during the earlier periods of modern history abounds with interesting and strong cases to show the authority of the Church over turbulent princes and fierce warriors, and the effect of that authority in meliorating manners, checking violence, and introducing a system of morals which inculcated peace, moderation, and justice.

—Chancellor Kent.

(1130.) Christianity is the companion of liberty in all its conflicts,—the cradle of its infancy and the divine source of its claims.
—De Toqueville.

(5.) It blesses and ennobles the poor.

(1131.) Since the revelation of Christianity all moral thought has been sanctified by religion. Religion has given to it a purity, a solemnity, a sublimity which even amongst the noblest of the heathen we shall look for in vain. The knowledge that shone by fits and dimly on the eyes of Socrates and Plato, "that rolled in vain to find the light," has descended over many lands into the "huts where poor men lie;" and thoughts are familiar there, beneath the low and smoking roofs, higher far than ever flowed from Grecian sage meditating among the magnificence of his pillared temples.

—Professor John Wilson.
(Recreations of Christopher North.)

(6.) The effect of universal obedience to it would be an unexampled state of national happiness.

(1132.) If all were perfect Christians, individuals would do their duty; the people would be obedient to the laws; the magistrates incorrupt; and there would be neither vanity nor luxury in such a state.

—J. L. Rousseau.

(7.) It delivers those who accept it from the fear of death.

(1133.) We recently called on a lady of culture and refinement, who, having just taken possession of a new house with elegant surroundings, had suddenly been called to face the approach of a fearful disease that seemed beyond human power to avert. With a loving husband and a winsome daughter, with a home filled with evidences of wealth and taste, encircled by warm, true-hearted friends, with everything earthly to make life glad and joyous, we remarked: "You have everything to live for. Does it not depress you to think that all this must be given up if this disease is not stayed?" The reply, simple, earnest, truthful: "Why, I have everything to die for," indicated the rich, abiding wealth of a soul whose trust is stayed on God, and showed that she was lifted up into a life of serenity and peace that could never be shaken by storms and tempests. Can any faith or any religion save that of the Christian enable one thus to triumph over pain, thus to look upon death, thus to contemplate separation from the dear ones linked by the holiest of earthly ties?

3. How difficult it is for us to appreciate its blessings.

(1134.) We live surrounded by Christian institutions; breathe an atmosphere saturated by Christianity. It is exceedingly difficult even to imagine another state of things. In the enjoyment of domestic purity it is difficult to conceive the debasing effects of polygamy; in the midst of political liberty to conceive of the blighting power of slavery; in scientific progress to imagine mental stagnation; in religious liberty and free goodness to fancy the reign of superstition.

Yet to realise the blessings of health, we must sit by the sick-bed; to feel what light is, we must descend into the mine and see the emaciated forms which dwindle away in darkness; to know what the blessing of sunshine is, go down into the valleys where stunted vegetation and dim vapours tell of a scene on which the sun scarcely shines two hours in the day; and to know what we have from Christianity, it is well to cast the eyes sometimes over the darkness from which the Advent of Christ redeemed us.
—Robertson, 1816-1853.

4. The extent of its benefits are not yet discernible.

(1135.) The work of Christianity we cannot see in full. It is a work which is largely in future, though some of it is here.

Do you recollect going out into Prospect Park in Brooklyn when they were first laying it out? They were going to have a great park; and it is a great park. It is one of the most beautiful parks in the world, and you ought to be more proud of it than you are. But how did they go to work to make it? What did they do first? They took off everything that was beautiful from the surface, and heaped it in large stacks. They took off the sod and threw up the sub-soil, and the ground was like a man that had been skinned all over. It was ugly and hideous. By and by, however, there were some little bits improved. They spread out some soil, and put in some shrubs, and some small points here and there were made quite attractive. And they followed up this process little by little. The great bulk of the park, so far as its surface was concerned, was to be created; and here came out a bit, and there a bit, from year to year; and people said, "It is beautiful as far as it goes."

Men grow just so when God takes hold of them, and they begin to be Christians. The old growths are cleaned away, and transformations take place under the Divine influence. Oftentimes a man looks less beautiful after the work of grace has first begun in him than he did before; but gradually his nature changes. In some directions it improves. One part after another begins to be wrought out by the Divine discipline, and by the concurrent desire of men for education. Little by little the lineaments of the Divine character come up. But the whole of it cannot appear until you get into a climate that is without winter. This is such a world that the highest degrees of human excellence cannot be attained until we get out of it. The lower forms, the foundation elements of the great structure, which require a certain physical manipulation, are begun and carried forward here; but as plants that are grown in greenhouses are not taken out of doors until winter is gone, and have their glory in summer, so in this greenhouse of a world, as it were, we are sprouted; and it is not until summer dawns on this sphere, and we are transplanted to a soil where frosts no longer come, that we show all the power and beauty of our character. —Becher.

5. Is a religion of principles.

(1136.) Moses, who had to provide for the wants of a particular people at a time when religion was only in its childhood, was instructed to teach them, as we treat children, and to give them rules, "Touch not, taste not, handle not." . . . Jesus Christ, who spake for all men, for all nations, for all ages, did not lay down rules like Moses; did not say, "Touch not, taste not, handle not." No; by an exertion of His power and wisdom, more marvellous to a thinking mind than any, even the greatest miracle He ever wrought, He at once by a few plain words set religion free from all her former swaddling-clothes and leading-strings. . . . In the room of burdensome rites and former rules, He gave us the law of faith and love; and thereby made His doctrine a doctrine of principles,—living, active, pure, universal, and eternal. —A. W. Hare.

6. Its distinctive doctrine.

(1137.) The distinctive doctrine of Christianity is the doctrine of a Divine humanity. Whatever else Christianity derived from other religions, this, at least, was underived. Whatever else was interwoven into the Christian web from the threads spun by Jewish sage or heathen philosopher, this was not. It was itself the warp on which the whole Christian woof was woven. Both Eastern and Western religions had seen this truth of God and man in one, floating, a nebulous dream, before them, and had tried to resolve it into the guiding-star of their thought, but their efforts closed in failure. The oriental, beginning with God condescending to man, ended, at the very moment when he seemed nearest to the true conception, in a deification of the universe in which God and man were both lost. The Western, beginning with man aspiring to God, found its grave in the Alexandrian Platonism, which, rejecting the deified world of the Greeks, ended in the conception of one divine substance, before which everything finite was only phenomenal, not actual. The Greek ended where the Hindu began. The circle of failure was complete. But the proclamation of the true idea explained the failure, and realised the dream.

Christ came, and the fountain idea of a true union of the divine and human broke upward through the mountain-top of the world, and streamed on all sides down through the radiating valleys of the nations, drawing into itself all the local religious streams, and developing from itself new rivers of spiritual ideas. —Stippord Brooke.

7. Challenges Inquiry.

(1138.) Our religion is a religion that dares to be understood; that offers itself to the search of the inquisitive, to the inspection of the severest and the most awakened reason; for, being secure of her substantial truth and purity, she knows that for her to be seen and looked into is to be embraced and admired; as there needs no greater argument for men to love the light than to see it.

—South, 1633-1716.

8. Will bear investigation.

(1139.) As to the Christian religion, besides the strong evidence which we have for it, there is a balance in its favour from the number of great men who have been convinced of its truth after a serious consideration of the question. Grotius was an acute man, a lawyer, a man accustomed to examine evidence, and he was convinced. Grotius was not a recluse, but a man of the world, who certainly had no bias on the side of religion. Sir Isaac Newton set out an infidel, and came to be a very firm believer. —Dr. S. Johnson.

9. Many of its doctrines are necessarily mysterious.

(1140.) In the nature of the things which are the subject-matter of the Christian religion, there are these three properties which must of necessity render them mysterious, obscure, and of difficult apprehension:—

First, their surpassing greatness and inequality to the mind of man. The Christian religion, as to a great part of it, is but an instrument to convey right conceptions of God into the soul of man, so far as it is capable of receiving them. But how can such vast and mighty things be crowded into a little, finite understanding?

A second qualification of the chief things treated of in our religion, and which must needs render them mysterious, is their spirituality and abstraction from all sensible and corporeal matter; of which sort of things it is impossible for the understanding of man to form to itself an exact idea: so that when we hear or read that God is a Spirit, and that angels and the souls of men are spirits, our apprehensions are utterly at a loss how to form any notion of them, but are put to float and wander in an endless maze of conjectures, and know not certainly what to fix upon. For in this case we can fetch in no information or relief to our understandings from our senses; no picture or draught of these things from the reports of the eye; but we are left entirely to the uncertainties of fancy, to the flights and ventures of a bold imagination.

And here to illustrate the case a little, let us imagine a man who was born blind, able upon bare hearsay to conceive in his mind all the varieties and curiosities of colour, to draw an exact scheme of Constantinople, or a map of France: to describe the towns, point out the rivers, and distinguish the situations of these and the like great extraordinary when such an one is able to do all this, we, then perhaps may we also apprehend, an angel, or an immaterial being is a way of understanding which sufficiently in this consideration, that in all the details we make of God, angels, and spirits, describe them by such things as we see. And have done, do this argument right again on her side: as it would be extremely irrational and man to conclude and affirm positively there neither are nor can be any such things as angels, pictures, or landscapes, because he finds we cannot form to himself any true notion of; so would it be equally, or rather superlatively unreasonable for us to deny the great articles of Christianity, because we cannot frame in our minds any exact representation of them. The Christian religion, which treats of and is conversant about such things, must, of necessity, be mysterious.

A third property of matters belonging to Christianity, and which also renders them mysterious, is their strangeness and unreducibility to the common methods and observations of nature. I, for my part, cannot look upon anything (whatsoever others can) as a more fundamental article of the Christian religion than Christ's satisfaction for sin, by which alone the lost sons of Adam are reconciled to their offended God, and so put into new capacities of salvation; and yet, perhaps, there is nothing more surprising, strange, and out of the road of common reason than this, if compared with the general course and way of men's acting. Now that He who was the offended person should project and provide a satisfaction to Himself in the behalf of those who had offended Him, and with so much zeal solicit a reconciliation with those whom He had no need of being reconciled unto, but might with equal justice and honour have destroyed them, was a thing quite beside the common course of this world; and much more was it so, that a Father should deliver up an innocent and infinitely beloved Son to be sacrificed for the redemption of His justly hated and abhorred enemies; and on the other hand, that a Son who loved His Father as much as He could be loved by Him, should lay down His life for the declared enemies of Him whom He so transcendently loved, and of Himself too; this, I say, was such a transaction, as we can find nothing analogous to in all the dealings of men, and cannot but be owned as wholly beside, if not also directly contrary to, all human methods. And so true is this, that several things expressly affirmed of God in Scripture, relating to the prime articles of our faith, are denied or eluded by the Arians and Socinians, because they cross and contradict the notions taken up by them from what they have observed in created beings, and particularly in men; which yet is a gross fallacy and inconsequence, concluding ab imparibus tanquam paribus, and more than sufficiently blown off by that one passage of the prophet concerning Almighty God, that "His thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor His ways as our ways" (Isa. lv. 8), to which we may add, that neither is His nature as our nature, nor His Divine Persons as our persons.

—South, 1633-1716.

10. Can be judged rightly only from within.

(1141.) You have seen, it may be, an antique, Italian painted window, with the bright Italian sunshine glowing through it. It is the special excellence of pictured glass that the light which falls merely on the outside of other pictures is here inter-fused throughout the work, illuminating the design, and investing it with a living radiance. . . . Christian faith is a grand cathedral, with Divinely pictured windows. Standing without you see no glory, nor can possibly imagine any. Nothing is visible but the merest outline of dusky shapes. Standing within all is clear and defined, every ray of light reveals an army of unspeakable splendours. —Ruskin.

11. How assurance of its truth is to be attained.

(1142.) Our Saviour prescribes men an unfailing method to assure themselves of the truth of this doctrine (John vii. 17). "If any one," says He, "will do the will of the Father, he shall know of My doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of Myself." If men could but be brought to look upon the agenda of Christianity as suitable, they would never judge the credenda of it irrational. There is a strange intercourse and mutual corroboration between faith and practice. For as belief first engages practice, so practice strengthens and confirms belief. The body first imparts heat to the garment, but the garment returns it with advantage to the body. God beams in peculiar evidences and discoveries of the truth to such as embrace it in their affections and own it in their actions.

—South, 1633-1716.

(1143.) You never, in this age of inquiry, can fortify Christianity against the most sifting and critical investigations in regard to its history and its external instruments. There will be an assaulting of revealed religion. But I hold that you no more touch Christianity when you assault it in its external forms of development, than you touch a man when you pierce his robe and do not touch his body, or when you pierce his arm and do not touch his heart. The way to test Christianity is, not to examine its origin, nor to examine its incarnations, but to see whether it has the power to produce the fruits that it declares it has, and whether it produces those fruits. Experimentals are the tests of Christianity, and not those things which are dogmatic, historic, or philosophic, in the ordinary sense of the term. It is to be experimentally discerned. The logic by which it is tested is in the heart.

Here sit philosophers in grave argument round about a harp. It is declared that that was David's harp, and that it is able to make, not only solemn, but all harmonic and wondrous sounds. One man opposes this view, because the wood bears evidence of never having come down from olden times. He says that it evidently is modern wood. Another man examines the strings, and insists upon it that he sees in them proof that it cannot be David's harp. Another man gives it as his deliberate opinion that it not only is not David's harp, but is no harp—that it is an unmusical thing which does not deserve the name of a harp. And so they reason about the instrument for half-a-day, without any of them touching it; until a gray bearded old harper comes in, and instead of answering their objections takes a stool, and sits up to the harp, and sweeping his hand from side to side over the strings, wakes its long-forgotten sounds, and rings out the ballad or the hymn; and then these men sit entranced. They laboured to prove that the instrument was not capable of giving forth music, but neglected to try it; and the moment the old harper laid his hand on it, it was its own argument, and it put to silence its defamers.

We hear men discussing as to whether Christianity is true. Now, Christianity is not a thing of the intellect. It belongs to the soul. It is declared that it is possible for a man's soul to catch hold of God, not only, but to spread out and root itself in universal sympathy with men. No argument can be presented that shall touch that proposition. There is but one way of trying it. Let the hand sweep over the chords of the soul, and if they answer, all argument is impertinent. I declare that the truth of Christianity stands in the experience of it, and that no argument can invalidate it. If a man says "I love God, and I desire the welfare of all mankind, and I am filled with hope and peace," what can take his experience away from him? For Christianity is an experience, not a conviction; it is a possession, not a mere belief of the outward understanding.

To this Christianity I commend you. I commend you to the love of God, to the love of men, and to the life which shall consist in growing up unto Him which is the Head, Christ Jesus, in love.

—Butcher.

12. The experience of Christians is the best evidence that Christianity is from God.

(1144.) If all the blind men in the kingdom should endeavour to bear me down that the sun is not bright, or that the rainbow has no colours, I would still believe my own eyes. I have seen them both, they have not. I cannot prove to their satisfaction what I assert, because they are destitute of sight, the necessary medium; yet their exceptions produce no uncertainty in my mind; they would not—they could not—hesitate a moment, if they were not blind. Just so they who have been taught of God, who have tasted that the Lord is gracious, have an experimental perception of the truth which renders them proof against all the sophistry of infidels. I am persuaded we have many plain people here, who, if a wise man of the world was to suggest that the Bible is a human invention, would be quite at a loss how to answer him by arguments drawn from external evidences; yet they have found such effects from this blessed Book that they would be no more moved by the insinuation, than if they were told that a cunning man, or set of men, invented the sun, and placed it in the firmament. So if a wise Socinian was to tell them that the Saviour was only a man like themselves, they would conceive just such an opinion of his skill in divinity as a philosopher would do of a clown's skill in astronomy, who should affirm that the sun was no bigger than a cart-wheel.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(1145.) I observe a sort of evidence of the truth of Christianity, which none but a Christian can have, and which partly depends upon a moral taste. Like a man who has an ear for music, a Christian will perceive harmony and sweetness where another, who has not this taste, will find nothing but noise.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(1146.) A Christian has also an evidence of experience; like that of a man who has long dwelt in a house which another has only walked round and examined on the outside. The external observer may question whether anything is to be found in the house at which he looks; but it is much too late for us to doubt who have long inhabited the dwelling; we cannot unknow what we have known: we cannot but have the clearest conviction that till we were brought into this house, we were destitute of the shelter, provisions, and comforts which we now enjoy, and of which we are so desirous that others should be partakers. I stand like one who for a long time has been imposed upon by toys and tinsel, but at length feels satisfied that he has found gold. Some, indeed, try to persuade me that I am still imposed upon, and that what I take for gold is but base metal. I therefore proceed to prove my gold by every method of trial which I can devise: I put it into the scale; I try it in the fire; I bring it to the touchstone; I place it under the hammer; and I find it still pure gold. After all this, shall I regard their cry who have never thus tried it, and whose fears and lusts oppose the trial?

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(1147.) I have been informed that not long ago a certain infidel lecturer gave an opportunity to persons to reply to him after his oration, and he was of course expecting that one or two rashly zealous young men would rise to advance the common arguments for Christianity, which he was quite prepared, by hook or crook, to battle with or laugh down. Instead of reasoners, an old lady, carrying a basket, wearing an ancient bonnet, and altogether dressed in an antique fashion which marked both her age and her poverty, came upon the platform. Putting down her basket and umbrella, she began, and said, "I paid threepence to hear something better than Jesus Christ, and I have not heard it. Now, let me tell you what religion has done for me, and then tell me something better, or else you've cheated me out of the threepence which I paid to come in. Now," she said, "I have been a widow thirty years, and I was left with ten children, and I trusted in the Lord Jesus Christ in the depth of poverty, and He appeared for me and comforted me, and helped me to bring up my children so that they have grown up and turned out respectable. None of you can tell what the troubles of a poor lone woman are, but the Lord has made His grace all-sufficient. I was often very sore pressed, but my prayers were heard by my Father in heaven, and I was always delivered. Now, you are going to tell me something better than that—better for a poor woman like me! I have been to the Lord sometimes when I've been very low indeed, and there's been scarcely anything for us to eat, and I've always found His providence has been good and kind to me. And when I lay very sick, I thought I was dying, and my heart was ready to break at leaving my poor fatherless boys and girls, and there was nothing kept me up but the thought of Jesus and His faithful love to my poor soul; and you tell me that it was all nonsense. Those who are young and foolish may believe you, but after what I have gone through I know there is a reality in religion, and it is no fancy. Tell me something better than what God has done for me, or else, I tell you, you have cheated me out of my threepence. Tell me something better!" The lecturer was a good hand at an argument, but such a mode of controversy was novel, and therefore he gave up the contest, and merely said, "Really, the dear old woman was so happy in her delusion he should not like to undeceive her." "No," she said, "that won't do. Truth is truth, and your laughing can't alter it. Jesus Christ has been all this to me, and I could not sit down in the hall and hear you talk against Him without speaking up for Him, and asking you whether you could tell me something better than what He has done for me. I've tried and proved Him, and that's more than you have."

Herein is power, logic invincible, reasoning not to be gainsayed. The testing and proving of God; getting His love really shed abroad in the heart, this is the great internal evidence of the Gospel.

—Spurgeon.

(1148.) What do I care if it should be told to me that Christianity stumbles in philosophy at every step? Let me become personally the recipient of that Divine influence, and my experience is worth more to me than other people's reasonings. You may demonstrate that it is not possible for a flower to grow in a given vale, but if I find it there, what is your reasoning worth to me? Flowers are generally the best evidence as to where they will or will not grow, botanists to the contrary notwithstanding.

I have bought tropical morning-glory seeds for the greenhouse, with the assurance of the seedsman that I could not raise them out of doors. I did raise them out of doors; that is the answer I gave to him. "But," he says "it is not possible, in our summer, to raise them;" but I did it. "The summer is not long enough, or warm enough, to raise them here." I have raised them, and I shall not give up my argument upon that question.

If a man says that there never was a Christ, or that He was only a man, I answer that I have found Him of whom Moses and the prophets spake. I have asked Him, "What wilt Thou?" and He has told me. I have put my soul and my heart, as He has commanded me, into His hand. Will any man now undertake to reason me out of the result? I know in whom I have trusted, and know what He has done for me. Is the music of my life, the inspiration of every faculty, the transformation of my views, the regeneration of my hopes—are these nothing? Am I to go back eighteen hundred years, with the sceptical philosopher, to reason about Jerusalem and about the Lord Jesus Christ, and not reason upon my own actual, daily, positive experience?

If a man, intelligent in other respects, not given to enthusiasm, not diseased by morbid feelings, but rational in all things, whom you would believe in respect to any and all of the transactions of daily life, bears witness, not alone, but with multitudes—with a long succession of witnesses—that there is such a fact as Christ in the soul, and the hope of glory; that there is such an experience as that the Holy Ghost descends into the soul, cleanses it, inspires it, recognises it, fills it with faith, and love, and hope, and joy, and that it abides with us—is not that testimony to be accepted? Will you accept a man's reasoning upon things that happened a thousand years ago, and reject his positive testimony in regard to things that are occurring every day? Nay! When there is a succession of witnesses coming through a period of more than two thousand years down to us, bearing witness in every possible emergency—bearing witness from the stake; from the dungeon; from the battle-field; from the mountain cave; from sick-chambers—when we see human life transformed—characters effulgent from weakness and obscurity—when all the records of the past are made luminous with the memorials of what has been done in men's souls by the power of God through Jesus Christ, are we to take this long cloud of witnesses that have lived but are now passed away, and all that now live and bear the same testimony, and count it all as nothing?

—Becher.

13. Importance of a study of its evidences.

(1149.) "Evidences of Christianity!" exclaims the late Mr. Coleridge in one of the most popular of his prose works; "I am weary of the word. Make a man feel the want of it. . . . and you may safely trust it to its own evidence."

There can be little doubt, I think, that these words express the prevailing sentiments of a very considerable number of Christians at the present day; and it cannot be denied that, for many years back, there has been a general distaste for that apologetic religious literature which was popular in the last century.

This has doubtless been greatly owing to a reaction from the disproportionate attention paid to such literature by the divines of a former age, and has taken place in virtue of that general rule which seems to ordain that an over value of any branch of knowledge in one generation shall be attended by an unjust depreciation of it in the next. The argumentative value of things even so important as the evidences of religion may, unquestionably, engross the public mind too much; and he who is continually occupied in contemplating and stating the proofs of its truth will fail of reaching the just standard of a Christian teacher or a Christian man. Such a person will be like a prince who employs all his time, and strength, and resources in raising fortresses about a territory which he does not carefully govern; or like a landlord who lives but to accumulate muniments of an estate which he neglects to till. But the folly of such conduct would be no excuse for suffering our frontiers to lie open, or our title-deeds to be lost. Yet something very like such advice is sometimes offered to us. Our forefathers, perhaps, were too apt to include all strong energy of emotion and play of fancy in their general and unsparing censures of enthusiasm; and some of us are disposed to redress the balance by appealing exclusively to the imagination and the feelings. We see that it will not do to address the head alone, and therefore we will not address it at all, but speak only to the heart.

—Thomson.

14. What is meant by a "candid" consideration of its evidences.

(1150.) A candid and unbiassed state of mind, which is sometimes called indifference, or impartiality, i.e., of the judgment, does not imply an indifference of the will—an absence of all wish on either side, but merely an absence of all influence of the wishes in forming our decision,—all leaning of the judgment on the side of inclination,—all perversion of the evidence in consequence. That we should wish to find truth on one side, rather than on the other, is in many cases not only unavoidable but commendable; but to think that true which we wish, without impartially weighing the evidence on both sides, is undeniably a folly, though a very common one. If a mode of effectual and speedy cure be proposed to a sick man, he cannot but wish that the result of his inquiries concerning it may be a well-grounded conviction of the safety and efficacy of the remedy prescribed. It would be no mark of wisdom to be indifferent to the restoration of health, but if his wishes should lead him (as is frequently the case) to put implicit confidence in the remedy without any just grounds for it, he would deservedly be taxed with folly.

In like manner (to take the instance above alluded to), a good man will indeed wish to find the evidence of the Christian religion satisfactory, but will weigh the evidence the more carefully, on account of the importance of the question.

—Whately.

18. Its universal adaptation.

(1151.) The grand characteristic of Christianity is adaptation! Its unfolding powers suit themselves to all sorts and conditions of men; its breath of life is native air alike when wafted to the prairies of the West, or borne over the Red Sea waves to the children of the East. It comes like the refreshing rain from heaven passing over the face of the earth, which invigorates equally the tiny blades of grass and the forest monarchs that tower above them. Such is the Gospel of Christ! It comes not for one, but for all. It has a word in season for every man; warning, or comfort, or consolation, support or sympathy for all states and conditions of men.

—Bellrs.

16. Two arguments for its truth.

(1152.) There are two considerations upon which my faith in Christ is built as upon a rock: the fall of man, the redemption of man, and the resurrection of man, the three cardinal doctrines of our religion, are such as human ingenuity could never have invented; therefore they must be Divine. The other argument is this: If the prophecies have been fulfilled (of which there is abundant demonstration), the Scripture must be the Word of God; and if the Scripture is the Word of God, Christianity must be true.

—Dr. Edward Young, the poet:
Cowper to Lady Hesketh, July 12, 1765.

17. Its prohibition of pleasure.

(1153.) Or will they change the note, and instead of pleading that Christianity leads to licentiousness, object that it bears too hard upon the pleasures of mankind, and lays them under too severe restraints; or that its penalties are excessive and cruel? But does it rob mankind of any pleasures worthy the rational nature, worthy the pursuit of creatures formed for immortality, and consistent with the good of the whole? It restrains them indeed, but it is only as a physician restrains his patient from poison or any improper regimen; it restrains men from living like beasts; it restrains them from those pleasures which will ruin their souls and bodies in the event; it restrains them from gratifying a private passion at the expense of the public; in short, it restrains them from making themselves and others miserable. Hard restraint indeed! and the Deists! to be sure, are generous patrons of human liberty, who would free us from such grievances as these! However, this objection lets us into the secret, and informs us of the reason why our pretended free-thinkers are such enemies to Christianity. It is because it checks their lusts, and will not permit them to act as well as to think freely, i.e., as they please.

—Davies.

18. Why it is hated.

(1154.) The cause of enmity against real Christianity is in the heart. The angel Gabriel might exhibit the truth, but the heart would rise in enmity. To suppose that there is any way of preaching the Cross so as not to offend the world, is to know nothing of the subject.

There are many occasions, however, of calling forth this enmity. Any man who should bleed me, would put me to pain; but he would greatly aggravate my pain if he rudely tore my skin. Occasions may render the reception of that truth morally impossible which, under the most favourable circumstances, is received with difficulty.

Ignorance in ministers is an occasion of exciting enmity against Christianity. A man may betray ignorance on almost every subject except the way of salvation; but if others see him to be a fool off his own ground, they will think him a fool on that ground. It is a great error to rail against human learning, so as to imply an undervaluing of knowledge. A man may have little of what is called learning, but he must have knowledge. Bunyan was such a man.

—Cecil.

19. The reasonableness of its requirements.

(1155.) Christianity forbids no necessary occupations, no reasonable indulgences, no innocent relaxations. It allows us to use the world, provided we do not abuse it. It does not spread before us a delicious banquet, and then come with a "touch not, taste not, handle not." All it requires is, that our liberty degenerate not into licentiousness, our amusements into dissipation, our industry into incessant toil, our carefulness into extreme anxiety and endless solicitude. So far from forbidding us to engage in business, it expressly commands us not to be slothful in it, and to labour with our hands for the things that be needful; it enjoins every one to abide in the calling wherein he was called, and perform all the duties of it. It even stigmatises those that provide not for their own, with telling them that they are worse than infidels. When it requires us to "be temperate in all things," it plainly tells us that we may use all things temperately; when it directs us to "make our moderation known unto all men," this evidently implies that, within the bounds of moderation, we may enjoy all the reasonable conveniences and comforts of the present life.

—Porteus.

(1156.) Now you say, alas! Christianity is hard: I grant it; but gainful and happy. I condemn the difficulty when I respect the advantage. The greatest labours that have answerable requitals are less than the least that have no reward. Believe me, when I look to the reward I would not have the work easier. It is a good Master whom we serve, who not only pays, but gives; not only after the proportion of our earnings, but of His own mercy.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

20. Can only be learned by practice.

(1157.) The religion of Jesus Christ is altogether a practical thing. Just consider how we are taught anything else that is practical. It is not by hearing or reading about making shoes that a man becomes a shoemaker, but by trying to make them.

—A. W. Harr.

21. Should govern our whole life.

(1158.) Christianity did not come from heaven to be the amusement of an idle hour, to be the food of mere imagination; to be as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and playeth well upon an instrument. No: it is intended to be the guide, the guardian, the companion of all hours; it is intended to be the food of our immortal spirits ; it is intended to be the serious occupation of our whole existence.

—Bishop Jebb.

22. Its motive power.

(1159.) Go into a large manufacturing establishment. If you will notice carefully, you will perceive a large shaft running the whole length of the building. To this are attached wheels, and bands go from these wheels to other wheels, and in these is inserted short shafting, and to it are attached augers, saws, knives, and chisels ; and by these an immense amount of mechanical work is done. But what is the cause of all this motion ? Where is the secret power which makes all this machinery do the work of five hundred men ? The answer is easily given. It is steam. Let the steam go down, and this whole machinery would become as still and silent as the grave. So is the love of Christ the main-spring of the gospel—the motive-power which puts all the machinery of Christianity in operation.

—C. M. Temple.

23. Is independent of human help.

(1160.) The real security of Christianity is to be found in its benevolent morality, in its exquisite adaptation to the human heart, in the facility with which its scheme accommodates itself to the capacity of every human intellect, in the consolation which it bears to the house of mourning, in the light with which it brightens the great mystery of the grave. To such a system it can bring no addition of dignity or of strength, that it is part and parcel of the common law. It is not now for the first time left to rely on the force of its own evidences and the attractions of its own beauty. Its sublime theology confounded the Grecian schools in the fair conflict of reason with reason. The bravest and wisest of the Cæsars found their arms and their policy unavailing, when opposed to the weapons that were not carnal, and the kingdom that was not of this world. The victory which Porphyry and Diocletian failed to gain is not, to all appearance, reserved for any of those who have, in this age, directed their attacks against the last restraint of the powerful, and the last hope of the wretched. The whole history of Christianity shows that she is in far greater danger of being corrupted by the alliance of power, than of being crushed by its opposition. Those who thrust temporal sovereignty upon her treat her as their prototypes treated her Author. They bow the knee, and spit upon her ; they cry "Hail !" and smite her on the cheek ; they put a sceptre in her hand, but it is a fragile reed ; they crown her, but it is with thorns ; they cover with purple the wounds which their own hands have inflicted on her ; and inscribe magnificent letters over the cross on which they have fixed her to perish in ignominy and pain.

—Macaulay, 1800-1859.

24. Its progress.

(1161.) All the might of the world is now on the side of Christianity. Those barbarous, inchoate powers which still cling to heathenism, are already trembling before the advancing strides of the Christian nations ; Christian just enough to rouse all their energies, and to make them intensely ambitious and on the alert to increase their own dominion, without having learned Christianity's highest lesson, the lesson of love.

Even that heathenism which seems to have some power, is only waiting for its time of decay. In vast, undisturbed forests, whose intertwining boughs exclude the light, moisture is generated, and rills, fed by marshes and quiet pools, unite to form running rivers. But let the trees be cut down, and the ground be laid open to the sun, and the swamps will dry up, and the rivers run no more. So is it with the Brahmins, and with all the effete teachers of heathenism. As long as the dense shadows of ignorance brood over the people, they will possess some little trickling power ; but let the light of knowledge shine in upon the masses, and the channels of their influence will dry up and be forgotten.

Already, war, with its bloody hand, raps at the gate of empire in India and in China. England presses upon them. Russia is steadily moving through cranching snows to the southward. The great nations, like lions roused from their lairs, are roaring and springing upon the prey, and the little nations, like packs of hungry wolves, are standing by licking their jaws, and waiting for their share of the spoils. The world is out hunting—what ? heathenism. And it will be caught ; it will be unearthed. A little while and there will be no den so deep, or forest so dark, or island so remote, that it can find refuge.

—Becher.

(1162.) You tell your child that this pine-tree out here in the sandy field is one day going to be as large as that great sonorous pine that sings to every wind in the wood. The child, incredulous, determines to watch and see whether the field-pine really does grow and become as large as you say it will. So, the next morning, he goes out and takes a look at it, and comes back and says, "It has not grown a particle." At night he goes out and looks at it again, and comes back and says, "It has not grown a bit." The next week he goes out, and looks at it again, and comes back and says, "It has not grown yet." Father said it would be as large as the pine-tree in the wood, but I do not see any likelihood of its becoming so."

How long did it take the pine-tree in the wood to grow ? Two hundred years. Then men who lived when it began to grow have been buried, and generations besides have come and gone since then.

And do you suppose that God's kingdom is going to grow so that you can look at it and see that it has grown during any particular day ? You cannot see it grow. All around you are things that are growing, but that you cannot see grow. And if it is so with trees, and things that spring out of the ground, how much more is it so with the kingdom of God ! That kingdom is advancing surely, though it advances slowly, and though it is invisible to us.

You will remember our Master's beautiful parable, where He says, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal till the whole was leavened." I suppose you know what that means. I go into your kitchen when you are baking bread, and ask, "What is that you are stirring into that flour ?" You say, "It is yeast." I ask, "What is it for ?" You say, "It is to raise the bread." I imagine that it is to raise it in a way that shall be perceptible to my senses, and say, "Let me see it do it." You set the bread away in a warm place, or at the south, in a cool place, if you can find one, and you say, "Now it will rise." After watching it closely for a while, I say to you, "I do not see that it has risen at all." You say, "Bless you, my child, you cannot see it rise!" I go away, and stay till I think it will have come up, if there is any such thing as its coming up, and then go back, but I cannot see that it has undergone any change. I wait and wait, and wait, and at last say, I do not believe it is going to rise." And you say, "It has risen already," and tear it open; and lo! it is full of holes; and you say, "Now do not you believe that it has risen? It has been rising all the time, only you could not see it rise."

Christ says that His kingdom is just like that. It is a great kingdom, which extends all over the world, and into which He has put the leaven of Divine grace. That grace is like yeast, and it works in this kingdom of Christ.

You cannot see it, even if you watch for it; but there it is; and if, after a while, you go and look at it, you will be convinced that it has been working, by the results which it has produced. You will find that things have been done, though you could not see them done. Men are becoming better the world over, though you cannot trace the process by which they are becoming better. Christ's kingdom goes forward from age to age, though you cannot discern the steps by which it is going forward. While men, as individuals, pass off from the stage of life, God's work does not stop. —Bacher.

25. The great obstacle to its progress.

(1163.) The religious world has many features which are distressing to a holy man. He sees in it much proposal and ostentation, covering much surface. But Christianity is deep and substantial. A man is soon enlisted; but he is not soon made a soldier. He is easily put into the ranks, to make a show there; but he is not so easily brought to do the duties of the ranks. We are too much like an army of Asiatics: they count well, and cut a good figure; but when they come into action, one has no flint, another has no cartridge—the arms of one are rusty, and another has not learnt to handle them. This was not the complaint equally at all times. It belongs, too, peculiarly to the present day. The fault lies in the muster. We are like Falstaff: he took the king's money to press good men and true, but got together such ragamuffins that he was ashamed to muster them. What is the consequence? People groan under their connections. Respectable persons tell me such stories of their servants who profess religion as to shame and distress me. High pretensions to spirituality! Warm zeal for certain sentiments! Priding themselves in Mr. Such-a-one's ministry! But what becomes of their duties?—Oh, these are "beggarly elements" indeed! Such persons are alive to religious talk; but if you speak to them on religious tempers, the subject grows irksome. —Cecil, 1748–1810.

(1164.) Tomochichi, chief of the Chickasaws, said to Wesley, "I will go up and speak to the wise men of the nation, and I hope they will hear. But we would not be made Christians as the Spaniards make Christians; we would be taught before we are baptized." He felt the want unconsciously acknowledged by the King of Siam, spoken of by John Locke in his chapter on Probability. A Dutch ambassador, when entertaining the king with the peculiarities of Holland, amongst other things told the sovereign that the water in Holland would sometimes in cold weather be so hard that men walked upon it, and that it would bear an elephant if he were there. To which the king replied, "Hitherto I have believed the strange things you have told me, because I looked upon you as a sober, fair man, but now I am sure you lie." But Tomochichi had an eye that saw the faults of the colonists, if he did not understand their religion. When urged to listen to the doctrines of Christianity, he keenly replied, "Why, there are Christians at Savannah! there are Christians at Frederica! Christian much drunk! Christian beat men! Christian tell lies! Devil Christian! Me no Christian!" This recalls the pathetic story of the West Indian cazique, who, "at the stake, refused life, temporal or eternal, at the price of conversion, asking where he should go to live so happily. He was told—in heaven; and then he at once refused, on the ground that the whites would be there; and he had rather live anywhere, or nowhere, than dwell with such people as he had found the white Christians to be." Almost the first word, says Dr. Medhurst, uttered by a Chinese, when anything is said concerning the excellence of Christianity, is, "Why do Christians bring us opium, and bring it directly in defiance of our laws? The vile drug has destroyed my son, has ruined my brother, and well-nigh led me to beggar my wife and children. Surely those who import such a deleterious substance, and injure me for the sake of gain, cannot wish me well, or be in possession of a religion better than my own. Go first and persuade your own countrymen to relinquish their nefarious traffic; and give me a prescription to correct this vile habit, and then I will listen to your exhortations on the subject of Christianity!"

—Russell.

26. Is indestructible.

(1165.) There is a picture frontispiece in Wycliffe's Bible which, to my mind, is very significant, very prophetic. There is a fire burning and spreading rather rapidly, representing Christianity; and around the spreading fire are congregated a considerable number of significant and most important individuals, all endeavouring to devise methods whereby they can put the fire out. Among the number I see there one gentleman with horns and a tail, I suppose representing his Satanic Majesty; and another is the Pope of Rome, with a few red coated cardinals; Mahomet I believe has a representative there too, and there is another representative of infidelity; and they are all devising some means, suggesting some method whereby to extinguish the fire, and after considerable cogitation one of them suggests that they should all make a desperate effort to blow on the fire till they blow it out. The resolution is adopted, and there they are, with swollen cheeks and extended lips, blowing upon the fire with all their might, but, instead of blowing it out, they are blowing it up, and they blow themselves out of breath before they blow the fire out. It is an unquenchable flame, and no human power can extinguish it. —R. Roberts.

27. Its ultimate triumph.

(1166.) I stood some years ago on the top of the Riffelberg, that grand mountain which springs out of the valley of the Zermat. It was early morning. The stars were still shining with a lustre that became dimmer and dimmer in the light shed from the as yet uncertain sun. There was darkness in the valley, and silence, except for the sound of waterfalls, on the right and on the left. Suddenly the peak Mount Cervin was illuminated, and then one by one the whole amphitheatre of mountains was kindled by the king of day, and the more he ascended into the heavens the more his light was diffused, till the shadows were startled and chased away from the valley, and night had gone from the soil. Thus shall it be with the Bible, and thus shall it be with Him who is its Lord, its Giver, and its Theme. He shall rise more and more, covering mountains and filling valleys, until the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord, and He shall reign for ever and ever. —Mellor.

(1167.) We see some signs of the fulfilment of the prediction. But the question I ask is this—Is it our prerogative, our duty, to go by signs, or have we to take our stand on a command and a promise to go and execute that command whether the sign appear or do not appear? The Israelites received a command to go and take Jericho, and they went. The city was to be taken by circumambulation. They went round once, but not a brick of the walls fell, and they went round a second time, and a third, fourth, fifth, and sixth time, and still all the bricks were there; firmly cemented, and the walls stood. The defenders of Jericho would look on those wonderful walkers, and one can imagine them saying, It is a new mode of assault you are adopting; we wonder how long you will have to walk before the walls fall; Jericho will stand for a long time if it is to be taken by walking. Nevertheless, the Israelites held in their hands the promise, and they felt it in their hearts, and they went round the last time and the walls fell to the ground. And if it should be so that the final triumph of Christianity should come thus suddenly, why should we look for signs? Does not the Lord say that the kingdom of God cometh not by observation? We know therefore that we shall accomplish our purpose. Does not our Lord say, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but not one jot or tittle of My Word shall pass away?" —Mellor.

(1168.) We cannot despair of success. What, though the dreary winter of the world's moral life may have lasted far longer than the eager hopes of the Church anticipated? What, though the thick darkness of an apparently eternal night may have hung for centuries over the vast majority of our race? We do not, we cannot despair. Not suddenly—not in a moment—was it reasonable to expect that the bright and blessed change would come. When the morning dawns and struggles with the gloom of night, how doubtful, how gradual is the progress of the conflict. Silently, and we know not when, the darkness begins to melt in the east, but heavy clouds may still resist the splendour of the sun. Gleams of the coming brightness shoot up the heavens, their lines of glory quiver along the horizon, and prophesy the approaching day; but the mists still hang gloomily in the skies, and threaten to bring the hours of darkness back; and yet the ultimate victory of the light is secure. When the winter begins to feel the thrilling influence of spring, for how long a time is the triumph hindered and delayed. Bitter winds by day, and frosts by night, prolong the desolation, and retard the life which is struggling into faint and tender beauty. Even when in more southern lands the wild flowers have begun to blossom, and the trees are robed in the sweet fresh beauty of their young foliage, travel northwards, and the ground is hard and bare, and the forests are standing in the grim nakedness of winter still. But there is no uncertainty about the issue; the winds become more genial, and fruitful rains begin to fall, and the heat of the sun becomes more intense, and the silent presence of Spring steals upwards from the warmer south across the fields of the north, and at last the whole earth is bright with beautiful blossoms, as far as the eye can see, along the course of rivers and wide-spreading plains, and even up the gaunt sides of rugged mountains there is the luxuriant and living green.

Yes; Christ is a light to lighten the Gentiles—and the glory of the upper heavens shall yet scatter and chase away the darkness which still broods sullenly over the earth; and the new, Divine life, long repressed, shall yet reveal itself in fair and wonderful and lavish fertility; the very deserts of the world shall be covered with a moral wealth and beauty of which the brightest spring time and the richest autumn are poor and pale symbols, and of which the loveliness of Paradise was only a dim and imperfect promise. The songs which filled the night with joy when Christ was born shall be heard again, with sweeter music, deeper harmonies, and more exulting raptures; all heaven shall come down to earth,—thrones and dominions, seraphim and cherubim, and shining armies of angels,—to celebrate with sounding trumpets and golden harps and loud acclamations and tumultuous strains of triumph, the final victory of Divine love over human sin, and the restoration of our race to God. We are not "mad" in exulting in these happy and confident expectations. God's mercy is mightier than all the powers of the world, the flesh, and the devil. We—fanatics, as men may deem us—"speak the words of truth and soberness."

—R. W. Dale.

28. How its triumph is to be secured.

(1169.) Let me show Christianity, not in ideas but in living men, and in companies of them, and it will be triumphant wherever it is seen.

Is there anything that Protestants repudiate so much as Roman Catholics? Is there anything that they have a more salutary horror of than these same Roman Catholics? And yet, when the war is raging, and there is pestilence in the camp, and men are sick and dying in the hospitals, let those meek-eyed Sisters of Mercy go there and minister to the wants of Protestant boys, being tender and gentle with them, never seeking to breathe any ideas into their minds that their mothers would not, night and day walking in and out full of disinterestedness and delicacy, and diffusing about them an influence of cheer and hope; and let those noble boys go home; and let any man dare to speak a word against these kind creatures, and they will turn with clenched hand, and say, "I will beat you to the dust if you speak against them, just as quick as I would if you spoke against my mother or my sister!"

What has overcome their prejudice against the Catholics? Is it the edict of the Pope? Is it the arguments of the priests? Is it the influence of the adherents of that Church? Is it any charm of its service? No, it is the pure lives of some of its members. Those are arguments which no man wants to refute. If there were more such lives there would be less atheism.

Do you suppose that men would conspire to kick out of the heavens the sun, which is the source of their harvests, and all that is beautiful, and every thing that makes life desirable? Men want the sun. And do you suppose that if God were pictured to men as transcendent in beauty, as glorious in holiness, and as in sympathy with men, they would want to be atheists? They would call out for Him. They would watch for Him as in the night men watch for the morning. But if God is held up as a crystal, cut on the edges, I do not wonder that men are atheistic, pantheistic, and infidel. And if you take Christianity according to your sect, or church, or creed, and offer it to men, I do not wonder, that they feel that they are fed with sand or bran. But if you bring the fruit of the Spirit to men they will not reject it; they will accept it with gladness.

—Becher.

CHURCH. THE.

I. IS BELOVED OF GOD.

(1170.) Let the head of a family ascend a lofty eminence, and looking on hill and dale and river, and all the beauteous prospects which is poured in rich profusion beneath his feet, suddenly his eye is arrested by his own peaceful dwelling, where he has enjoyed the tender charities of love, where the partner of his bosom and little ones are nestled; it is here his affections are drawn, here he dwells in imagination with a fondness, an interest, which creation's beauties cannot excite in him. So is it with God as it respects His beloved Zion. The infinite Jehovah, who has called forth at His bidding creation's glories—the great Father of His family, which He has adopted in Christ Jesus, surveys creation—looks down upon the world, but sees no object round the spacious globe from east to west, from pole to pole, so fair in His divine esteem as Zion is: "This is My rest for ever, saith the Lord; here will I dwell." The seat of His desire and palace of His presence is the Church.

—Salter.

II. EMBRACES ALL BELIEVERS, AND BELIEVERS ONLY.

(1171.) True it is, this one Church may have many parts; as the ocean sea is but one, yet distinguished according to the regions upon which it lies. And so there is the German Ocean, the Spanish Ocean, the English Ocean, the Irish Ocean, and the like. And thus there is a church in Geneva, a church in France, a church in Scotland, a church in England, and yet but one militant Church upon the earth.

Reason: For as a kingdom, divided into many shires, and more towns and villages, is called one, because it hath one and the same king, one and the same law; so the Church is one, because it liveth by one and the same Spirit, and is ruled by one and the same Lord, and professeth one and the same faith; hath one and the same hope, and hath been baptized with one and the same baptism.

—Rogers, 1594-1660.

(1172.) A man's wife is his wife, though she be never so perverse and disobedient to him; but no soul is one of His Church and Spouse, nor owned by Christ as such, unless she become subject to Him.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(1173.) There is but one Universal Church of Christians in the world, of which Christ is the only King and Head, and every Christian is a member. . . . If then thou hast faith, and love, and the Spirit, thou art certainly a Christian, and a member of Christ, and of this universal Church of Christians. . . . As thou art a subject of the king, and a member of this kingdom, whatever corporation thou be a member of (perhaps sometime of one, and sometime of another); so thou art a subject of Christ, whatever particular church thou be of: for it is no church if they be not Christians, or subjects of Christ. For one sect then to say, Ours is the true Church, and another to say, Nay, but ours is the true Church, is as mad as to dispute whether your hall, or kitchen, or parlour, or coal-house is your house; and for one to say, This is the house, and another, Nay, but it is that: when a child can tell them, that the best is but a part, and the house containeth them all.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1174.) My next address is to them that are so solicitous to know which is the true Church among all the parties in the world that pretend to it. Silly souls! they are hearkening to that party, and to that party, and turn it may be to one, and to another, to find the true universal Church. I speak not in contempt, but in compassion. You are in the wood, and cannot find it for trees: but you ask, Which of these sort of trees is the wood? Is it the oak, or the ash, or the elm, or poplar? or is it the hawthorn, or the bramble? Why, it is all together. You are studying which of the members is the man: Is the hand the man? or is it the foot? or is it the eye? or the head? or which is it? Why, it is the whole body and soul, in which all parts and faculties are comprised. You wisely ask, Which part is the whole? Why, no part is the whole. Which is the Catholic Church? Is it the Protestants, the Calvinists, or the Lutherans, the Papists, the Greeks, the Æthiopians, or which is it? Why, it is never any one of them, but all together that are truly Christians. Good Lord! what a pitiful state is the poor Church in, when we must look abroad and see such abundance running up and down the world, and asking, Which is the world? whether this country be the world, or that country be the world? They are as it were running up and down England to look for England, and ask, Whether this town be England, or whether it be the other? They are as men running up and down London to inquire for London, and ask, Whether this house be London, or that street be London? or some other? Thus they are in the midst of the Church of Christ inquiring after the Church, and asking, Whether it be this party of Christians, or whether it be the other? Why, you dotting wretches, it is all Christians in the world of what sort soever, that are truly so, that constitute the Catholic Church.

Indeed if your question were only, Which is the purest, or soundest, or safest part of the Church, then there were some sense in it, and I could quickly give you advice for your resolution. If you only ask, Whether the parlour or the coal-house be the better part or room of the house? or Whether the bramble or the oak be the better part of the wood? I should soon give you an answer. So if you ask, Whether the Protestants, or Papists, or Greeks, be the sounder part of the Church? I should soon answer you. The same family may have in it both infants and men at age, sound men and sick men; some that have but small distemper, and some that have the plague or leprosy: and yet all are men, and members of the family : and so hath the Church of God such members.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1176.) From a small town that lay in the bosom of gently swelling hills rose, some with spires and some without them, three or four churches belonging to the chief denominations of our country—the sign at once of our religious liberties and religious earnestness. On a sweet summer evening a traveller looked along the valley on this peaceful scene, when a shower of rain was falling. Suddenly the sun broke out, and flung a bright bow on the cloud that, like that of mercy, discharged its showers on all. The rainbow encircled within its arms suburb and city, lofty church and humble meeting house. And was it not a true and happy fancy that saw in this heavenly bow an emblem of that covenant which, irrespective of minor differences, embraces all believers within the same arms of mercy?

—Guthrie.

(1177.) The Church is a garden laid out in many beds which vary in shape with the nature of the ground. Some of the under-gardeners regret there is not one large bed within one and the same border. Others would have all the beds of the same form, some advocating the square shape, others the circular, others the oval. A few of the gardeners, however, regarded by some of their fellow-labourers as lax and dangerous in their opinions, think that the existing arrangement may be best after all, the variety favouring both beauty and productiveness. Some, not satisfied that the shape of the bed they are appointed to cultivate distinguishes it from others, fence it with a thick and lofty hedge, within which they carefully shut themselves up, and by which the rest of the garden is so concealed from them that they begin to fancy their little section is the whole of it. But when God's bright sun arises it shines on all the garden, heeding not the fences, which only serve to cast a dark shadow on the beds they shut off from the rest; and the impartial showers fall, and the refreshing dews distil, on all alike. And the same flowers bloom in all; and from mignonette and rose the bees gather the same honey, heedless of the fences. Those gardeners who, while retaining the shape of their several borders, content themselves with hedges the lowest and the thinnest, are best able to look beyond their own enclosure, and to derive pleasure from viewing the fruits and flowers that flourish elsewhere.

—Newman Hall.

III. ALL ITS MEMBERS ARE IMPERFECT.

(1178.) The Church of Christ is a common hospital, wherein all are in some measure sick of some spiritual disease or other, that we should all have ground of exercising mutually the spirit of wisdom and meekness.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

IV. THOUGH IT CONTAINS MANY UNHOLY PERSONS, YET EVEN THE VISIBLE CHURCH IS HOLY.

(1179.) To the saints of God (Eph. i. 1). Though we have sins too many, yet the better part gives the name. Corn-fields we see have many weeds, yet we call them corn-fields, not fields of weeds; so here.

—Bayne, 1617.

(1180.) As a heap of wheat, though it have chaff in it, is yet called wheat; or as a tun of wine, though it have lees in it, is yet called wine; or as a field wherein tares appear with the wheat is called a corn-field: even so the visible Church is the Church. Though it consisteth of good and bad, and be mixed of the elect and reprobate, yet are they called God's Church for the elect's sake, and have their denomination from the better, not the bigger part.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(1181.) This profession may be much in the dark, and not be so visible as before; as a field of corn overtopped by weeds looks at a distance as if it were nothing else but the blue and red cockle and darnel, but when we come near we see that the good grain shows its head as well as the weeds. So among a professing people there will be some somewhere or other.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(1182.) The visible Church is much larger than the mystical, though but one Church; that is, the Church hath more professing than regenerate members, and will have to the end of the world, and none must expect that they be commensurate.

As a corn-field,—1. corn, 2. straw and chaff, and 3. weeds and stricken ears,—is denominated from the corn, which is the chief (preserved) part; but the straw must not be cast out because it is necessary for the corn; but the weeds must be pulled up, except when doing it may hurt the wheat: even so the Church hath, 1. sincere Christians from whom it is denominated; 2. Close hypocrites, whose gifts are for the good of the sincere, and must not be cast out by the pastors; 3. Heretics and notorious wicked men, who are impenitent after due admonition; and these must be cast out, except when it may hazard the Church.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1183.) In every corn-field there are plants of sickly as well as of luxuriant appearance, supplying a fit emblem of the various characters which compose the true Church of Christ. Some indeed are stunted in their growth by various causes; others ripening into the full measure of the stature of Christ, having received a larger measure of the spirit of all grace, and enjoyed a more copious effusion of the beams of the Sun of Righteousness. Yet these must be permitted to mingle together till the harvest. Each have their separate uses; and as the wise husbandman is content and thankful if the weeds do not overpower the corn, so the wise Christian will be grateful to God that errors both in doctrine and practice are not more abounding than they are, being satisfied that in the final issue and separation of the tares from the corn, there will be nothing to complain of; but on the contrary, that the purposes of God will work their way through all human hypocrisy and weakness, so as to fulfil the truth of the gracious promise (Matt. iii. 12).

V. HER MISSION.

(1184.) The true and grand idea of a church is a society for the purpose of making men like Christ,—earth like heaven,—the kingdoms of the world the Kingdom of Christ.

—Arnold, 1795-1842

(1185.) There is a new-fangled modern doctrine that the Church is bound to take care of its own subjects, and not go out of itself to meddle with other subjects. That is, in my judgment, as if the sun should take counsel with itself, and say, "Here am I, a splendid old sun, and I have got to take care of my light : everything depends on me, and it will not do for me to compromise myself, and go into that deep valley, into that dark cave, or into that obscure thicket. My business is to keep bright, and take care of myself." What kind of a sun would it be that should talk thus? But you will find ministers and churches talking in the same way. They say, "It is the business of the Church to take care of religion." Did Christ die for religion, or did He die for man? I had always supposed that the business of the Church was to take care of men. Suppose a mother should say, "My business is to take care of maternal and filial love, and not of my children!" She would exhibit the same wisdom that you see in churches and ministers when they declare that it is their business to take care of religion. Why, it is the most hideous form of selfishness out of hell—this attempt of a great moral institution, that is set to be the light of the world, and the teacher of men in every visible relation in life, and that is ordained to lay the law of God on thought and feeling and conduct, to draw back from its great work, and say, "It is not our business to take care of those things." It is fundamental apostasy. It is egregious recreancy. And that dark-lantern Church that shines on nothing outside, and only on that which is inside of itself, does not belong to Christ. Who owns it? I do not pretend to say!

—Becher.

(1186.) A church is corrupted when it wants Christianity for its own peace, and not for the amelioration of persons that are not members of it. When a lighthouse-keeper, on a stormy, dark, tempestuous night, is told to go into his attic and take care of the lantern, why does he receive such instruction? Because the ocean-burdened ship afar off, and a long way from home, is coming upon the coast. He is to do it, because wind-driven craft are creeping toward the land, and need the guidance of the light. It is for the sake of the imperilled mariner that he is sent to take care of the lantern. But suppose he should say, "I am instructed to take care of this light;" and should put up the shutters, saying, "The wind is not going to blow this light out;" and should hang curtains over all the cracks, saying, "I will keep out every breath of air." The light is safe, and it illumines the little room in which it burns; but on the sea it is dark. He might just as well let the light go out; for the only object in keeping it is that those on the deep who are approaching the shore may be directed by it. Now churches are God's lighthouses, and He says to them, "Shine out for the poor, the ignorant, the wretched, the neglected." "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

—Becher.

VI. THE CHURCH IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

(1187.) The Church has many times been compared by divines to the ark of which we read in the Book of Genesis; but never was the resemblance more perfect than during that evil time when she rode alone, amidst darkness and tempest, on the deluge beneath which all the great works of ancient power and wisdom lay entombed, bearing within her that feeble germ from which a second and more glorious civilisation was to spring.

—Macaulay, 1800-1859.

VII. THE CHURCH AND THE BIBLE.

(1188.) God speaks in the Scriptures, and by it teaches the Church herself; and therefore His authority in the Scriptures is greater, the authority of Him that teaches, than of those by whom He teaches: as the authority of a king in his laws is greater than that of an officer that proclaims them. A king may by his council or judges acquaint his subjects with his laws; but will it therefore follow, because he speaks his mind which is in those laws by such officers, that their authority is greater than that of those laws themselves? God speaks by the Church (the true Church we mean); but He speaks nothing by her but what He speaks in the Scriptures, which she does only ministerially declare to us: and therefore the authority of God and His law is above hers, who, though she publish, yet did not make it, but is herself subject to it, and by that law only stands obliged to publish it to others. [See THE BIBLE. 533-534.]

—Owen, 1616-1683.

VIII. HER AUTHORITY TO ORDAIN CERE-MONIES.

(1189.) It is no more disgrace to Scripture to have left things free to be ordered by the Church, than for nature to have left it to the wit of man to devise his own attire.

—Hooker, 1586-1647.

IX. HER UNITY.

1. In what it consists.

(1190.) This unity, whereof the apostle speaks, consists in submission to one single influence or spirit. Wherein consists the unity of the body? Consists it not in this, that there is one life uniting, making all the separate members one? Take away the life, and the members fall to pieces; they are no longer one; decomposition begins, and every element separates, no longer having any principle of cohesion or union with the rest.

There is not one of us who, at some time or other, has not been struck with the power there is in a single living influence. Have we never, for instance, felt the power wherewith the orator unites and holds together a thousand men as if they were but one; with flashing eyes and throbbing hearts all attentive to his words, and by the difference of their attitudes, by the variety of expressions of their countenances, testifying to the unity of that single living feeling with which he had inspired them? Whether it be indignation, whether it be compassion, or whether it be enthusiasm, that one living influence made the thousand for the time one. Have we not heard how, even in this century in which we live, the various and conflicting feelings of the people of this country were concentrated into one, when the threat of foreign invasion had fused down and broken the edges of conflict and variance, and from shore to shore was heard one cry of terrible defiance, and the different classes and orders of this manifold and mighty England were as one? Have we not heard how the mighty winds hold together as if one the various atoms of the desert, so that they rush like a living thing across the wilderness? And this, brethren, is the unity of the Church of Christ, the subjection to the one uniting spirit of its God.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

(1191.) Unity, is that it subsists between things not similar and alike, but things dissimilar or unlike. There is no unity in the separate atoms of a sand-pit ; they are things similar ; there is an aggregate or collection of them. Even if they be hardened in a mass they are not one, they do not form a unity ; they are simply a mass. There is no unity in a flock of sheep ; it is simply a repetition of a number of things similar to each other. If you strike off from a thousand five hundred, or if you strike off nine hundred, there is nothing lost of unity, because there never was unity. A flock of one thousand or a flock of five is just as much a flock as any other number.

On the other hand, let us turn to the unity of peace which the apostle speaks of, and we find it is something different ; it is made up of dissimilar members, without which dissimilarity there could be no unity. Each is imperfect in itself, each supplying what it has in itself to the deficiencies and wants of the other members. So, if you strike off from this body any one member, if you cut off an arm, or tear out an eye, instantly the unity is destroyed ; you have no longer an entire and perfect body, there is nothing but a remnant of the whole, a part, a portion ; no unity whatever.

This will help us to understand the unity of the Church of Christ. If the ages and the centuries of the Church of Christ, if the different churches whereof it was composed, if the different members of each church were similar, one in this, that they all held the same views, all spoke the same words, all viewed truth from the same side, they would have no unity ; but would simply be an aggregate of atoms, the sand-pit over again.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

(1192.) The unity the Scriptures speak of does not mean agreement in doctrine, nor yet concord and mutual good will ; though these are strongly insisted on by the apostles. Nor, again, does it mean that all Christians belong, or ought to belong, to some one society on earth. This is what the apostles never aimed at, and what never was actually the state of things, from the time that the Christian religion extended beyond the city of Jerusalem. The Church is undoubtedly one, and so is the human race one ; but not as a society or community, for, as such, it is only one when considered as to its future existence. The teaching of Scripture clearly is, that believers on earth are part of a great society (church or congregation), of which the Head is in heaven, and of which many of the members only "live unto God," or exist in His counsels,—some having long since departed, and some being not yet born. The universal Church of Christ may therefore be said to be ONE in reference to HIM, its supreme Head in heaven ; but it is not one community on earth. And even so the human race is one in respect of the One Creator and Governor ; but this does not make it one family or one state. And though all men are bound to live in peace, and to be kindly disposed towards every fellow creature, and all bound to agree in thinking and doing whatever is right, yet they are not at all bound to live under one single government, extending over the whole world. Nor, again, are all nations bound to have the same form of government, regal or republican, &c. That is a matter left to their discretion. But all are bound to do their best to promote the great objects for which all government is instituted,—good order, justice, and public prosperity.

And even so the apostles founded Christian churches, all based on the same principles, all sharing common privileges—"One Lord, one faith, one baptism,"—and all having the same object in view, but all quite independent of each other. And while, by the inspiration of Him who knew what was in man, they delineated those Christian principles which man could not have devised for himself, each church has been left, by the same Divine foresight, to make the application of those principles in its symbols, its forms of worship, and its ecclesiastical regulations ; and while steering its course by the chart and compass which His holy Word supplies, to regulate for itself the sails and rudder according to the winds and currents it may meet with.

Now, I have little doubt that the sort of variation resulting from this independence and freedom, so far from breaking the bond, is the best preservative of it. A number of neighbouring families, living in perfect unity, will be thrown into discord as soon as you compel them to form one family, and to observe in things intrinsically indifferent the same rules. One, for instance, likes early hours, and another late ; one likes the windows open, and another shut ; and thus, by being brought too close together, they are driven into ill-will by one being perpetually forced to give way to another. Of this character were those disputations which arose (though they subsequently assumed a different character) about Church music, the posture of the communicants, the colours of a minister's dress, the time of keeping Easter, &c.

—Whately.

(1193.) If unity has been lost, truth has been preserved to us. And this is our consolation. If the Church be not the great ocean, vast, bright, fresh, a counterpart of the blue heaven above it, still she is like the hundred lakes that nestle among the sheltering hills ; they know not each other, but every one of them reflects, and truly, the firmament above. So far as salvation by Christ is brought home to men by the teaching of the churches, so long there is an underlying bond of agreement which outward misunderstanding cannot conceal. We are one in the one witness that we bear to Jesus, in the one hope that we awaken through His gospel, in the one common direction towards which our faces turn, waiting till the dark sky shall kindle with the Orient flush of His glorious reappearing.

—Archbishop Thomson.

2. Uniformity is not essential to unity.

(1194.) Men have formed to themselves two ideas of unity : the first is a sameness of form—of expression—the second an identity of spirit. Some of the best of mankind have fondly hoped to realise a unity for the Church of Christ which should be manifested by uniform expressions in everything. Their imaginations have loved to paint, as the ideal of a Christian Church, a state in which the same liturgy should be used throughout the world, the same ecclesiastical government, even the same vestment, the same canonical hours, the same form of architecture. They could conceive nothing more entirely one than a Church so constituted that the same prayers, in the very same expressions, at the very same moment, should be ascending to the Eternal Ear.

There are others who have thrown aside entirely this idea as chimerical; who have not only ceased to hope it, but even to wish it, who if it could be realised would consider it a matter of regret; who feel that the minds of men are various, their modes and habits of thought, their original capacities and acquired associations, infinitely diverse; and who, perceiving that the law of the universal system is manifoldness in unity, have ceased to expect any other oneness for the Church of Christ than that of a sameness of spirit showing itself through diversities of gifts. Among these last was the Apostle Paul; his large and glorious mind rejoiced in the contemplation of the countless manifestations of spiritual nature beneath which he detected one and the same pervading mind. Now let us look at this matter somewhat more closely.

1. All real unity is manifold. Feelings in themselves identical find countless forms of expression; for instance, sorrow is the same feeling throughout the human race; but the Oriental prostrates himself upon the ground, throws dust upon his head, tears his garments, is not ashamed to break out into the most violent lamentations. In the north we rule our grief; suffer not even a quiver to be seen upon the lip or brow, and consider calmness as the appropriate expression of manly grief. Nay, two sisters of different temperament will show their grief diversely; one will love to dwell upon the theme of the qualities of the departed; the other feels it a sacred sorrow, on which the lips are sealed for ever. Yet would it not be idle to ask which of them has the truest affection? Are they not both in their own way true? In the East, men take off their sandals in devotion; we exactly reverse the procedure, and uncover the head. The Oriental prostrates himself in the dust before his sovereign; even before his God the Briton only kneels: yet would it not again be idle to ask which is the essential and proper form of reverence? Is not true reverence in all cases modified by the individualities of temperament and education? Should we not say, in all these forms worketh one and the same spirit of reverence?

2. All living unity is spiritual, not formal; not sameness, but manifoldness. You may have a unity shown in identity of form; but it is a lifeless unity. There is a sameness on the sea-beach—that unity which the ocean waves have produced by curling and forcibly destroying the angularities of individual form, so that every stone presents the same monotony of aspect, and you must fracture each again in order to distinguish whether you hold in your hand a mass of flint or a fragment of basalt. There is no life in unity such as this.

But as soon as you arrive at a unity that is living, the form becomes more complex, and you search in vain for uniformity. In the parts it must be found, if found at all, in the sameness of pervading life. The illustration given by the apostle is that of the human body—a higher unity, he says, by being composed of many members, than if every member were but a repetition of a single type.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816–1853.

(1195.) Out of eight hundred millions of the human race a few features diversify themselves into so many forms of countenance that scarcely two could be mistaken for each other. There are no two leaves on the same tree alike; nor two sides of the same leaf; unless you cut and kill it. There is a sacredness in individuality of character; each one born into this world is a fresh new soul intended by his Maker to develop himself in a new fresh way; we are what we are, we cannot be truly other than ourselves. We reach perfection not by copying, much less by aiming at originality; but by consistently and steadily working out the life which is common to us all, according to the character which God has given us.

And thus will the Church of God be one at last—will present a unity like that of heaven. There is one universe in which each separate star differs from another in glory; one Church in which a single spirit, the life of God, pervades each separate soul; and just in proportion as that life becomes exalted does it enable every one to shine forth in the distinctness of his own separate individuality, like the stars of heaven.

—F. W. Robertson, 1816–1853.

(1196.) As uniformity is not unity, so, in the evil sense of the term, variety is not variance; and there may be in the Church of God, as in His works, variety the most diversified, combined with unity the most Divine. There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; and one star differeth from another star in glory. The stars differ in size; they differ in colour; they differ in their distance from the source of light. One has belts, another satellites; some move in eccentric, and others in regular orbits; but by virtue of their fellowship with one central sun, they have fellowship one with another; and as all stars revolving round the sun belong to one solar system, all the minds deriving life, light, and impulse from Christ, however varied in other respects, belong to one Church. This is the dictum of no mere human authority, the speculation of no vain theorist. An apostle himself has announced it; for, writing, not to the men of his own generation alone, but to all for whom the Bible is intended—that is, to all the human race—he teaches, in terms the most unequivocal, that if we have fellowship with that Saviour whom the apostles declare, we have fellowship with the apostles themselves.

—Stanford.

3. Its advantages.

(1197.) Great is the force of unity, peace, and concord. One man serves to strengthen and stablish another, like many staves bound together in one. Many sticks or staves bound together in one bundle are not easily broken; but sever them and pull them asunder, they are soon broken with little strength. Thus the case in all societies, whether it be in the Church, or commonwealth, or in the private family.

—Atterhol, 1618.

(1198.) Union is power. The most attenuated thread when sufficiently multiplied will form the strongest cable. A single drop of water is a weak and powerless thing; but an infinite number of drops united by the force of attraction will form a stream; and many streams combined will form a river; till rivers pour their waters into the mighty ocean, whose proud waves defying the power of man none can stay but He who formed them. And thus forces which acting singly are utterly impotent, are when acting in combination resistless in their energies, mighty in power. And when this great union of the several powers of the Church shall be brought to bear unitedly on one point, its triumph will be the subjection of a world to Christ which now defies the solitary efforts of single forces.

—Salter.

4. How it is to be attained.

(1199.) An apparent union may be produced by none thinking at all, as well as by all thinking alike; but such a union, as Leighton observes, is not produced by the active heat of the spirit, but is a confusion rather arising from the want of it; not a fusing together, but a freezing together, as cold congregates all bodies how heterogeneous soever, sticks, stones, and water: but heat makes first a separation of different things, and then unites those that are of the same nature.

—Salter.

(1200.) For the sake of unity, it is not needful to surrender an iota of the truth, or yield one conscientious conviction, so long as it remains conscientious. It is very common with those who misunderstand the matter, to say, "Come, now, you and I do not think exactly alike; perhaps we are both right, and it is as likely we are both wrong. But it is a point of no moment; what would you say to throw it overboard altogether, and give ourselves no more concern about it?" To which, in many cases, it might be a very just answer—"You may intend this for liberality, but to me it sounds like latitudinarianism. I believe that I found this truth in the Bible; and if so, it is one of the truths of God. I dare not cast it overboard; and I shall be very sorry if having it on board deprives me of your company. If it be so offensive to you that you must needs sail in a separate ship, I hope we shall not hoist hostile flags. But as neither of us holds it vital, might we not agree to differ regarding it; and as we grow in knowledge and in grace, may we not hope that the Lord will reveal even this unto us?" Wherever souls are joined to the Lord Jesus, and His image is visible upon them, there is actual unity of the most important kind. Were this actual unity more frequently made the foundation of a practical unity, there would soon be more doctrinal unity among Christians. But it is an unhallowed mode of procuring practical unity to purchase it at the price of truth. As a compromise of error cannot lead to unity, so "truth in love" will breed no schism. Christian unity is the union of believers—union in the truth—union in the Lord. Like every good and perfect gift, it cometh down from the Father of Lights. It is given where the Holy Ghost is given. Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is love as well as liberty.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(1201.) Heaven is the abode of unity, and when the spirit of unity comes into a soul or into a Church it cometh from above. The Comforter brings it down. Discord is of the earth or from beneath. The divisions of Christians show that there is still much carnality amongst them. The more carnal a Christian is the more sectarian will be, and the more spiritual he is the more loving and forbearing and self-renouncing are you sure to find him. And it is with Christian communities as with individual Christians. When the tide is out, you may have noticed as you rambled among the rocks little pools with little fishes in them. To the shrimp in such a pool his foot depth of salt water is all the ocean for the time being. He has no dealings with his neighbour shrimp in the adjacent pool, though it may be only a few inches of sand that divide them. But when the rising ocean begins to lip over the margin of his lurking place, one pool joins another, their various tenants meet, and by and by in place of their little standing water they have the ocean's boundless fields to roam in. When the tide is out—when religion is low—the faithful are to be found insulated, here a few and there a few, in the little standing pools that stud the beach, having no dealings with their neighbours of the adjacent pools, calling them Samaritans, and fancying that their own little communion includes all that are precious in God's sight. They forget for a time that there is a vast and expansive ocean rising—every ripple, every influx brings it nearer—a mighty communion, even the communion of saints, which is to engulf all minor considerations and to enable the fishers of all pools, the Christians—the Christ-lovers—of all denominations to come together. When like a flood the Spirit flows into the churches, church will join to church, and saint will join to saint, and all will rejoice to find that if their little pools have perished, it is not by the scorching summer's drought, nor the casting in of earthly rubbish, but by the influx of that boundless sea whose glad waters touch eternity, and in whose ample depths the saints in heaven as well as the saints on earth have room enough to range. Yes, our churches are the standing pools along the beach, with just enough of their peculiar element to keep the few inmates living during this ebb-tide period of the Church's history. But they form a very little fellowship—the largest is but little; yet is there steadily flowing in a tide of universal life and love which, as it lips in over the margin of the little pool, will stir its inhabitants with an unwonted vivacity and then let them loose in the large range of the Spirit's own communion. Happy church, farthest down upon the strand, nearest the rising ocean's edge. Happy church, whose sectarianism shall first be swept away in this inundation of love and joy, whose communion shall first break forth into that purest and holiest and yet most comprehensive of all communions, the communion of the Holy Ghost. Would to God that church were ours!

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(1202.) The union of Christians—and of churches, for that matter—is to come from this characteristic spirit of love, or from nothing at all. A physical union of all denominations is manifestly impossible. There can be no such union. Nor will identity of intellect (that is doctrinal sameness), or identity of instruments (that is ecclesiastical institutions), ever constitute a true union. That is to consist, in the mass of men, of the same quality which makes each one of them a child of Christ—namely, the dominant spirit of a pure benevolence. You may attempt to bring churches together; but it is easier to weld iron that is cold than to unite churches by simply making them think and act alike. You must make them feel alike in this one great element of benevolent, gospel, Christian love, before you can unite them. When the ruling element of all denominations in any age shall be love, then there can be no separation of them, except a bodily separation. You cannot build a wall so high or so broad that my heart cannot go over it or through it to the heart of one that I love; and you cannot build a wall in the sanctuary so high or so broad that the hearts of those that love each other cannot get together ; and if you throw down every wall, there can be no unity unless there is love. The union of love is the only union which Christ sought to establish, or which is attainable in this world.

When winter reigns, your birds sing to you in their cage, and in your house, and nobody hears them sing but you ; when winter reigns, your flowers are the light of your parlour ; but when summer comes, you cannot any longer hinder my hearing your robins, though they sing in your orchard, or smelling your honeysuckles, though they twine over your doopost. And when there is throughout Christendom the true spirit of universal love, you cannot hinder the ineffable virtues of men from commingling.

Love is to the soul what perfume is to the air, that, rising, forgets whence it came ; that forgets the cups, and cells, and blossoms, in which it was born. That which is sweetest of all the flowers moves through the air as a universal bounty, and as a common wealth. And the day is to come when, out of each soul, blossoming, shall rise a sweet fragrance that shall mingle with the fragrance of other souls, and when there shall be an ineffable union—a union that is moral and spiritual—between Christians of every name.

—Becher.

5. Love to Christ the sole and sufficient bond of union.

(1203.) The union for which the Lord Jesus prayed was a union of spiritual men—a union not of mere professors but of His true disciples—a union in the Lord. Any other union is little worth. A union of professors with professors of one dead church with another dead church is but a filling of the charnel house, a heaping of the compost-pile. A union of dead professors with living saints, this union of life and death is but to pour the green and putrid water of the stagnant-pool into the living spring. It is not to graft new branches into the goodly vine, but to bandage on dead boughs that will but deform it. It is not to gather new wheat into the garner, but to blend the wheat and chaff again together. It is not to gather new sheep into the fold, but it is to borrow the shepherd's brand and imprint it on the dogs and wolves and call them sheep. The identifying of christened pagans with the peculiar people has done much dishonour to the Redeemer, has deluded many souls, and made it much more difficult for the Church to convince the world.

It was not this amalgamation of the Church and the world which the Saviour contemplated when He prayed for His people's unity. It was a union of spiritual men—a holy unity springing from oneness with Himself. Union with Christ is an indispensable preliminary to union with the Church of Christ. An individual must be joined to Christ before he can be a true member of the Church of Christ. And those individuals and those churches which are the most closely joined to Christ are the nearest to one another, and will be the first to coalesce in the fulfilment of Christ's prayer—"May they all be one !"

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

6. Falsely claimed by the church of Rome.

(1204.) Yes : the great idea of an undivided Church, completely fused and compacted by love and by truth, came down from heaven ; but the treasure was received in earthen vessels which could not contain it : the vessels broke, and the treasure was lost. I know that the Church of Rome insists still that visible unity is a mark of the Church, and that she alone exhibits that mark, and that no other Christian body separated from her can claim the title of a Church, because it wants one of its essential notes. But such pretensions cannot be admitted. The mirror in which the ascended Lord was to be visibly reflected to an admiring world has been broken to pieces. Every fragment still reflects, but more or less perfectly, the Lord of glory. To take up one of the pieces, much defiled by the earth on which it has fallen, and to set in a gaudy frame, and to say, "This fragment is the mirror, and all the rest are nothing," this may deceive some who yearn so much for unity, that they would rather admit than sift the claim. But earnest hearts sicken at the vain pretensions. From east to west, in parts of which Rome know nothing, voices of praise arise to the one Lord of all believers ; and works of good are done in the name and in the power of that Lord. The Lord is their Judge, the Lord is their Lawgiver, the Lord is their King. To deny that they are Christ's seems hardly to stop short of blasphemy against Him whose power is seen among them. That Rome should claim to be the sole trustee of that precious gift, because of the mark of unity, is indeed a bold assumption. Rome, ever more ready to cut off than to embrace ; Rome, that would have nothing to do with those holy aspirations after a purer worship and a truer teaching which brought round the Reformation. Rome, like her sisters, may muse in sorrow over Christ's promise of unity made seeming void by man's sin ; but for her, less than for others, is the arrogant pretension that she alone is the Divine Zion, and all that she has cut off are useless fragments cast into the darkness. And yet so deep-seated is the love for unity, that many have accepted her at her word, and sought in her bosom what she had not to give. Because the flower is withered, they have been fain to clasp to their bosom an artificial flower, different even to the eye from that which it would imitate, but without the life or the odour. All we, the rest, to whom such pretensions are an idle tale, sit brooding on the seeming frustration of a most blessed promise. Where is the one fold, whose sheep is one flock following the leading footsteps of the one Shepherd into green pastures that never fail ? God's promise cannot have been in vain. Man must have hindered it ; God hath not forgotten it !

—Archbishop Thomson.

7. A call to union.

(1205.) The controversies which one evangelic church has with another—and it is a misnomer calling that a church which does not preach the gospel—are very trivial compared with that controversy which the Church of Christ has with the world. One heresy, called "drunkenness," is ruining far more souls than any church is saving. The sect of the Sabbath-breakers outnumber any denomination in England. And there is an infinitely wider interval between the party who deny the sole-sufficiency of the atonement, or who believing it refuse to preach it publicly, than between all the denominations in Europe, whose watchword is the old Reformation talisman—"Jehovah-Tsidkenu—the Lord our Righteousness." And whilst there are many parishes in England and Scotland where a free and full salvation is not preached at all, or preached so obscurely that people cannot understand it, or so timidly that they are afraid to believe it; whilst there are myriads in this very city whom you must compel to come in, or else they will never come into the house of God at all; whilst many are preaching another gospel which is not another, and subverting the grace of God, are we to lavish all our strength on ephemeral controversy and mutual recrimination? Are we to waste the rapid days and allow the harvest to rot upon the fields, whilst we are settling which is the best form of the sickle, and debating in what sort of vehicles we shall carry home the sheaves? Are there not all-important truths for which our concurring testimony, and helping prayers, and mutual countenance, would be all too little to win a nation's reluctant ear; and in the effort to rouse a sleeping world, and convert an ungodly kingdom, will any voice be loud enough except the united cry of an awakening Church? Amongst the higher orders and middling classes of British society are many who make no religious profession, and many more who make a general profession, but on whom Divine realities have such shadowy hold, that in the testing trials of Christian principle you may with painful certainty foretell the result. Amongst the industrious and more independent classes is a fearful multitude, especially in rural places, whom mental torpor and uninquiring ignorance have prepared for any faith or fancy which authority may enjoin: and another multitude, abounding in cities and manufacturing regions, too acute to credit the dreams of superstition, but in ignorance of revelation and in dislike of its restraints, all too ready to hail the scorning infidelity, which in a land of free inquiry is superstition's unfailing satellite. For such a state of things there is but one remedy. It is that only form of truth so important and so true, as to be worthy of the Spirit's demonstration—the truth as it is in Jesus. But to secure wide and efficient circulation for this truth, would need the undiverted strength and diligence of all who know and love it. An evangelical union for evangelical purposes was never more needed than it is this day; and as the materials for such union are not wanting, and the providential call to it is louder every day, why do we postpone? In days of confusion and bloodshed, the first thing that united Europe was a crusade against the infidel. The first thing that will unite a torn and distracted Church will be a cross-exalting war,—a crusade upon the world,—a simultaneous forthgoing in the wake of that banner, which did we lovingly eye and implicitly follow, we should conquer at once the world and ourselves. A CONFEDERACY FOR THE RESUSCITATION OF GOSPEL TRUTH, AND FOR THE REVIVAL OF TRUE RELIGION, WOULD ITSELF BE UNION.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

X. UNIFORMITY.

1. Is not supremely important.

(1206.) A church is none the better for its outward unity, and its magnificent and beautiful forms, if it have no inward life, and no beauty of holiness. "A living dog is better than a dead lion." A living tree, though it shows about it some unnatural offshoots, some crooked growths, yet, if its branches bear some pleasant fruit, is far better than a dead tree of stately form and formal stateliness, whose heart is rotten or whose fruit is cast and withered. There is, away in the Eastern hemisphere, a body of water, whose surface the winds and storms of heaven never ruffle; its outward form is always the same; but whose waters are black and bitter and heavy; no living thing is in them; and beneath them are unsepulchred Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities of the plain. They call it the Dead Sea. So a church may have an outward uniformity, and boast of its unchanging forms and ceremonies, and yet have none living within it. It may be like the garnished sepulchres of the Jews, beautiful in outward appearance, and within the dwelling-place of death. When the visible Church, of any form or order, is unduly exalted, and its ceremonies and government too highly valued, the only source of spiritual life, and the only means of spiritual growth, are likely to be neglected. When the gold seems greater than the temple which sanctified the gold, then the evidence of union with Christ is incomplete; for He is not the head of any particular visible church, but only of the Church invisible and universal. And all true believers seek their spiritual life in Him, by direct and intimate commune of the soul with the Spirit, not through any human meditations, or church order, or sacraments, or rites and forms of worship.

—E. E. Hall.

2. Does not insure unity.

(1207.) Mere denominational uniformity is not Christian unity. It is a favourite project with many in the present day to single out some sect—usually their own—and then say to themselves, "If we could only get all the world to join us there would be unity." And so possessed are they with the notion that the unity of the Church consists in conformity to them; that many of them have determined to know nothing among men, save their Church (meaning their own community) and conformity thereto. Their union is separation from non-canonical Christians; and could they make but one font, one surplice, and one service-book for all, they are persuaded the Church would be one. In place of unity of spirit, they labour for unity of costume. They cannot understand a united family which does not wear a regimental uniform.

We, on the other hand, have seen a uniformity where there was nothing but the form. The Church of the Middle Ages was united just as the sleepers in the funeral vault are united, in the tranquillity of death. It was like listening at the door of a sepulchre: Hush! for all is peace within. Enter, and all is uniform—uniformly dead—black frieze and rottenness—a sepulchre of souls. The Church of the early centuries was united, as scorpions are united when one glass receiver holds them and leaves them room to fret about, and strike their stings into one another. There was uniformity, but it was not unity, for the world did not believe. The world saw it and was hardened; the world saw it and blasphemed. To preserve the unity of the Church they excommunicated or burned alive those who thought or believed for themselves, till faith had well-nigh perished from the earth. The Church became so Catholic, that there was no place found for the Gospel. The union of coercion, or the union which, as the first term of communion, takes away your right of private judgment, is not the union contemplated by Him, the first law of whose kingdom is love, and the first gift of whose Spirit is light.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

3. Is not essential.

(1208.) Different Christians may have their opinions and preferences in favour of different forms of discipline, matters of order and modes of worship. Let each, by all means, enjoy what he prefers, and hold to that of which he is persuaded. The form of the fold is not the source of the life, nor essential to the security of the sheep. His sheep they may be—all belonging to the one flock—and all alike loved and watched over by the one Great Shepherd, though they may be gathered into pens framed after a somewhat different fashion.

—Bisney.

4. Impossible and undesirable.

(1209.) A great stress has indeed been often laid upon uniformity of sentiment and modes of worship; but this, in the present state of human nature, can no more be effected either by force or persuasion, than men can be forced or persuaded to a uniformity of stature or complexion; and if it were practicable, it might prove of little value. The form of religion may be strenuously contended for by those who are strangers to the power of it; but the best form we can conceive, if destitute of power, is lifeless, like the body without the soul.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(1210.) There is one glory of the sun, says St. Paul, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars, for one star differeth from another in glory. Nor, in respect of variety, is heaven itself unlike the firmament which forms its starry floor. Basking in the cloudless sunshine of God's countenance, and engaged day and night in the lofty services of His throne, are different orders of celestials—angels and archangels, seraphim and cherubim, principalities, dominion, and powers—all perfect mirrors of the Divine perfection; yet each class, like the stars beneath their feet, differing from another in glory. And on leaving heaven for earth, we find that, however widely they differ, variety is equally a feature of both. The very globe itself presents a series of heights and hollows, hills and dales, mountains that, towering above the clouds, are covered with eternal snow, and valleys that, robed in flowers and crowned with fruit, lie smiling at their giant feet—often, as the humbler classes of society would be, had they grace to look without envy on those above them, happier in their humility than the mountains that overshadow them in their cold, stormy, lofty, barren pride. A corresponding variety meets and delights us in every department of nature; for though in the services of Divine worship within the Church, some, the worst enemies of unity, insist on uniformity, we may say, as the old philosophers did of vacuum, that Nature abhors it. Uniformity is not the mind or manner of God.

—Guthrie.

5. The absurdity and mischievousness of insisting on it.

(1211.) It seems to me a strange penalty to forbid men to worship God at all, because they think some subscriptions or forms to be sin. More strange than to say, all that will not wear crape shall go naked; or all that will not eat anchovies shall eat nothing. If a man think the use of a crucifix in worship sinful, surely to give over all worship is more sinful. But men have their ways.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1212.) Physicians use their patients with some humanity, and will not say to him that saith, "My stomach cannot take down this potion: I shall cast it up," "You shall take it, or die, or go to prison." Or if one say, "This pill is bigger than my throat can swallow," they will rather say, it shall be made less, than they will cut his throat wider to get it down. And sure the reason is because the law doth make them physicians to none but volunteers, and give them no compelling power. If it did, I know not what inhumanity they might come to. For I will not believe that there is anything in divinity which tendeth to make men more inhuman than physicians. I have seen Jews and others that will eat no swine's flesh; and I have known many that a taste of cheese would cast into a swoon near death; and I never knew any say, "You shall eat this or die;" nor that ever motioned the making of a law, that all men should be imprisoned, or forbidden all other meat, who refused to eat swine's flesh, for fear of tolerating Jews.

But we have priests too many that will say, "Take every oath, promise, or ceremony required of you, or preach not, nor worship God openly at all; take me for your pastor, or you shall have none; hear me, or hear no man; receive the communion from me, or from none; deny not the lawfulness of a ceremony, or be excommunicate."

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1213.) Is it not a strange thing to hear men accuse others for not using the liturgy in God's worship, and at the same time would have them that refuse it to be forbidden all public worshipping of God at all? Doth this signify any dislike of their omitting God's worship? Which is the more ungodly omission? To omit all worship of God and live like atheists, or to omit only so much of the liturgy as the apostles used not? I have known many that could not eat cheese, as is said before (nor scarce smell it,) without danger of death. If you would have a law made that such shall eat no other meat, few wise men will believe that it is their health and life that you desire. If a man fail in paying some excise, or using bow and arrows, will you forbid him paying anything or serving the king at all? Surely they that forbid men all public worship be offended at somewhat else than that men do not rightly worship God, unless they think that not to worship Him at all is better than doing it without their book.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1214.) This vice of pretended certainty and knowledge hath set up several false terms of Christian unity and peace, and by them hath done more to hinder the Church's peace and unity than most devices ever did which Satan ever contrived to that end. By this Church-tearing vice, abundance of falsehoods, and abundance of things uncertain, and abundance of things unnecessary, have been made so necessary to the union and communion of the churches and their members, as that thereby the Christian world hath been ground to powder by the names and false pretences of unity and peace. Just as if a wise statesman would advise His Majesty, that none may be his subjects that are not of one age, one stature, one complexion, and one disposition, that so he might have subjects more perfectly concordant than all the princes on earth besides; and so might be the most glorious defender of unity and peace. But how must this be done? Why, command them all to be of your mind; but that prevaileth not, and yet it is undone. Why, then, they are obstinate, self-willed persons. Well, but yet it is undone. Why, lay fines and penalties upon them. Well, but yet it is undone;—all the hypocrites that had no religion are of the religion which is uppermost, and the rest are uncured. Why, require more bricks of them, and let them have no straw, and tell them that their religion is their idleness, stubbornness and pride, and let your little finger be heavier than your father's loins. But hearken, young counsellors, Jeroboam will have the advantage of all this, and still the sore will be unhealed. Why, then, banish them, and hang them that obey not, till there are none left that are not of one mind. But, sir, I pray you, who shall do it? and who shall that one man be that shall be left to have all the kingdom? You are not such a fool as to be ignorant that no two men will agree in all things, nor be perfectly of the same complexion. If there must be one king, and but one subject, I pray you who shall that one subject be? I hope not he that counsellor it: "Neque enim lex justior ulla est, quam necis artifices arte perire sua." But hark you, sir, shall that one man have a wife or not? If not, the kingdom will die with him: if, yea I dare prognosticate, he and his wife will not be in all things of a mind. If they be, take me for a mistaken man.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

XL. IMPORTANCE OF THE MAINTENANCE OF DUE ORDER.

(1215.) Study to be quiet, and meddle with your own business. The Church of God is as the body of man. In a man's body every part hath his several office, the arm, the leg, the hand, the foot, do what whereto they are appointed; and doing the same, they live together in peace. But if the arm would take in hand to do that is the duty of the leg, or the foot that is the part of the hand, it would breed great disorder in the whole body. So if every man in the Church of God seek to do that to them belongeth, the Church shall flourish and be quiet; but when every man will be busy, and take upon him to look into other; when every private man will govern, and the subject take in hand to rule the prince, all must needs come to wreck and decay.

—Jewel, 1522-1571.

(1216.) As there is an order in God Himself, even in the Blessed Trinity, where, though the persons be co-eternal and co-equal, and the essence itself of the Deity indivisible, yet there is the first, second, and third person. And as in God, so in the whole creation: angels have their orders, thrones and dominions, principalities and powers, and an archangel, that at the last shall blow the trumpet. So it is amongst the saints, the souls of just men perfected: all of them have enough, none of them want; yet there is a difference in the measure of their glory, because every one hath his own reward according to his labour. Stars are not all of one magnitude, one differs from another in glory. As for things below, some have only a being; some, being and life; others, being, life, and sense; and others, besides all these, have reason and understanding. All arts and sciences, before they can be learned, must be reduced into order and method. A camp well disciplined is a perfect pattern of good order; nay, there is a kind of order even in hell itself, a place of disorder and confusion; and shall, then, God and Belial, angels and men, saints and devils, heaven and earth, be all in order, and the Church out? It cannot be: the Church is to be as an army with banners, to consist of governors and governed, some to teach and some to hear, each in his own order.

—Attersol, 1618.

(1217.) In the ringing of bells, whilst every one keeps his due time and order, what a sweet and harmonious sound they make! all the neighbouring villages are cheered with the sound of them; but when once they jar and check each other, either jangling together or striking preposterously, how harsh and displeasing is that noise! So that as we testify our public rejoicings by an orderly and well-tuned peal, when we would signify the town is on fire we ring the bells backward, in a confused manner. It is just thus in Church and commonwealth: when every one knows his station and keeps his due rank, there is a melodious concert of comfort and contentment; but when either states or persons will be clashing with each other, the discord is grievous and extremely prejudicial.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

XII. DISSENSIONS IN THE CHURCH.

1. Are often due to trivial causes.

(1218.) Dr. Cannon was once appealed to by a certain church where there was a great commotion in regard to the point, whether in newly painting their church edifice the colour should be white or yellow. When the committee had stated their case, and with an emphasis, not to say acrimony, which gave sad proof of the existence of a fearful feud upon the unimportant question, the doctor quietly said, "I should advise you, on the whole, to paint the house black. It is cheap, and a good colour to wear, and eminently appropriate for a body that ought to go in mourning over such a foolish quarrel among its members."

2. Are always unreasonable.

(1219.) Suppose a master, before he goes forth, should charge his servant to look to his child, and trim up the house handsomely against he comes home; but when he returns, will he thank his servant for sweeping his house and making it trim (as he bade him), if he find his child through negligence fallen into the fire, and so killed or crippled? No, sure; he left his child as his chief charge, to which the other should have yielded if both could not be done. Thus there has been a great zeal of late amongst us about some circumstances of God's worship; but who is it that looks to the little child, the main duties of Christianity? Was there ever less love, charity, self-denial, heavenly-mindedness, or the power of godliness to be found than in this sad age of ours? Alas! these, like the child, are in great danger of perishing in the fire of contention and division, which a perverse zeal in less things has kindled amongst us.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1220.) The true unity of spirit is derived from the things in which those who are taught and born of God agree, and should not be affected by those in which they differ. The Church of Christ, collectively considered, is an army; they serve under one Prince, have one common interest, and are opposed by the same enemies. This army is kept up, and the places of those who are daily removed to the Church triumphant supplied entirely by those who are rescued and won from the power of the enemy, which is chiefly effected by the Gospel ministry.

This consideration should remind ministers that it is highly improper (I might use a stronger expression) to waste much of their time and talents, which ought to be employed against the common foe, in opposing those who, though they cannot exactly agree with them in every smaller point, are perfectly agreed, and ready to concur with them in promoting their principal design. A wise statesman, who has a point much at heart which he cannot carry without assistance, will gladly accept of help from persons of all parties on whom he can prevail to join with him, and will not, at such a crisis, preclude himself from this advantage by an unseasonable discussion of more minute concerns, in which he knows they must and will be against him. When I see ministers of acknowledged piety and respectable abilities very busy in defending or confuting the smaller differences, which already too much separate those who ought to be of one heart and one mind, though, while they are all fallible, they cannot be exactly of one judgment; though I give them credit for their good intention, I cannot but lament the misapplication of their zeal, which, if directed into another channel, would probably make them much more successful in winning souls. Let us sound an alarm in the enemy's camp, but not in our own!

I have somewhere met with a passage of ancient history, the substance of which, though my recollection of it is but imperfect, I will relate, because I think it very applicable to this part of my subject. It is an account of two large bodies of forces which fell in with each other in a dark night. A battle immediately ensued. The attack and resistance were supported with equal spirit. The contest was fierce and bloody. Great was the slaughter on both sides, and on both sides they were on the point of claiming the victory; when the day broke, and as the light advanced, they soon perceived, to their astonishment and grief, that, owing to the darkness of the night, they had been fighting not with enemies as they supposed, but with friends and allies; they had been doing their enemies' work, and weakening the cause they had wished to support. The expectation of each party to conquer the other was founded upon the losses the opponent had sustained; and this was what proportionably aggravated their lamentation and distress, when they had sufficient light to show them the mischief they had done. Ah! my friends, if shame be compatible with the heavenly state, as perhaps in a sense it may (for believers, when most happy here, are most sensibly ashamed of themselves), shall we not, even then, be ashamed to think how often, in this dark world, we mistook our friends for foes, and that, while we thought we were fighting for the cause of God and truth, we were wounding and worrying the people whom He loved, and perhaps indulging our own narrow, selfish, party prejudices under the semblance of zeal for His glory?

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(1221.) Suppose the troops of a nation, called out against the common enemy, should under the influence of natural prejudices be continually engaged in quarrels. And while they expected to be besieged, instead of strengthening the outer walls of their fortifications, they employed themselves in raising lines of partition to keep separate from one another. Their common interests must greatly suffer. Let them continue to wear their natural costume, and each prefer their own tactics and peculiar discipline; but let them remember that coldness and lukewarmness in their efforts to assist each other against the enemy, and maintain the cause for which they were enlisted, would be sadly betraying the interest of the sovereign in whose services they were engaged. What must we think of those individuals who are more intent to draw lines of distinction than to agree to differ? The true soldiers of Jesus Christ should hold it necessary to raise and strengthen the wall by which Christ's Church is surrounded, and that not for the purpose of intercepting the flow of kindness and Christian philanthropy from within, but for the purpose of intercepting the streams of contamination from without. The line of partition which obtains between the Church and the world—the line which measures off the ground of vital and evangelical religion from the general ungodliness of mere profession, must be preserved and strengthened. The latitudinarianism which would pull down one of its stones must be abhorred as treason. Let an impregnable sacredness be thrown around the people who stand peculiarised by their devotedness and their faith, from the general bulk of a species who are of the earth and earthly. There are landmarks between the children of light and the children of darkness which can never be moved away; but for the lines of partition which have been drawn among themselves, let them be utterly swept away. The signals of distinction between one party of Christians and another need not be put down, but each allowed to wear its own. But with zeal for essentials, they must tolerate each other in the circumstances of their faith; and under all the variety which they wear, whether of complexion or of outward observance, let them recognise the brotherhood of a common doctrine, and of the common spirit of Christianity. How else, in thus weakening the cause of Christ, can we be free from the guilt of disloyalty to our Lord? What Scriptural partition has He raised between believers but this for our guidance,—“That they all may be one, as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that Thou hast sent Me?”

—Salter.

(1222.) For wolves to devour sheep, is no wonder: but for sheep to devour one another, is monstrous and astonishing.

—Salter.

(1223.) Whenever two Christians, either of this church or that, begin to quarrel about matters of ceremonial detail, what is the natural result? The still small voice of truth is lost in the clamour of controversy; love decays, life dies; and the world exclaims, not as of old, “Behold how these Christians love one another,” but, “See how they hate and assail one another.” Where we must differ from a Christian brother in many things that he thinks right, let us do so without calling him by a single bad name; use the softest words, the strongest reasons; and, depend upon it, strong reason couched in courteous language will gain the day, when violent declamation enured by a bitter spirit will do evil, and gain no laurels. And instead of spending our aggressive energy upon internal disputes, let us expend it upon the masses of London that hear no chimes of Sabbath bells, see no Sabbath sun, and are ignorant of those precious things that we know. Oh! while patients are dying in the wards, let not the physicians quarrel by the bedside about who has the best diploma. While souls are passing to the judgment-seat, we should have no time to dispute about mere mechanical and paltry differences.

—Cumming.

(1224.) A wall having become very feeble by age, a portion of it one day fell down. Great consequences followed the falling of the piece of the old wall.

First,—the sun was able to pour more light into the gardens on either side, which the height of the wall had obstructed, so that the flowers looked to greater advantage; and owing to their having more air and sunshine, became really more beautiful.

Then,—the perfume was borne across the breach; so that the gardens were the sweeter.

“What a pity that piece of old wall had not fallen down before,” said the flowers.

Next,—the shrubs looked over to one another, and got into friendly talk; and so they said, “What a good thing that that piece of old wall fell down;—it is a pity it stood so high so long.”

Then,—the flowers and shrubs of each garden discovered that members of their own families had been living on the other side, and therefore really near to each other, though they had had no communion, owing unto the wall between.

And finally, so many benefits were seen to be the result of the occurrence, that instead of rebuilding the fallen part, the remainder was pulled down to a low level, that air and sunshine might have freer course, and the gardens a free communication. And not a few afterwards acknowledged that a real good and blessing was the consequence unto all parties, by the opportunely falling down of that old dividing wall.

Party-spirit is a wall of separation which the coming and the work of Christ was intended to remove. “For He is our peace, who hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us.” Let none now seek to divide Christians, by building up a wall of party-spirit between them; for, “Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.”

—Bowden.

3. Are a hindrance to the progress of the Gospel.

(1225.) The time for the pastures of profession to be green, and for the field of true godliness to grow ripe for the harvest, and for the rose of devotion and heavenliness to be fragrant and flourish, is not in the blustering stormy tempestuous winter, but in the calm delightful summer of peace.

Oh, what abundance of excellent, hopeful fruits of godliness have I seen blown down before they were ripe, by the impetuous winds of wars and other contentions, and so have lain trodden under foot by libertinism and sensuality, as meat for swine, who else might have been their Master's delight! In a word, I never yet saw the work of the gospel go on well in wars, nor the business of men's salvation succeed among dissensions; but if one have in such times proved a gainer, multitudes have been losers.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

4. Enfeeble and imperil the Church.

(1226.) Melancthon, persuading the divided Protestants of his time to peace and unity, illustrateth his argument by a notable parable of the wolves and the dogs who were marching onward to fight one against another. “The wolves, that they might the better know the strength of their adversary, sent forth a master-wolf as their scout. The scout returns, and tells the wolves that indeed the dogs were more in number, but yet they should not be discouraged, for he observed that the dogs were not one like another. A few mastiffs there were, but the most were little curs which could only bark but not bite, and would be afraid of their own shadow. Another thing also he observed, which would much encourage them, and that was, that the dogs did march as if they were more offended at themselves than with us, not keeping their ranks, but grinning and snarling and biting and tearing one another as if they would save us a labour; and therefore let us march on resolutely, for our enemies are their own enemies, enemies to themselves and their own peace; they bite and devour each other, and therefore we shall certainly devour them.” Thus, though a kingdom or state be never so well provided with men, arms, ammunition, ships, walls, forts, and bulwarks, yet notwithstanding, if divisions and heart-burnings get into that kingdom, that state, or that city, like a spreading gangrene, they will infect the whole, and, like a breach made in the walls of a city besieged, they will let in the enemy to destroy it. Nay, though there should be a kingdom of saints, if differences and distractions get within that kingdom, they will, like the worm in Jonah's gourd, eat up all the happiness of it in one night.

—Calamy, 1600-1666.

(1227.) You all profess to have been baptized into the spirit of the gospel; but you do not show it, when you bite and snarl at one another. The gospel, that makes wolves and lambs agree, doth not teach the lambs to turn wolves and devour each the other. Our Saviour told the two disciples, whose choler was so soon up, that they would be fetching fire from heaven to go on their revengeful errand, that they little thought from what hearth that wildfire of their passion came, “Ye know not what spirit ye are of.” As if He had said, “Such fiery, wrathful speeches do not suit with the meek Master you serve, nor with the gospel of peace He preacheth to you.” And if the gospel will not allow us to pay our enemies in their own coin, and give them wrath for wrath; then much less will it suffer brethren to spit fire at one another's face. No, when any such embers of contention begin to smoke among Christians, we may know who left the spark; no other but Satan, he is the great kindle-coal of all their contentions. If there be tempest (not in the air) in the spirits of Christians, and the wind of their passions be high and loud, it is easy to tell who is the conjuror: Oh, it is the devil that is practising his black art upon their lusts, which yet are so much unmortified, as gives him to, great an advantage of raising many times sad storms of division and strife amongst them. Paul and Barnabas set out in a calm together, but the devil sends a storm after them, such a storm as parted them in the midst of their voyage. There is nothing (next Christ and heaven) that the devil grudges believers more than their peace and mutual love; if he cannot rend them from Christ or stop them from getting heaven, yet he takes some pleasure to see them go thither in a storm; like a shattered fleet severed one from another, that they may have no assistance from, nor comfort of, each other's company all the way; though, where he can divide, he hopes to ruin also, well knowing this to be the most probable means to effect it; one ship is easier taken than a squadron. A town, if it can be but set on fire, the enemy may hope to take it with more ease. Let it therefore be your great care to keep the devil's spark from your powder. Certainly peace among Christians is no small mercy, that the devil's arrows fly so thick at its breast.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1228.) The corruptions in a church are not of so destructive an influence as schisms and divisions from it, the constant effects of enthusiasm. It being much in the body spiritual as in the natural; where that which severs and dissolves the continuity of parts tends more to the destruction of the whole than that which corrupts them. You may cure a throat when it is sore, but not when it is cut.

—South, 1633-1716.

5. Are a cause of rejoicing to the enemies of the truth.

(1229.) Consider where you are, and among whom; are you not in your enemies' quarters? If you fall out, what do you but kindle a fire for them to warm their hands by? Aha! so would we have it, say they. The sea of their rage will weaken this bank fast enough, you need not cut it for them. The unreasonableness of the strife betwixt Abraham's herdmen and Lot's is aggravated by the near neighbourhood of the heathen to them (Gen. xiii. 7). To fall out while these idolaters looked on, this would be town-talk presently, and put themselves and their religion both to shame. And I pray, who have been in our land all the while the people of God have been scuffling? Those that have curiously observed every uncomely behaviour among them, and told all the world of it. Such as have wit and malice enough to make use of it for their wicked purposes. They stand on tip-toes to be at work; only we are not yet quite laid up and disabled (by the soreness of those our wounds which we have given ourselves) from withstanding their fury. They hope it will come to that; and then they will cure us of our own wounds, by giving one if they can that shall go deep enough to the heart of our life, gospel, and all. O Christians, shall Herod and Pilate put you to shame? They clapt up a peace to strengthen their hands against Christ; and will not you unite against your common enemy? It is an ill time for mariners to be fighting when an enemy is boring a hole at the bottom of their ship.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

6. Are offensive to God.

(1230.) God makes account, that He brings a heavy judgment upon a people when He Himself leaves them. If the master leaves the ship, it is near sinking indeed; and truly, no readier way to send Him going than by strifes among brethren; these smoke Him out of His own house.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

XIII. ITS DISCIPLINE.

1. Must be impartial.

(1231.) We must not stand in fear of the faces of men, though they be never so great and mighty. The censures of the Church must not be like the spider's web which catches flies and gnats, whereas the bigger creatures break from it. They must be administered indifferently, without respect of persons; otherwise it lays open a gap to destroy religion, faith, honesty, justice, and equity, and makes a way to all wrong and all impiety.

This reproves such as dare not deal with great men, rich men, and mighty men. They are afraid to touch them, lest they purchase their displeasure. These are like to fowlers, that pitch not the net to catch kites or hawks that do hurt, but for such as do no hurt. They suffer great men to do what they list, and see them not: they let them alone, and either through negligence they will not, or through fear they dare not, control them.

—Atterhol, 1618.

2. Importance of strictly maintaining it.

(1232.) When nations are to perish in their sins, 'Tis in the Church the leprosy begins: The priest, whose office is, with zeal sincere, To watch the fountain and preserve it clear, Carelessly nods and sleeps upon the brink, While others poison what the flock must drink; Or, waking at the call of lust alone, Infuses lies and errors of his own: His unsuspecting sheep believe it pure, And, tainted by the very means of cure, Catch from each other a contagious spot, The foul forerunner of a general rot.

—Cowper.

XIV. DUTIES OF ITS MEMBERS TOWARDS EACH OTHER.

(1233.) After proof and trial made of their fidelity, we are to trust our brethren without any further suspicion. Not to try before we trust is want of wisdom, not to trust after we have tried is want of charity. The goldsmith must purify the dross and ore from the gold, but he must be wary lest he make waste of good metal if over anxious in too often refining. We may search and sound the sincerity of our brethren, but after good experience made of their uprightness, we must take heed lest by continual sifting and proving them we offend a weak Christian. Christ tried the woman of Syrophenicia, first with silence, then with two sharp answers; at last finding her to be sound, He dismissed her with granting her request and commending of her faith. When He said to Peter the third time, "Lovest thou Me?" He rested satisfied with Peter's answer, and troubled him with no more questions.

—Fuller, 1608-1661.

(1234.) Every one entering a church has a right to feel that he is going into a higher atmosphere than that in which he has been accustomed to move. Every one has a right to feel that when he goes into the Church of Christ he goes into an association, a brotherhood, where the principle of gentleness and kindness is carried on to a higher degree than it is outside of the Church. I know that it is not so.

I know that the Church is keyed, often, very low in the matter of sympathy. I know that too frequently persons who go into the Church are like those who go at night to a hotel. Each lodger has his own room and calls for what he himself needs, and does not feel bound to take care of any of the other lodgers. And a church, frequently, is nothing but a spiritual boarding-house, where the members are not acquainted with each other, and where there is but very little sympathy. Now, every church should be under the inspiration of such large sympathy and benevolence as to make every one of its members the object of kindly thought and feeling. There should be a public sentiment and an atmosphere of brotherhood in every church. —Becher.

(1235.) The help which he receives from the Church depends upon what church he goes into. Some do not get any help at all from the Church. Some churches are like those Trust-Companies where a man can go and deposit his silver and gold and bonds, and have them kept so securely that nobody can take them away, but where they are simply kept, and are doing nothing. The Church should be a garden where men are taken and planted as in a nursery in frames or in parterres, and where with good soil and a good summer they will grow and blossom and bear fruit. Whether you grow in a church will depend upon what church you get into, and upon what the preaching in that church is, and upon what the social influences are there. In this particular Church there is a social spirit. Men are looked after, and followed up, and comforted, as well as instructed. —Becher.

(1236.) A Boston minister says he once preached on "The Recognition of Friends in the Future," and was told after service by a hearer, that it would be more to the point to preach about the recognition of friends here, as he had been in the church twenty years and didn't know any of its members.

XV. THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

1. The contrast between it and the pagan world.

(1237.) Those Christian churches which sprang up in Antioch, Philippi, Corinth, and Rome, stood absolutely new creations, with a new life, new spirit, and new manners, in the midst of the old and decaying society of paganism.

So, in the primeval forest where thick and dark rises the growth of centuries, shadowing a luxuriant but useless soil over which roam beasts of prey or men scarcely less savage, you may meet broad clearings where the hand of labour has broken up the gloomy vegetation, and let in upon the hazy earth the light and air of heaven. Instead of brooding vapours, the breath of the healthy breezes of the open sky. Instead of rottenness and mould, stretch wide green meadows, where the even-footed mowers sweep down the fragrant grass, and sloping fields of grain wave with golden promise. Instead of the cry of beasts prowling for their prey, or the whoop of savages thirsting for blood, there are cheery voices of labour, the soft laugh of children hearty at their play, the morning prayer or evening psalm. Thus amid the old heathen wastes sprang up these little centres and clearings of Christian civilisation. That ancient, stately, gloomy growth of paganism, beneath which society lay in a luxurious neglect delivered over to base and beastly uses, fell for a space around each Christian church. The light of heaven came in. A new, humane, and Christ-like style of living established itself in the heart of a crooked and perverse nation. A new social order grew upon the old soil, not only uncorrupted by surrounding iniquities, but powerful to penetrate and purify the age. The contrast between the rank and miasmatic verdure of the dismal swamp, and the soft beauty of an English landscape garden, is not more real than between the social life prevalent in Corinth or Pompeii, and the associations which surrounded the Christian home of Aquila and Priscilla and the church that was in their house.

Truly the early disciples of Jesus were the "salt of the earth"—"the light of the world."

—W. H. Goodrich.

2. Contrasts between the primitive Church and our own.

(1238.) The unity of the Church is exceedingly hindered by an unworthy privacy and retiredness of most Christians that live, like the snail, in a shell, and look but little abroad into the world. Some know not the state of the world, or of the Church, nor much care to know it; but think it is with all the world as it is with us in England; when as if they knew the fewness of Christians, the huge numbers of infidels, the corruptions of other churches, in comparison of ours, it would surely set them lamenting and praying that the kingdom of Christ might come. Yea, many ministers are of so base a privacy of spirit, that they look little farther than their own parishes, and think if all be well there, all is well everywhere; and seldom inquire how it goes with the Church in the rest of the world: nor will scarcely be brought to associate and keep correspondence with their brethren, for the union and communion of the several churches and the common good: far unlike the temper of Paul and the other apostles and servants of Christ in those days. They have not a care of all the churches. They long not to hear of their welfare. They would think it much to travail and labour for it the thousandth part so much as they. They cannot say, "who is weak, and I am not weak," &c.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1239.) The water is purest at its fountain among the mountains where it gushes cold from the rock, or bubbles up at the mossy spring; the nearer to its source, the clearer is the stream. By every mile it rolls, it grows in volume; till the streamlet which a child could leap, fed by many tributaries, has swollen into a broad river, on whose bosom, as it nears the sea, fishermen shoot their nets and the ships of nations ride. But what the water has acquired in depth and breadth, it has lost in purity; growing the muddier the further it goes. How like to what happens with churches—which, as they become larger, usually become more loose in doctrine and more lax in discipline. With an increase of numbers, they often present such an increase of corruptions, that to find the purest days of many a sect, we must turn our steps backward to the period of its rise.

In some respects this is true even of the Christian Church. When young in years, and small in numbers, and poor in point of wealth, what love, unity, purity, and peace, dwelt within her walls! Since then how have these walls been shaken by the violence and filled with the din of controversies!

Here, one sect carrying on fierce war against another; and there, intestine wars—two parties contending within the same body, and more like wolves than sheep, "worrying, biting, and devouring" one another. Suppose an inhabitant of another sphere to alight on this one! He sees the Church of Christ rent into jealous, envious, angry, hostile factions; and finds them, instead of presenting one bold front to the common enemy, burying their swords in each other's bosoms. How difficult it were for him to believe that they were subjects of one King; had a common faith, a common cross, a common Bible, a common hope, a common heaven; and that the choicest title of their Sovereign was not the god of war, but the Prince of Peace. Once the heathens said, "See how these Christians love one another!" They say it no more. And we cannot contrast what the Church is now, and has been for bygone ages, with the purity and peace of her early days, without being ready to cry, "How are the mighty fallen; the weapons of war how are they perished!—How is the gold become dim, how is the most fine gold changed!" —Guthrie.

(1240.) What a picture of Christian unity, love, self-denial, mutual affection, devotedness to each other's welfare, and to the great interests of Messiah's kingdom, is offered to our admiration in the opening chapters of the Acts!—In that community of goods which sanguine politicians have often dreamed of, but Christians only have ever attained to! In those days the Church of Christ was like one large, loving family, to whose common treasury each member brought his wealth and wages. Nobody was immensely rich, and none were miserably poor. Riches and rags, splendour and squalidness, did not stand in incongruous conjunction, and worship, as I have seen them, under the same roof, or sit side by side at the same communion-table. As all the rivers of the earth pour their waters into one sea, and all the roots of a tree convey their nourishment to one stem, and all the veins of the body empty themselves into one heart, from which the tide of blood, borne along the bounding arteries, is sent forth again to be distributed to every member according to its needs—so was it in primitive times with the wealth of those who constituted the Church, the body of Christ. What states have been in name, it was in fact—a commonwealth; and the only one the world ever saw. The people lived for Christ; regarding their possessions as His, not their own. They judged that as a man who buys land, buys all belonging to it—the trees that grow on its surface and the minerals that lie in its bowels—so, when Christ bought them with His blood, with them He bought all that was theirs. They felt that if Christ gave His life for the poorest saints, they could not do less than share their "means and substance" with them; and so, as we are told—"They who believed were together, and had all things in common, and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need."

There was no command laid on them to do so; nor does any command lie on us to imitate their example in this matter. Such a practice would now be as undesirable as it is impracticable. Still, though their circumstances were so peculiar as to lead them to adopt a peculiar line of conduct, how ought their conduct—the spirit of their example, and, to adduce a still higher authority, how ought the example of Christ, who, with His disciples, had a common purse, to call forth our charity to God's poor saints; teaching us to fill their scanty cups with the overflows of our own. —Guthrie.

XVI. HER DEPENDENCE ON DIVINE AID.

(1241.) The dependence of the Church's vitality upon the hourly exercise of Christ's offices as a living Saviour may be thus illustrated. Conceive the wheels of nature to be stopped, the sun to cease to give its light, the earth and the planets to roll their courses, and the great elements of nature to be powerless and deprived of all their virtue. The visible creation in which man is placed would first droop and languish; her exhausted energies would fail her, and she would expire. Life, in all her creative and sustaining power, would give place, and yield up her dominion to the reign of universal death. No less a work of confusion and death would ensue in the Church if a suspension of Christ's offices were to take place. When He ascended up on high, He received the gift of the Spirit, and He is continually pouring it out as the Spirit of life, animating and imparting vitality to every part of His Church. Not a ray of light can shine into the heart of any member of His body but what comes from the great Prophet of His Church. Not a sinner can start forth from the grave of spiritual death without Christ is there to give him light and life. Not a prayer or offering of whatever kind can come up with acceptance before God without His merits to recommend, and the incense of His intercession to purify and perfume it; while, but for the continual exercise of His kingly office, by virtue of which He holds the keys of death and hell, His Church would be the prey of her spiritual enemies, and fall before the powers of darkness and spiritual wickedness in high places. Let all these offices be suspended, and what must follow? This Church, which is now radiant with light and life, would instantly be in darkness, and gasping in death. The progress of gospel light would be no more; conversion ceases—the Redeemer's car, travelling in the greatness of His strength to the uttermost bounds of the earth, is suddenly arrested in its course. In one word, behold the Church extinct, and mankind again falling before the powers of darkness.

—Salter.

(1242.) If a plot of ground should be laid out for a garden, square it never so accurately, let it have never so exact a figure, bestow upon it everything of ornament that art can invent, yet if nature also do not do its part, if the sun never shine upon it, if no showers or dews ever descend, would it be, think you, a pleasant flourishing garden? We have all of us reason to have done expecting much from lifeless outward forms; even the best constitution imaginable, while a spirit of life from above breathes not, despairs that that will ever work miracles, or do any great things amongst us. —Salter.

(1243.) We want the baptism of the Spirit upon us if we are to be as a Church should be, or do as a Church of God should do. Learning will be powerless, intellect will be powerless, eloquence will be powerless, yea the ministry you enjoy will be powerless, without the baptism of the Spirit of God. Not one of these, or all of these, will form a substitute, or take the place of the baptizing of the heart and soul. It must kindle our prayers and praises, and penetrate our affections, and dwell in our hearts, and vitalise every religious effort for God and man, or everything will be in vain. This is the power we want. Yonder is a man gazing on some gigantic vessel. He is lost in amazement at the inventive power represented there; he looks down and sees all those polished levers, and tries to count all those mammoth wheels which are made to revolve there. He goes home struck with wonder at the power of man; and yet he has seen no power. Nothing he has looked at represents anything of power. There must be put into the machinery a power, a hidden power, a mighty moving power, and then will those wheels revolve majestically, and the vessel make its way through the mighty waters. He who made the vessel had that power in view; everything he did was with a view to the coming of that power, or else he would have been the contempt and scorn of all scientific men. Is it so in what men are doing? much more so is it in what God is doing. Without this power in the ministry and laity of this Church, we shall never be able to say, "I am full of power by the Spirit of the Lord." —Fleming.

XVII. HER TROUBLES DIVINELY SENT FOR GOOD.

(1244.) The husbandman in autumn and winter is pruning of his trees, and boughs and branches are scattered up and down all the parts of the orchard. He is then digging up the earth, and baring the roots of trees, transplanting some, and setting others in their rooms, and doing many other works which make the garden lie rough and unhandy; but all these works tend to the greater beauty, pleasure, and profit in the garden afterwards, in the spring and summer.

This similitude shadows out unto us this proposition (which is cleared by Scripture); that the commotions, troubles, and confusions in the Church of God will end in the settlement, peace, and glory of it. —Austen, 1656.

(1245.) She has often been refined by the most violent persecutions of her enemies. She has not only survived the flames kindled against her, but, as refined gold comes out more beautiful from the furnace, left her dress behind her, and has been wrought into a more beautiful frame by the hand of her great artificer. Like the sand upon the seashore, she has not only broken the force of the waves, but been assisted by them to discharge her filth, and been washed more clean by those waves that rushed in to drown her. She has been more conformed to the image of her head; and made fitter to glorify God here, and to enter into the glory of God hereafter. The Church is to "cast forth her roots like Lebanon" (Hos. xiv. 5). The cedar by its shakings grows up more in beauty as well as strength, and the torch by its knocks burns the clearer. Though the number of her children might sometimes decrease through fear, yet her true offspring that have remained have increased in their zeal, courage, and love to God. Apostates themselves have proved refiners of them that they have deserted: "And some of them of understanding shall fall to try them, and to purge, and make them white" (Dan. xi. 35). The corn is the purer by the separation of the chaff; thus has she grown purer by flames and sounder by batteries.

—Charnock, 1628 1680.

XVIII. HER SAFETY.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(1247.) As for the trouble thou putteth thyself to concerning the cause and Church of Christ, which thou mayest see at any time distressed by the enemy, though God takes thy good-will to them (from which those thy fears arise) very kindly, yet there is no need of tormenting thyself with that which is sure never to come to pass. The Ark may shake, but it cannot fall. The ship of the Church may be tossed, but it cannot sink, for Christ is in it, and will awake time enough to prevent its wreck. There is therefore no cause for us, when the storm beateth hardest upon it, to disturb Him as once the disciples did with the shrieks and outcries of our unbelief as if all were lost. Our faith is more in danger of sinking at such a time than the cause and Church of Christ are. They are both by the promise set out of the reach of men and devils. The Gospel is an "Everlasting Gospel." "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but not one iota of this shall perish." "The Word of the Lord endureth for ever," and shall be alive to walk over all its enemies' graves, yea to see the funeral of the whole world. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1248.) A foundation must be hidden and out of sight unto all those that outwardly look upon the house. They cannot perceive it, though every part of the house does rest upon it. And this has occasioned many mistakes in the world. An unwise man coming to a great house, seeing the antics and pictures [figures?] stand crouching under the windows and sides of the house, may haply think that they bear up the weight of the house, when indeed they are for the most part pargeted posts. They bear not the house,—the house bears them. By their bowing, and outward appearance, the man thinks the burden is on them, and supposes that it would be an easy thing at any time by taking them away to demolish the house itself. But when he sets himself to work, he finds these things of no value; there is a foundation in the bottom which bears up the whole that he thought not of;—against that he may waste himself until he be broken in pieces. Men looking upon the Church do find that it is a fair fabric indeed, but cannot imagine how it should stand. A few supporters it seems to have in the world, like crouching antics under the windows, that make some show of under-propping it;—here you have a magistrate, there an army, or so. Think the men of the world, "Can we out remove these props, the whole would quickly topple to the ground." Yea, so foolish have I been myself, and so void of understanding before the Lord, as to take a view of some goodly appearing props of this building, and to think, "How shall the house be preserved, if these should be removed?"—they looked unto me like the mariners in Paul's ship, without whose abode therein they could not be saved,—when lo! suddenly, some have been manifested to be targeted posts, and the very best to be held up by the house, and not to hold it up. On this account the men of the world think it no great matter to demolish the spiritual Church of Christ to the ground:—they encourage one another to the work, never thinking of the foundation that lies hidden, against which they dash themselves all to pieces. I say, then, Christ, as the Foundation of this house, is hidden to the men of the world,—they see it not, they believe it not. There is nothing more remote from their apprehension that Christ should be at the bottom of them and their ways, whom they so much despise.

—Owen, 1616-1683.

(1249.) As Noah's ark, notwithstanding all the unlikelihood and improbability of the event, was miraculously preserved in the midst of the conflicting elements, and enabled to withstand all the violence of the breaking up of the great abyss, and the rushing down of the waters of the firmament from above, with all the terrific accompaniments of this convulsion of nature, during a period of one hundred and fifty days; so the Ark of the Church, by the same sustaining power, has hitherto rode in safety through the stormy deeps and over the mountain billows of a deluge of persecution, trouble, and temptation, issuing from the abyss of hell, agitated by the storms and tempests which have been congregated in the atmosphere of this world by "the prince of the power of the air," who has directed all their fury to accomplish her destruction. Has not Jehovah then, in controlling and overruling all this hellish hate and fury for the accomplishment of His wondrous designs in the salvation of His Church, been making known His "manifold wisdom of the principalities and powers in heavenly places"? And will not that grace, and wisdom, and power, which have hitherto triumphed, still secure and maintain her interests, until, guided through the ocean of time, she rests on the mountains of eternal love, where there shall be no more sea, nor clouds, nor tempests, to disturb the serenity of the celestial region of purity and bliss? (Matt. xvi. 18).

—Ewing.

(1250.) The Church of God has often been in a low, languishing, and, to all human appearance, in a desperate condition; yet one thing, as Solomon says, is set against another, and it has been at such times that His people have realised most fully the comforts of His providence and gracious presence. These stars shine brightest in dark winter nights. There was a time, for example, when the Church was reduced to the small number of eight persons; and these eight in imminent danger of perishing. If one plank of the ark had started; if some gigantic billow, striking broadside on, had swept her against the rugged summit of a mountain-top lying like a reef below the flood; if any one of the hundred accidents that are daily wrecking other ships had happened to this that sailed a shoreless sea without crew, or helm, or helmsman, to so low a pitch was the Church of God reduced, that the wreck of one ship had been her ruin—the whole race of men had perished.

It is astonishing and refreshing to look back on the way God has often extricated His people when they seemed hemmed in by destruction and without a chance of escape; and more still, to see how Haman swung on the gallows which he raised for Mordecai; how the persecutors of the three Hebrew children were consumed in the flames they had kindled for them, and how the Red Sea, into which the Egyptians would have driven God's people, became, not the grave of the oppressed, but of their oppressors. Thus, in the days of old, God made the wrath of man and of devils also to praise Him. He does so still. The trials and temptations to which He leaves His saints exposed shall be but the storm that flashes, and thunders, and roars through the air, to leave it fresher and purer than before.

—Guthrie.

(1251.) The wars and conquests of kings, the ambitious schemes of politicians, have all been overruled by Him who maketh the very wrath of man to praise Him, for the wider extension and the more efficient establishment of His own Church. The very colossal power of the Roman Empire itself was made subservient to the process by which it was to be broken up; and the efficacy of its laws manifested in favour of the religion to which it was inveterately and specially hostile. Little did the Emperor Titus imagine that, while laying waste the Jewish kingdom, he was raising up from its very ruins a kingdom destined speedily to overshadow and overthrow his own empire, and lay his proud religion in the dust. The Roman sword, intent only on self-glorification and the pride of conquest, was wielded by the Almighty Arm to clear the way for the triumphant march of Christianity over every nation and kingdom; and though that sword was frequently turned against the Church, and wrought sad havoc among its members, yet each pruning, each shoot that it cut off, became a separate living vine, extending to other regions the blessings of the Gospel, like that strange American plant which has been recently introduced into our rivers and canals, every joint and fragment of which, however minutely cut, becomes an independent individual, thus diffusing the plant by the very efforts made to extirpate it. And in this way the Church grew and spread, until now its range extends from sea to sea, and from the river even unto the ends of the earth.

COMFORT.

1. Its sources.

(1252.) It is God's presence which constitutes the saint's morning. As the stars may impart some light, and yet the brightness of all combined cannot form the light of day, but when the sun appears there is day forthwith; so God may make some comfort arise to a soul from secondary and inferior means; but it is He Himself alone who, by the shining of His face and the smiles of His countenance, causes morning.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(1253.) The Christian's comfort increaseth or wanes, as the aspect of his faith is to the power of God. Let the soul question that, or his interest in it, and his joy gusheth out, even as blood out of a broken vein. It is true, a soul may scramble to heaven with much ado, by a faith of recumbency, relying on God as able to save, without this persuasion of its interest in God; but such a soul goes with a scant side-wind, or like a ship whose masts are laid by the board, exposed to wind and weather, if others better appointed did not tow it along with them. Many fears like waves ever and anon cover such a soul, that it is more under water than above; whereas one that sees itself folded in the arms of Almighty Power;—Oh, how such a soul goes mounting before the wind, with her sails filled with joy and peace! Let affliction come, storms arise, this blessed soul knows where it shall land and be welcome. The name of God is his harbour, where he puts in as boldly as a man steps into his own house when taken in a shower. . . . Do you not think they sleep as soundly who dwell on London Bridge, as they who live at Whitehall or Cheapside, knowing the waves that roar under them cannot hurt them? Even so may the saints rest quietly over the floods of death itself, and fear no ill.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. How God administers it.

(1254.) The second light which God vouchsafes His people, ordinarily to help and eke out their faith, is the sight and comfort of their own graces, unto which so many promises belong; as of their love to His people, fear of His name, desire to obey Him. So that often when the sun is set, yet star-light appears; that is, though that other, the immediate presence and evidence of His favour shines not on the soul, yet His graces therein appear, as tokens of His love; so the soul knows that there is a sun still that gives light to these stars, though it sees it not; as in the night we know that there is a sun in another horizon, because the stars we see have their light from it, and we are sure that it will arise again to us.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(1255.) Remember thou dependest on God for the continuance of thy comfort. They are not the smiles thou hadst yesterday can make thee joyous to-day, any more than the bread thou didst then eat can make thee strong without more; thou needest new discoveries for new comforts. Let God hide His face, and thou wilt soon lose the sight and forget the taste of what thou even now hadst.

It is beyond our skill or power to preserve those impressions of joy and comfortable apprehensions of God's favour on our spirit which sometimes we find; as God's presence brings those, so when He goes He carries them away with Him, as the setting sun doth the day. We would laugh heartily at him, who, when the sun shines in at his window, should think by shutting that to imprison the sunbeams in his chamber; and dost thou not show as much folly, who thinkest because thou now hast comfort, thou therefore shalt never be in darkness of spirit more?

The believer's comfort is like Israel's manna; it is not like our ordinary bread and provision we buy at market, and lock up in our cupboards where we can go to it when we will; no, it is rained as that was from heaven. Indeed, God provided for them after this sort to humble them.—“Who fed thee in the wilderness with manna, which thy fathers knew not, that He might humble thee.” It was not because such was mean food that God is said to humble them, for it was delicious food, therefore called “angels' food;” but the manner of the dispensing it from hand to mouth every day, their portion and no more, so that God kept the key of their cupboard, and they stood to His immediate allowance; and thus God communicates our spiritual comforts for the same end to humble us.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1256.) God will keep the rich store of consistent and abiding comforts till the Great Day. When all the family shall come together, He may pour out the fullness of His hidden treasures on them. We are now in the morning of the day, the feast is to come; a breakfast must serve to stay the stomach, till the King of saints with all His friends sit down together.

—Sinonds.

3. Exceeds our distresses.

(1257.) Our comforts vie with the number of our sorrows, and win the game. The mercies of God passed over in a gross sum breed no admiration; but cast up the particulars, and then arithmetic is too dull an art to number them. As many dusts as a man's hands can hold, is but his handful of so many dusts; but tell them one by one, and they exceed all numeration. It was but a crown which King Solomon wore; but weigh the gold, tell the precious stones, value the richness of them, and what was it then?

—Adams, 1653.

4. Its source to be tested.

(1258.) Great is the excellency, transcendent the comforts, that are to be found in God's promises; they are the good Christian's Magna Charta for heaven, the only assurance that he hath to claim by. There is no comfort—no true, real, virtual comfort—but what is built and founded upon a Scripture promise; if otherwise, it is presumption, and cannot properly be called true comfort.

—Calamy, 1600-1663.

(1259.) “Thy comforts delight my soul!” In all the comforts we have, it is good to consider from whence it comes; is it God's comfort, or a fancy of our own? A comfort that is made up of our fancies is like a spider's web that is weaved out of its bowels, and is gone and swept away with the turn of a besom.

—Munton, 1620-1667.

5. Why it is sometimes withheld.

(1260.) As little children, when they see a heap of beautiful roses lying upon a table, and their mother puts them in a mortar, and therein beats them all to pieces; the children cry out and think the mother spoils them, though she does it merely to make a conserve of them, that they may be more useful and durable. Thus it is that we think we have comforts like beds of roses; yet when God takes them from us, and breaks them all to pieces, we are apt to conceive that they are all spoiled and destroyed, and that we are utterly undone by it; whereas God intends it to work for our greater benefit and advantage (Rom. viii. 28).

—Spencer, 1658.

(1261.) According to the secret design of His providence, He is pleased to withhold from us the milk and the honey of consolation, that, by weaning us in this manner, we may learn to feed on the more dry and solid bread of a vigorous devotion, exercised under the trial of distaste and spiritual dryness.

—De Sales.

6. Is not the measure of grace.

(1262.) Sense of sin may be often great, and more felt than grace; yet not to be more than grace. A man feels the ache of his finger more sensibly than the health of his whole body; yet he knows that the ache of a finger is nothing so much as the health of the whole body. The sun under the clouds is still a sun; the fire in embers, still fire; the sap is shut up in the root, and confined thither by the cold of winter, that it cannot show itself in production of leaves and fruits, as in the spring, yet is there still life in the tree. So in the distressed heart, during the storm of affliction, there is still some hidden grace, some spark of fire in the smoking flax which the Lord Jesus will not quench. Though thou be wounded with God's own arrows, that seem to drink up thy blood; although thy own sins be presented to the eye of thy soul; though the serpent (to increase thy terror) put forth his dismal countenance; yet, canst thou believe? take comfort, there is more health in the Seed of the woman than there can be venom in the head of the serpent.

—Adams, 1653.

(1263.) Great comforts do, indeed, bear witness to the truth of thy grace, but not to the degree of it; the weak child is oftener in the lap than the strong one.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1264.) Take heed thou thinkest not grace decays because thy comfort withdraws. . . . Did ever faith triumph more than in our Saviour crying "My God, my God!" Here faith was at its meridian when it was midnight in respect of joy. Possibly thou comest from an ordinance, and bringest not home with thee those sheaves of comfort thou used to do, and therefore concluded, grace acted not in thee as formerly. Truly, if thou hast nothing else to go by, thou mayest wrong the grace of God in thee exceedingly; because thy comfort is extrinsic to thy duty, a boon which God may give or not, yea, doth give to the weak, and deny to the strong. The traveller may go as fast, and ride as much ground, when the sun doth not shine as when it doth, though indeed he goes not so merrily on his journey; nay, sometimes he makes the more haste, the warm sun makes him sometimes to lie down and loiter, but when dark and cold he puts on with more speed. Some graces thrive best (like some flowers) in the shade, such as humility, dependence on God, &c.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1265.) Take heed thou dost not mistake and think thy grace decays, when may be it is only thy temptations increase and not thy graces decrease. If you should hear a man say, because he cannot to-day run so fast when a hundredweight is on his back, as he could yesterday without any such a burden, that therefore he was grown weaker, you would soon tell him where his mistake lies. Temptation lies not in the same heaviness always upon the Christian's shoulder. Observe, therefore, whether Satan is not more than ordinary let loose to assault thee, whether thy temptations come not with more force and violence than ever; possibly, though thou dost not with the same facility overcome these, as thou hast done less, yet grace may act stronger in conflicting with the greater, than in overcoming the less. The same ship that when lightly ballasted and favoured with the wind goes mounting, at another time deeply laden and going against wind and tide may move with a slow pace, and yet they in the ship take more pains to make it sail thus than they did when it went faster.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

7. Not to be supremely desired.

(1266.) He is not a good subject that is all for what he can get of his prince, but never thinks what service he may do for him. Nor he the true Christian, whose thoughts dwell more on his own happiness than the honour of his God.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

8. Not to be too earnestly craved.

(1267.) Suppose two men in your work—one that must have his pay presently, his wages presently, yea, before he has done his work: the other will not have his wages till his work be all done; and if you offer him money, "No," says he, "I will stay till all be done, and receive it in a lump together." Which of these two is the ablest man, or which the poorest man? Will you not say, "Surely, he that cannot stay is the poorest, and he that can stay longest for his wages is the ablest man"? So it is here, God has two sorts of servants: one that go by visions and manifestations of love, and are not able to live at all by faith, but must have sights, and visions, and manifestations every day, or else they die, and murmur, or complain. And others say, "Oh, but these sights and visions are for heaven; if God will have it so, I am contented to stay till all the work be done." Which of these two is the poorest, or the strongest? Labour more and more to live by faith, and when you are in desertion, say, "Whether saved or not saved, whether hypocrite or not hypocrite, I will stay, I will wait on God, and let Him come when He pleases." If you lay yourself at Christ's feet He will take you into His arms.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

9. Not always attained at the outset of the Christian life.

(1268.) Though a man have prayed earnestly and often, it is not an easy matter to wash off the stain of sin, and quiet the conscience. As after a storm on the sea, though the tempest be gone, yet there is not by and by a calm, there will be a rolling and tossing of the waves up and down a long while after; so, to believe that God will hear our prayers, and that He has done away all our sins out of His sight, it is not by and by done; there is a rolling and a stain of sin that will toss up and down a long time after our prayers are done.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(1269.) Few Christians do come to know either what are solid grounds of comfort, or whether they have any such grounds themselves in the infancy of Christianity. But as an infant hath life before he knoweth it; and as he hath misapprehensions of himself, and most other things for certain years together; yet it will not follow that, therefore, he hath no life or reason: so it is in the case in hand.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

10. How it is to be attained.

(1270.) If, when God hath given you assurance, or strong probabilities of your sincerity, you will make use of it but only for that present time, you will never then have a settled peace in your soul ; besides, the great wrong you do to God, by necessitating Him to be so often renewing such discoveries, and repeating the same words to you so often over. If your child offend you, would you have him, when he is pardoned, no longer to believe it than you are telling it him ? Should he be still asking you over and over every day, " Father, am I forgiven, or no " ? Should not one answer serve his turn ? Will you not believe that your money is in your purse or chest any longer than you are looking on it ? Or that your corn is growing on your land, or your cattle in your grounds, any longer than you are looking on them ? By this course a rich man should have no more content than a beggar, no longer than he is looking on his money, or goods, or land ; and when he is looking on one, he should again lose the comfort of all the rest. What hath God given you a memory for, but to lay up former apprehensions and discoveries, and experiences, and make use of them on all meet occasions afterwards ? Let me, therefore, persuade you to this great and necessary work. When God hath once resolved your doubts, and shown you the truth of your faith, love, or obedience, write it down, if you can, in your book (as I have advised you in my " Treatise of Rest "), " Such a day, upon a serious perusal of my heart, I found it thus and thus with myself. " Or, at least, write it deep in your memory ; and do not suffer any fancies, or fears, or light surmises to cause you to question this again, as long as you fall not from the obedience or faith which you then discovered.

Alas ! man's apprehension is a most mutable thing ! If you leave your soul open to every new apprehension, you will never be settled ; you may think two contrary things of yourself in an hour. You have not always the same opportunity for right discerning, nor the same clearness of apprehension, nor the same outward means to help you, nor the same inward assistance of the Holy Ghost. When you have these, therefore make use of them, and fix your wavering soul, and take your question and doubt as resolved, and do not tempt God by calling Him to new answers again and again, as if He had given you no answer before.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1271.) You must not make use only at the present of your experiences, but lay them up for the time to come. Nor must you tempt God so far as to expect new experiences upon every new scruple or doubt of yours, as the Israelites expected new miracles in the wilderness, still forgetting the old. If a scholar should in his studies forget all that he hath read and learned, and all the resolutions of his doubts which in study he hath attained, and leave his understanding still as an unwritten paper, as a receptive of every mutation and new apprehension, and contrary conceit, as if he had never studied the point before, he will make but a poor proficiency, and have but a fluctuated, unsettled brain. A scholar should make all the studies of his life to compose one entire image of truth in his soul, as a painter makes every line he draws to compose one entire picture of man ; and as a weaver makes every thread to compose one web ; so should you make all former examinations, discoveries, evidences, and experiences, compose one full discovery of your condition, that so you may have a settled peace of soul ; and see that you tie both ends together, and neither look on your present troubled state without your former, lest you be unthankful and unjustly discouraged ; nor on your former state without observance of your present frame of heart and life, lest you deceive yourself or grow secure.

(1272.) Take heed of foolish, carnal, hasty expectations of comfort from the bare words of any man ; but use men's advice only to direct you in that way, where, by patience and faithfulness, you may meet with it in due season !

Nothing is more usual with silly souls, than to go to this or that excellent minister, whom they deservedly admire ; and to look that with an hour or two's discourse he should comfort them, and set all their bones in joint ; and when they find that it is not done, they either despair, or turn to the next deceiver, and say, " I tried the best of them : and if such a man cannot do it, none of them can do it. " But, silly soul, do physicians use to charm men into health ? Wilt thou go and talk an hour with the ablest physician, and say, that because his talk doth not cure thee, thou wilt never go to a physician more, but go to ignorant people that will kill thee ? The work of a minister is not to cure thee always immediately, by comfortable words (What words can cure an ignorant, melancholy, or incapable soul !) ; but to direct thee in thy duty, and in the use of those means, which if thou wilt faithfully and patiently practise, thou shalt certainly be cured in due time : if thou wilt use the physic, diet, and exercise which thy physician doth prescribe thee ; it is that which must restore thy health and comfort, and not the saying over a few words to thee. If thou lazily look that other men's words or prayers should cure and comfort thee without thy own endeavours, thou mayest thank thyself when thou art deceived.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1273.) You must not go to a minister to be cured merely by good words, as wizards do by charms ; and so think that all is well when he hath spoken comfortably to you. But you must go for directions in your own practice, that so the cure may be done by leisure when you come home. Truly, most even of the godly that I have known do go to a minister for comfort, as silly people go to a physician for physic. If the physician could stroke them whole, or give them a pennyworth of some pleasant stuff that would cure all in an hour, then they would praise him. But, alas ! the cure will not be done.—1. Without cost ;—Nor 2. without time and patience ;—Nor 3. without taking down unpleasing medicines ; and so they let all alone. So you come to a minister for advice and comfort, and you look that his words should comfort you before he leaves you, or at least, some short, small direction to take home with you. But he tells you, if you will be cured, you must resolve against that disquieting corruption and passion ; you must more meekly submit to reproof ; you must walk more watchfully and conscionably with God and men ; and then you must not give ear to the tempter ; with many the like. He gives you a bill of thirty several directions, and tells you you must practise all these. Oh, this seems a tedious course, you are never the nearer comfort for hearing these ; it must be by long and diligent practising of them. Is it not a foolish patient that will come home from the physician, and say, " I have heard all that he said, but I am never the better"? So you say, "I have heard all that the minister said, and I have never the more comfort." But have you done all that he bid you, and taken all the medicines that he gave you? Alas, the cure is most to be done by yourself (under Christ) when you come home. The minister is but the physician to direct you what course to take for the cure. And then as silly people run from one physician to another, hearing what all can say, and desirous to know what every man thinks of them, but thoroughly follow the advice of none, but perhaps take one medicine from one man, and one from another, and let most even of those lie by them in the box, and so perish more certainly than if they never meddled with any at all; so do most troubled souls hear what one man saith, and what another saith, and seldom thoroughly follow the advice of any; but when one man's words do not cure them, they say, "This is not the man that God hath appointed to cure me." And to another, "And that is not the man;" when they should rather say, "This is not the way," than, "This is not the man." This lazy complaining is not it that will do the work, but faithful practising the directions given you.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1274.) Another most common, unhappy mis-carriage of sad Christians lieth here. That they will rather continue complaining and self-tormenting, than give over sinning, so far as they might give it over if they would. I beseech you in the name of God, to know and consider what it is that God requireth of you. He doth not desire your vexation but reformation. No further doth He desire the trouble of your mind, than as it tendeth to the avoiding of that sin which is the cause of it. God would have you less in your fears and troubles, and more in your obedience. Obey more, and disquiet your mind less. Will you take this counsel presently, and see whether it will not do you more good than all the complaints and doubtings of your whole life has done. Set yourself with all your might against your pride, worldliness, and sensuality, your unpeaceableness and want of love and tenderness to your brethren; and whatever other sin your conscience is acquainted with. I pray you tell me if you had gravel in your shoe, in your travel, would it not be more wisdom to sit down and take off your shoe and cast it out, than to stand still, or go complaining, and tell every one you meet of your soreness? If you have a thorn in your foot, will you go on halting and lamenting? or will you pull it out?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1275.) The Syrophenician woman gained comfort in her misery by thinking great thoughts of Christ. The Master had talked about the children's bread. "Now," argued she, "since Thou art the Master of the table of grace, I know that Thou art a generous housekeeper, and there is sure to be abundance of bread on Thy table: there will be such an abundance for the children that there will be crumbs to throw on the floor for the dogs, and the children will fare none the worse because the dogs are fed." She thought Him one who kept so good a table that all she needed would only be a crumb in comparison. Yet remember what she wanted was to have the devil cast out of her daughter. It was a very great thing to her, but she had such a high esteem of Christ, that she said, "It is nothing to Him; it is but a crumb for Christ to give." This is the royal road to comfort. Great thoughts of your sin alone will drive you to despair; but great thoughts of Christ will pilot you into the haven of peace.

—Spurgeon.

11. Various consolations for feeble and fearful believers.

(1276.) Abel offered unto God the firstlings of his flock, and God had respect unto Abel and his offering. Though the earth was but newly cursed for the sin of man, yet God accepts the first-fruits thereof, well knowing there were no such things in the offerer's power to perform, but that which He had commanded the earth to yield. So shall those mean graces that are in us be accepted of God, though, too, too much they savour of the naughtiness of our nature. And why so, but because they proceed from His special blessing, and are the work of His Spirit. A great comfort for such as feel in themselves reluctances and spiritual assaults, by reason of the corruptions and imperfections that cleave unto the best things they do.

—Lalie, 1627.

(1277.) A living member is not burdensome to the body. A man's arms are not any burden to him, though otherwise massy and weighty; but a withered arm, or a limb mortified, hangeth like a lump of lead on it. Thus, so long as sin liveth in the soul, unkilld wholly, and unmortified as yet, so long our corruption is nothing at all cumbersome unto us, but when it is once mortified in a man, it beginneth to grow burdensome unto him, and to hang like a lump of dead flesh on his soul, and then beginneth the poor soul, pestered and oppressed with the weight of it, to cry out with the apostle: "O wretched man that I am! when shall I be once freed from this body of sin?"

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

(1278.) He is a scholar in the school that beginneth at Christ's cross-row, and he is entered into the college that readeth but Seton's logic, and he is a member of the family that was bound apprentice but yesterday. Thus, if thou be a penitent, though not in fulness of perfection; if thou believe, though not with the fullest measure of believing; if thou obey, though not in the highest degree of obedience; be comforted in thy weak beginnings, and resolve to proceed, and know that thou art already entered into the covenant of grace, and shalt enjoy that which Christ hath promised—freedom from damnation—"Thou shalt never see death."

—Spencer, 1658.

(1279.) As a man doth feel a pain which is but in the top of his finger more sensibly than the health of his whole body, yet the health of the body is more than the pain of a finger: even so a godly Christian doth more feel the flesh than the spirit, yet the power and efficacy of the spirit, by the virtue of the Holy Ghost, is such that it is able to prevail ordinarily against the flesh, and therefore the flesh is not more than the spirit. And as men feel corruption, not by corruption, but by grace: so, the more they feel their inward corruptions, the more grace they have.

—Cawdrey, 1598-1664.

(1280.) God may communicate the less of His assisting strength, that He may show the more of His supporting strength, in upholding weak grace. We do not wonder to see a man of strong constitution that eats his bread heartily, and sleeps soundly, live; but for a crazy body, full of ails and infirmities, to be so patched and shored up by the physician's art that he stands to old age, this begets some wonder in the beholders. It may be thou art a poor trembling soul, thy faith is weak, and thy assaults from Satan strong, thy corruptions stirring and active, and thy mortifying strength little, so that in thy opinion they rather gain ground on thy grace, than give ground to it, ever and anon thou art ready to think, thou shalt be cast as a wreck upon the devil's shore: and yet to this day thy grace lives, though full of leaks; now is it not worth the stepping aside to see this strange sight? A broken ship with masts and hull rent and torn, thus towed along by Almighty Power, through an angry sea, and armadoes of sins and devils, safely into His harbour! To see a poor dilling or rush-candle in the face of the boisterous wind, and not blown out! in a word to see a weak stripling in grace held up in God's arms till he beats the devil craven! This God is doing in upholding thee. Thou art one of those babes out of whose mouth God is perfecting His praise, by ordaining such strength for thee that thou, a babe in grace, shall yet foil a giant in wrath and power.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1281.) There may be truth of grace where there is not present sense of that truth. Yea, the creature may be passionately hunting from ordinance to ordinance to get that sincerity which it already hath; as sometimes you may have seen one seek very earnestly all about the house for his hat when at the same time he hath it on his head. Well, lay down this as a real truth in thy soul; I may be upright, though at present I am not able to see it clearly. This, though it will not bring in a full comfort, yet it may be some support till that come; as a shore to thy weak house, though it does not mend it, yet it will underprop and keep it standing till the Master-workman comes, the Holy Spirit, who with one kind word to thy soul, is able to set thee right in thy own thoughts, and make thee stand strong on the promise, the only true basis and foundation of solid comfort. Be not more cruel to thy soul, O Christian, than thou wouldst to thy friend's (shall I say?) yes, thy enemy body. Should one thou didst not much love lie sick in thy house, yes, so sick that if you should ask him whether he be alive, he could not tell you (his senses and speech being both at present gone), would you presently lay him out and coffin him up for the grave, because you cannot have it from his own mouth that he is alive? Surely not. Oh, how unreasonable and bloody then is Satan, who would presently have thee put thyself into the pit-hole of despair, because thy grace is not so strong as to speak for itself at present.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1282.) The infiniteness of God's knowledge is a comfort in case the saints have not so clear a knowledge of themselves. They find so much corruption that they judge they have no grace. "If it be so, why am I thus? If I have grace, why is my heart in so dead and earthly a frame?" Oh, remember God is of infinite knowledge; He can spy grace where thou canst not; He can see grace hid under corruption as the stars may be hid under a cloud. God can see that holiness in thee which thou canst not discern in thyself: He can spy the flower of grace in thee, though overtopped with weeds. "Because there is in him some good thing" (1 Kings xiv. 13). God sees some good thing in His people, when they can see no good in themselves; and though they judge themselves, He will give them an absolution.

—Watson, 1696.

(1283.) If you have faith, though but in its infancy, be not discouraged; for,

(1.) A little faith is faith as a spark of fire is fire.

(2.) A weak faith may lay hold on a strong Christ: a weak hand can tie the knot in marriage as well as a strong. She, in the Gospel, who but touched Christ, fetched virtue from Him.

(3.) The promises are not made to strong faith, but to true. The promise doth not say, He who hath a giant faith, who can believe God's love through a frown, who can rejoice in affliction, who can work wonders, remove mountains, stop the mouth of lions, shall be saved; but, Whosoever believes, be his faith never so small. A reed is but weak especially when it is bruised; yet the promise is made to it—"A bruised reed will He not break."

(4.) A weak faith may be fruitful. Weakest things multiply most. The vine is a weak plant, but it is fruitful. The thief on the cross, who was newly converted, was but weak in grace; but how many precious clusters grew upon that tender p'ant!

(5.) The weakest believer is a member of Christ as well as the strongest; and the weakest member of the body mystically shall not perish. Christ will cut off rotten members, but not weak members. Therefore, Christian, be not discouraged; God who would have us receive them that are weak in faith (Rom. xiv. 1) will not Himself refuse them.

—Watson, 1696.

(1284.) Amid all your conscious unworthiness, remember, you are His children. The soiled garments of earth which you may carry to the very portals of glory cannot alter a Father's feelings towards you, or lead Him to belie or forego His promises. If there be joy in heaven (and that joy deepest in the Father's heart) over the sinner in the hour of his repentance; what will be that joy in the hour of his glorification, when, stripped of his travel-worn, sin-stained raiment, all his truant-wanderings, and estrangements, and backslidings at an end, he enters the threshold of the paternal Home!

We have read somewhere a story in real life, regarding a long missing child, the heir to vast estates. The tale described how this innocent little one had been decoyed from the parental roof, and was last seen when a tribe of gipsies had been prowling about the neighbourhood of his princely home. Golden bribes had a hundred times been offered for his restoration; but the cruel mystery remained hopelessly unsolved, all efforts were in vain to recover the valued life. The anguished parents, seeing the pride and hope of their household wrenched from their grasp, abandoned themselves to inconsolable grief. One day, as the family carriage was, at a little distance, bearing along the highway these two saddened hearts, a gang of the wandering race were passing by. In their midst, with a heavy burden on his shoulders, and attired in tatters, an eye and a countenance met theirs which could not be mistaken. A shriek of mingled terror and delight was heard; the mother, leaping in frantic joy from her seat, had in a moment that aggregate of rags and squalor in her arms; her son who had been long dead was alive again; long lost, he was again found. What signified to her these years of degradation! It was her beloved boy, by whose cradle she had, in days gone by, sung her lullaby and weaved visions of fond hope; and though the golden ringlets were now matted with filth, the tiny hands hardened and begrimed with boyish drudgery, and the face browned and weatherbeaten by exposure to the hot sun by day and the cold, dewy, houseless night; yet there he was, her own, her only one! Yonder castle, looking forth on the wide demesne, kept high festal holiday that evening. Servants were gathered, and menials were feasted, and the fire-sides of the poor were made brighter and happier by the recovery of the wanderer.

So shall it be with the children of the heavenly kingdom in entering the heavenly home. What though, to the last, by these rags and tatters of nature, these souls begrimed with the remains of sin, we belie our lofty birthright, and render ourselves all unworthy of so glorious an inheritance; "doubtless Thou art our FATHER, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not."
—Macduff.

(1285.) Do not be troubled because you have not great virtues. God made a million spears of grass where He made one tree. The earth is fringed and carpeted, not with forests, but with grasses. Only have enough of little virtues and common fidelities, and you need not mourn because you are neither a hero nor a saint.
—Becker.

CONSCIENCE.

I. DEFINED.

(1286.) Conscience is a Latin word (though with an English termination), and, according to the very notation of it, imports a double or joint knowledge; to wit, one of a Divine law or rule, and the other of a man's own action: and so is properly the application of a general law to a particular instance of practice. The law of God, for example, says, "Thou shalt not steal;" and the mind of man tells him that the taking of such a thing from a person lawfully possessed of it is stealing. Whereupon the conscience, joining the knowledge of both these together, pronounces, in the name of God, that such a particular action ought not to be done. And this is the true procedure of conscience, always supposing a law from God, before it pretends to lay any obligation upon man. Conscience neither is nor ought to be its own rule.

—South, 1633-1716.

(1287.) As science means knowledge, conscience etymologically means self-knowledge. . . . But the English word implies a moral standard of action in the mind, as well as a consciousness of our own actions. . . . Conscience is the reason employed about questions of right and wrong, and accompanied with the sentiments of approbation and condemnation.
—Whewell.

(1288.) Conscience is the power by which we discern, judge, and feel, respecting human actions. It is the eye, the judge, and the heart of man's spiritual being. This is very unphilosophical language, but it is nearer the mark than much of the verbiage of philosophers. As the eye of the body discerns between white and black, so the conscience distinguishes between what is right and what is wrong in human conduct. And as our nerves discriminate between heat and cold, so the conscience feels either pain or pleasure, according to the moral qualities it discerns in the actions which it contemplates.
—Towar.

(1289.) "What is conscience?" said a Sunday-school teacher one day to the little flock that gathered around to learn the words of eternal life. Several of the children answered, one saying one thing, and another another, until a little timid child spoke out, "It is Jesus whispering in our hearts."

II. IS MORE THAN OPINION.

(1290.) Mere opinion or persuasion may be every whit as strong, and have as forcible an influence upon a man's actions as conscience itself. But then we know, strength or force is one thing, and authority quite another. A rogue upon the highway may have as strong an arm, and take off a man's head as cleverly as the executioner. But then there is a vast disparity in the two actions, when one of them is murder, and the other justice: nay, and our Saviour Himself told His disciples "that men should both kill them, and think that in so doing they did God service." So that here, we see, was a full opinion and persuasion, and a very zealous one too, of the high meritoriousness of what they did; but still there was no law, no word or command of God to ground it upon, and consequently it was not conscience.

—South, 1633-1716.

III. ITS FUNCTIONS.

1. It is designed to be our guide and monitor through life.

(1291.) Even as a man about to make an unknown journey should find one that would go with him and show him the way, with all the turnings thereof, he could not but take it for a great point of courtesy: so, likewise, seeing we are pilgrims in this world, our life is our journey, and God also hath appointed our conscience to be our companion and guide, to show us what course we may take and what we may not.
—Cowdrey, 1609.

(1292.) The voice of God Himself speaks in the heart of men, whether they understand it or no; and by secret intimations gives the sinner a foretaste of that direful cup which he is like to drink more deeply of hereafter.
—South, 1633-1716.

(1293.) The commandments of God being conformable to the dictates of right reason, man's judgment condemns him when he violates any of them, and so the sinner becomes his own tormentor.
—South, 1633-1716.

(1294.) If there is such a power, what is its office? It would seem to be simply this—to approve our conduct, when we do what we believe to be right; and to censure us, when we commit whatever we judge to be wrong. When reason, or religion, or education, has marked the distinction between virtue and vice, we are conscious of a pleasurable feeling when we practise the one, and of a painful sentiment when we are guilty of the other. The office of the conscience is not legislative, but judiciary: its voice is either laudative or obnoxious, rather than directive or imperative.

—Crombie.

2. It records our actions now.

(1295.) Conscience is the book in which our daily sins are written.

—Bernard, 1091-1153.

(1296.) As a notary or a registrar hath always the pen in his hand, to note and record whatsoever is said or done, who also, because he keeps the rolls and records of the court, can tell what hath been said and done many hundred years past: even so the conscience observes and takes notice of all things that we do, and inwardly and secretly within the heart doth tell us of them all.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(1297.) It is recorded of that reverend martyr, Bishop Latimer, that he took especial care in the placing of his words before Bonner, because he heard the pen working in the chimney, behind the cloth, setting down all (it may be more) than he said. So ought we circumspectly to look to all our sayings and doings; for conscience, as a scribe or registrar, sitting in the closet of our hearts, with pen in hand, makes a diurnal of all our ways, sets down the time when, the place where, the manner how things were performed, and that so clear and evident, that go where we will, do what we can, the characters of them shall never be cancelled or razed out, till God appears in judgment.

—Carpenter, 1628.

3. It will witness against us at the last.

(1298.) The Lord God hath set it as His deputy in the breast of man, which, though it be oftentimes a neuter when the act is doing and while sin is a committing, yet afterwards it will prove a friend and faithful witness for the Lord, but an adversary against man. Oh, that the wicked would think of this, who sin in hope and secrecy! Why, who sees them, who can witness anything against them, who can condemn them for such and such an action? Alas, poor soul! there is a conscience within thee that sees thee, and will condemn thee; thyself shall pass judgment against thyself. Be watchful, therefore, and ever remember conscience. Beware of hypocrisy and secret sins; for, though thou canst hide them from men and devils, yet not from it.

—Rogers, 1595-1660.

IV. HOW FAR ITS DECISIONS ARE AUTHORITY.

(1299.) The allegation or plea of conscience ought never to be admitted barely for itself; for when a thing obliges only by a borrowed authority, it is ridiculous to allege it for its own. Take a lieutenant, a commissioner, or ambassador of any prince; and, so far as he represents his prince, all that he does or declares under that capacity has the same force and validity as if actually done or declared by the prince himself in person. But then how far does this reach? Why, just so far as he keeps close to his instructions.

In like manner, every dictate of this vicegerent of God, where it has a Divine word or precept to back it, carries a Divine authority with it. But if no such word can be produced, it may indeed be a strong opinion or persuasion, but it is not conscience

—South, 1633-1716.

V. NOT AN INFALLIBLE GUIDE.

(1300.) There is no duty, but men may doubt and scruple the doing of it, pretending that their consciences are not satisfied that it is a duty, or ought to be done. Nor is there any action almost so wicked and unjust, but they may pretend that their consciences either prompt to it as necessary, or allow them in it as lawful. As there was one, in the late blessed times of rebellion and reformation, who murdered his own mother for kneeling at the sacrament, alleging that it was idolatry, and that his conscience told him it was his duty to destroy idolaters.

—South, 1633-1716.

(1301.) Though natural conscience ought to be listened to, yet it is revelation alone that is to be relied upon; as we may observe in the works of art, a judicious artist will indeed use his eye, but he will trust only to his rule.

—South, 1633-1716.

(1302.) Men get embarrassed by the common cases of a misguided conscience; but a compass may be out of order as well as a conscience, and the needle may point due south if you hold a powerful magnet in that direction. Still the compass, generally speaking, is a true and sure guide, and so is the conscience; and you can trace the deranging influence on the latter quite as surely as on the former.

—Arnold, 1795-1842.

(1303.) Conscience, as an expression of the law or will and mind of God, is not now to be implicitly depended on. It is not infallible. What was true to its office in Eden, has been deranged and shattered by the Fall: and now lies, as I have seen a sun-dial in the neglected garden of an old desolate ruin, thrown from its pedestal, prostrate on the ground, and covered by tall rank weeds. So far from being since that fatal event an infallible directory of duty, conscience has often lent its sanction to the grossest errors, and prompted to the greatest crimes. Did not Saul of Tarsus, for instance, hale men and women to prison; compel them to blasphemy; and imbrue his hands in saintly blood, while conscience approved the deed—he judging the while that he did God service? What wild and profane imaginations has it accepted as the oracles of God! and as if fiends had taken possession of a God-deserted shrine, have not the foulest crimes, as well as the most shocking cruelties, been perpetrated in its name? Read the Book of Martyrs, read the sufferings of our own forefathers; and under the cowl of a shaven monk, or the trappings of a haughty churchman, you shall see conscience persecuting the saints of God, and dragging even tender women and children to the bloody scaffold or the burning stake. With eyes swimming in tears, or flashing fire, we close the painful record, to apply to Conscience the words addressed to Liberty by the French heroine, when passing its statue, she rose in the cart that bore her to the guillotine, and throwing up her arms, exclaimed, "O Liberty, what crimes have been done in thy name!" And what crimes in thine, O Conscience! deeds from which even humanity shrinks; against which religion lifts her loudest protest; and which furnish the best explanation of these awful words, "If the light that is in you be darkness, how great is that darkness!"

So far as doctrines and duties are concerned, not conscience, but the revealed Word of God, is our one only sure and safe directory.

—Guthrie.

(1304.) Conscience has been compared to a clock, and the law of God to the sun. The clock is right only when it keeps time with the sun. And so it is with the conscience. It is a safe guide only when it is directed by the commandment of the Lord.

—J. W. Richardson.

(1305.) Conscience without a divine light, is like a dial without the sun; a shade, a blank, a useless instrument.

(1306.) There is a popular notion that in the construction of the human mind God infixed a faculty or organ which is the judge of what is right and what is wrong; and that it is inspired in some low degree, so that it is an authoritative judge. Conscience has therefore received any number of names, almost all of which are regal. Sometimes it is called the law of the soul; sometimes the light of the moral nature; sometimes the viceroy of God; and sometimes the revealer of truth. It is supposed to be a voice of the Divine. For all feelings, when they exist in a large nature, and under a very high state of excitement, are addicted to producing impressions either of sense or of sight. That is to say, a very high degree of excitement causes the nervous system to scintillate, as it were. Men have, therefore, an impression that the conscience is to a man's soul very much what the headlight is to a locomotive—a strong light with a reflector; and that it throws a beam right ahead in the middle of the night, lifting the track up clearly into the engineer's sight, so that he may see the obstructions, or the track, as the case may be.

The conscience is no such thing. It no more determines what is right than the principle of taste determines what is beauty, or than the desire of acquiring property determines what would be successful in business.

What we call conscience or moral sense is a complex organisation. It is the sentiment of conscience harmoniously educated and co-operating with a man's reason. It is, therefore, the ordinary thinking mind acting in reference to certain spheres of things in consonance with the emotion of conscience, which is the emotion that inspires pain or pleasure in view of things which are supposed to be right or wrong. And conscience is so blind that if you think a thing to be wrong which is as right as the throne of God, you will feel bad in the commission of it. And if you think a thing to be right which is as wrong as wrong can be, that conviction being strong in you, conscience will go on that side. Conscience has no interpreting power except indirectly. It is the reason that interprets. Conscience follows with its sanction, and stamps the decisions of reason with pleasure or with pain, with approbation or with disapprobation, when they pertain to moral conduct.

—Becher.

(1307.) I do not mean that conscience is a Divine interpreter; for I do not believe there is any such conscience as that. I believe that conscience is precisely like any other emotion. It determines what is right and wrong by what the understanding says is right or wrong. Conscience is an emotion that acts concurrently with intellect, and then gives force to that which the intellect judges to be right or wrong. And it gives pleasure or pain, according to the nature of that which is selected as right or wrong.

This sentiment of conscience, acting concurrently with the understanding, belongs to the whole human family. Where men believe in killing their fathers and mothers, and where they believe in killing their new-born children, offering them up to the Ganges or to crocodiles, they have a moral sense certainly. I do not undertake to say that it does not act according to a grossly imperfect standard; I do not undertake to say that it is exercised according to the best light; but when they do offer their parents, their children, or themselves up to destruction, they think it is right; though their understanding is darkened, and they are misguided.

If you erect a false light on the shore, and the pilot steers right towards it, and wrecks his vessel, he thinks he is right. He does not make shipwreck because he intends to, but because the false light is erected on the shore. Men steer for such lights as they have; and if those lights are false, they will suffer shipwreck. Their intention is generally to go by the best light they have.

—Becher.

VI. NEVERTHELESS MUST BE STRICTLY AHEADED.

(1308.) Let a man carefully attend to the voice of his reason, and all the dictates of natural morality, so as by no means to do anything contrary to them. For though reason is not to be relied upon as a guide universally sufficient to direct us what to do, yet it is generally to be relied upon and obeyed, where it tells us what we are not to do. It is indeed but a weak and diminutive light, compared to revelation; but it ought to be no disparagement to a star, that it is not a sun. Nevertheless, as weak and as small as it is, it is a light always at hand, and though enclosed, as it were, in a dark lantern, may yet be of a singular use to prevent many a foul step and to keep us from many a dangerous fall. And every man brings such a degree of this light into the world with him, that though it cannot bring him to heaven, yet if he be true to it, it will carry him a great way; indeed so far, that if he follows it faithfully, I doubt not but he shall meet with another light, which shall carry him quite through.

—South, 1633-1716.

(1309.) Ought not the light of reason to be looked upon by us as a rich and a noble talent, and such an one as we must account to God for; for it is certainly for Him. It is a ray of Divinity darted into the soul. "It is the candle of the Lord," as Solomon calls it; and God never lights us up a candle either to put out or to sleep by. If it be made conscious of a work of darkness, it will not fail to discover and reprove it; and therefore the checks of it are to be revered, as the echo of a voice from heaven; for whatsoever conscience binds here on earth, will be certainly bound there too; and it were a great vanity to hope or imagine, that either law or gospel will absolve what natural conscience condemns.

—South, 1633-1716.

(1310.) The sinner's conscience is the best expositor of the mind of God under any judgment or affliction.
—South, 1633-1716.

(1311.) In the commission of evil, fear no man so much as thyself: another is but one witness against thee; thou art a thousand; another thou mayest avoid; thyself thou canst not. Wickedness is its own punishment.
—Quarles, 1592-1644.

(1312.) Man without a conscience is a machine without a regulator; sometimes too fast, sometimes too slow, and seldom right.

VII. THE DANGER OF NEGLECTING IT.

(1313.) Conscience is a check to beginners in sin, reclaiming them from it and rating them for it; but this in long-standers becometh useless, either failing to discharge its office, or assaying it to no purpose: having often been slighted, it will be weary of chiding; or, if it be not wholly dumb, we shall be deaf to its reproof: as those who live by cataracts or downfalls of water, are, by continual noise, so deafened as not to hear or mind it; so shall we in time grow senseless, not regarding the loudest peals and rattlings of our conscience.

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

(1314.) No man ever yet offended his own conscience but first or last it was revenged upon him for it. So that it will concern a man to treat this great principle awfully and warily; by still observing what it commands, but especially what it forbids; and if he would have it always a faithful and sincere monitor to him, let him be sure never to turn a deaf ear to it; for not to hear it is the way to silence it. Let him strictly observe the first stirrings and intimations—the first hints and whispers of good and evil, that pass in his heart; and this will keep conscience so quick and vigilant, and ready to give a man true alarms upon the least approach of his spiritual enemy, that he shall be hardly capable of great surprise.

On the contrary, if a man accustoms himself to slight or pass over these first motions to good, or shrinkings of his conscience from evil, which originally are as natural to the heart of man as the appetites of hunger and thirst are to the stomach, conscience will by degrees grow dull and unconcerned, and from not spying out moles, come at length to overlook beams; from carelessness it shall fall into a slumber, and from a slumber it shall settle into a deep and long sleep; till at last perhaps it sleeps itself into a lethargy, and that such an one, that nothing but hell and judgment shall be able to awaken it. For long disuse of anything made for action will in time take away the very use of it. As I have read of one, who having for a disguise kept one of his eyes a long time covered, when he took off the covering, found his eye indeed where it was, but his sight was gone. He who would keep his conscience awake, must be careful to keep it stirring.
—South, 1633-1716.

(1315.) The not using of one's conscience works lethargy, dulness, and blindness. But when the conscience is fired by the Divine Spirit, it awakes and glows and becomes inconceivably more sensitive. You know what it is to have your hand numb, so that you scarcely feel that which you lay it upon; and you know what it is to have your hand acutely sensitive. You know what it is to have the eye blurred, dim, unseeing; and you know what it is to have the eye clear, strong, and discerning. Just so is it with conscience. It may exist in a state in which things pass before it, and it does not see them; but lies at the door like a watch-dog that is asleep, past which goes the thief or the robber into the house and commits his depredations undisturbed.

—Becher.

VIII. SHOULD BE CAREFULLY PROTECTED.

(1316.) When we put a lighthouse on the coast, that in the night mariners may explore the dark and terrible way of the sea, we not only swing glass around it to protect it, but we enclose that glass itself in a network of iron wire, that birds may not dash it in, the summer winds may not swoop it out, and that swarms of insects may not destroy themselves and the light. For if the light in the lighthouse be put out, how great a darkness falls upon the land and upon the sea. And the mariner, waiting for the light, or seeing it not, miscalculates, and perishes.

Now, a man's conscience ought to be protected from those influences that would diminish its light, or that would put it out; but there are thousands of men who are every day doing their utmost to destroy this light.
—Becher.

IX. WORKS DIFFERENTLY, BUT WITH THE SAME RESULT, IN DIFFERENT MEN.

(1317.) In some cases, conscience is like an eloquent and fair spoken judge, who declaims not against the criminal, but condemns him justly. In others the judge is more angry, and affrights the prisoner more; but the event is the same. For in those sins where the conscience affrights, as in those which it affrights not, supposing the sins equal, but of different natures, there is no other difference, but the conscience is a clock which in one man strikes aloud and gives warning, and in another the hand points silently to the figure, but strikes not; but by this he may as surely see what the other hears,—that his hours pass away, and death hastens, and after death comes judgment.
—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(1318.) Every man's conscience testifies that he is unlike what he ought to be, according to that law engraven upon his heart. In some, indeed, conscience may be seared or dimmer; or suppose some men may be devoid of conscience, shall it be denied to be a thing belonging to the nature of man? Some men have not their eyes, yet the power of seeing the light is natural to man, and belongs to the integrity of the body. Who would argue that, because some men are mad, and have lost their reason by a distemper of the brain, that therefore reason hath no reality, but is an imaginary thing? But I think it is a standing truth that every man hath been under the scourge of it, one time or other, in a less or a greater degree; for, since every man is an offender, it cannot be imagined conscience, which is natural to man, and an active faculty, should always be idle, without doing this part of its office.

—Cornock, 1628-1670.

X. ITS POWER.

(1319.) Like as it is a great pleasure and joy for a man who, returning home after a long and wearisome journey unto his own house, findeth there his wife, who cometh to take him about the neck, and embraceth him, kissing and making much of him, this courteous entertainment maketh him by and by to forget all his travail which he hath endured in his journey; and contrariwise, if he find his wife, after his return, brawling, riotous, froward, and who, instead of comforting him, would all manner of ways vex and torment him, this doing, no doubt, would increase and double his pains and torments which he hath endured in his long journey: even such is the estate of the conscience. Although our enemies commit a thousand outrages, violence, and villanies against us, yet if we, returning from ourselves, and entering into our own conscience, find there one with a cheerful and merry countenance, which doth comfort and content us, it maketh us in a moment to forget all our enemies; but, on the other side, if we have an evil conscience, it wearieth us in such sort, that we shall not find any house worse than our own, nor any place where we may worse quiet ourselves than with ourselves.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(1320.) This interior master, does he dictate nothing to you? This rack of the Almighty, does it never force you to confess what you would willingly deny?

—Saurin.

XI. TRUE PEACE OF CONSCIENCE.

1. Its only source.

(1321.) Peace of conscience is nothing but the echo of pardoning mercy, which sounding in the conscience, brings the soul into a sweet rest with the pleasant music it makes.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1322.) If a friend should come to a malefactor on his way to the gallows, put a sweet posy into his hands, and bid him be of good cheer, smell on that; alas! this would bring little joy with it to the poor man's heart, who sees the place of execution before him. But if one comes from the prince with a pardon, which he puts into his hand, and bids him be of good cheer—this, and this only will reach the poor man's heart, and overrun it with a sudden ravishment of joy. Truly anything short of pardoning mercy is as inconsiderable to a troubled conscience (towards any relieving or pacifying it) as that posy in a dying prisoner's hand would be. Conscience demands as much to satisfy it as God Himself doth to satisfy Him for the wrong the creature hath done Him. Nothing can take off conscience from accusing but that which takes off God from threatening. Conscience is God's sergeant. He employs to arrest the sinner. Now the sergeant hath no power to release his prisoner upon any private composition between him and the prisoner; but listens, whether the debt be fully paid, or the creditor fully satisfied: then, and not till then, he is discharged of his prisoner.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1323.) Pardon is the only fit remedy for a troubled conscience: what can give ease to a wounded spirit, but pardoning mercy? Offer him he honours and pleasures of the world; 'tis as if you bring flowers and music to one that is condemned.

—Watson, 1696.

(1324.) Suppose a man hath a thorn in his foot, which puts him to pain; let him anoint it, or wrap it up, and keep it warm; yet, till the thorn be plucked out, it aches and swells, and he hath no ease; so when the thorn of sin is gotten into a man's conscience, there's no ease till the thorn be pulled out; when God removes iniquity, now the thorn is plucked out. How was David's heart finely quieted, when Nathan the prophet told him, "the Lord hath put away thy sin." How should we therefore labour for forgiveness! till then we can have no ease in our mind: nothing but a pardon sealed with the blood of the Redeemer can ease a wounded spirit.

—Watson, 1696.

2. A life-long blessing.

(1325.) A palsy may as well shake an oak, or a fever dry up a fountain, as either of them shake, dry up, or impair the delight of conscience. For it lies within, it centres in the heart, it grows into the very substance of the soul, so that it accompanies a man to his grave—he never outlives it; and that for this cause only, because he cannot outlive himself.

—South, 1633-1716.

3. A reason for thanksgiving.

(1326.) When the Romans, by conquest, might have given law to the Grecians at Corinth, in the solemn time of the Isthmian games, their general, by an herald, unexpectedly proclaimed freedom to all the cities of Greece. The proclamation at first did so amaze the Grecians, that they did not believe it to be true; but when it was proclaimed the second time, they gave such a shout, that the very birds flying in the air were astonished therewith, and fell dead to the ground. But, if you will have a better story, take that of the Jews, who, when at first they heard of Cyrus' proclamation, and that the Lord thereby had turned the captivity of Sion, they confess that at the first hearing of it they were like men that dreamt; but afterwards their mouths were filled with laughter and their tongues with singing. Now, the peace that the Grecians and the Jews had was but the peace of a people, or a nation, and a great blessing of God too. But how much more reason is there that our affections should be strained to the highest pitch of joy and thanks, when we hear of the proclamation of the peace of conscience?—that peace, which is not of our bodies, but of our souls; not of our earthly, but of our heavenly estate—a peace that shall be begun here and shall endure for ever hereafter; such a peace as will make God at peace with us, reconcile us to ourselves, and make us at concord with all the world.

—Lake, 1627.

XII. FALSE PEACE OF CONSCIENCE.

1. From what it arises.

(1327.) Let no man conclude, because his conscience says nothing to him, that therefore it has nothing to say. Possibly some never so much as doubted of the safety of their spiritual estate in all their lives; and if so, let them not flatter themselves, but rest assured that they have so much the more reason a great deal to doubt of it now. For the causes of such a profound stillness are generally gross ignorance, or long custom of sinning, or both; and these are very dreadful symptoms indeed to such as are not hell and damnation proof. When a man's wounds cease to smart, only because he has lost his feeling, they are nevertheless mortal for this not seeing his need of a surgeon. It is not mere, actual, present ease, but ease after pain, which brings the most durable and solid comfort. Acquittal before trial can be no security. Great and strong calms usually portend and go before the most violent storms. And, therefore, since storms and calms (especially with reference to the state of the soul) do always follow one another; certainly of the two it is much more eligible to have the storm first and the calm afterwards: since a calm before a storm is commonly a peace of a man's own making; but a calm after a storm, a peace of God's.

—South, 1633-1716.

2. Its folly.

(1328.) Sin is in the world, sin lurks in your hearts and mine; and yet men take little account of it. There was a city visited by the plague long since; and whilst death was busily smiting every household, a few frivolous men and women sought out a pleasant retirement, and there they spent their days in weaving love-tales and playing with compliments; and still the plague was cutting off hundreds at their gate. Just so do we act under our greater plague. Oh, my friends, it is not by hiding our heads, like a silly bird pursued by hunters, that we can escape the keen eyes of our pursuer. The question is—are you willing to die as you are living?

—Thomson.

3. Deceptive and dangerous.

(1329.) Your peace is a false peace. It is the friendship of Joab, concealing his murderous dagger. It is the slumber of Samson in the lap of Delilah, softly depriving him of his locks. It is a sleep obtained by opium. It is the loss of feeling, the presage of death. It is the calm of the Dead Sea, the consequence and the evidence of a curse. Thus we have observed, that before a fall of exceedingly heavy rain, the wind has been unusually still. Thus travellers inform us, that before an earthquake the air is uncommonly serene. Whether therefore you will hear, or whether you will forbear, I sound the alarm, and give you warning from God—"Woe to them that are at ease in Zion!"

—Jay.

(1330.) This apathy of soul is but as the awful calm of nature which ushers in the bursting of the earthquake or volcano; or it may be likened to the dead repose of nature which precedes the approaching storm on some Alpine summit: the winds are hushed, not a leaf is seen to move, and the solitary bird seeks his sheltered nook—an awful stillness prevails, but it is the stillness of the gathering tempest, which is about to sweep in desolation all around it, and from which the thunders of an angry heaven are prepared to burst. Such is that deathlike stupor of the conscience which is only to issue in desolation and the blackness of darkness for ever.

—Salter.

4. Imperfect and insecure.

(1331.) As the sick man, when he seems to sleep and take his rest, is inwardly full of troubles; so the benumbed and drowsy conscience wants not secret pangs and terrors.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(1332.) Many besot their conscience with the brutish pleasures of sin; and when they have laid it as fast asleep in senseless stupidity as one that is dead drunk, then they may sin without control, till it wakes again. This is the height of that peace which any carnal receipt can help the sinner unto; to give a sleeping potion that shall bind up the senses of conscience for a while, in which time the wretch may forget his misery, as the condemned man doth when he is asleep, but as soon as it awakes, the horror of his condition is sure again to affright him worse than before. God keep you all from such a cure for your troubles of conscience, which is a thousand times worse than the disease itself! Better to have a dog that will by his barking tell us a thief is in our yard, than one that will sit still and let us be robbed before we have any notice of our danger.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

5. Satan's care not to disturb it.

(1333.) A presumptuous faith is an easy faith; it hath no enemy in Satan, or our own corrupt hearts to oppose it, and so like a stinking weed, shoots up and grows rank on a sudden. The devil never hath the sinner surer than when dreaming in this fool's paradise, and walking in his sleep, amidst his vain phantastical hopes of Christ and salvation. And therefore he is so far from waking him that he draws the curtains close about him that no light nor noise in his conscience may break his rest. Did you ever know the thief call him up in the night whom he meant to rob and kill? No, sleep is his advantage. But true faith he is a sworn enemy against; he persecutes it in the very cradle, as Herod did Christ in Cratch, he pours a flood of wrath after it as soon as it betrays its own birth by crying and lamenting after the Lord; if thy faith be legitimate, Naphtali may be its name; and thou mayest say, with great wrestling, have I wrestled with Satan, and my own base heart, and at last have prevailed.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

XIII. THE EFFECTS OF AN AWAKENED CONSCIENCE.

(1334.) Even as he who is troubled with a burning fever is hotter than he who is parched with the sun: so is that man more troubled who hath a guilty conscience than a good man by all outward afflictions.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(1335.) If a man be sick, wear he never so stately robes, he minds them not; have he never so dainty fare, he relisheth it not; lay him in never so soft a bed, yet he cannot rest: his diseased body feels nothing but the afflicting peccant humour. Even so, when the remorse of conscience works, all our gifts and parts, be they never so great, appear not; riches, though in great abundance, satisfy not; honours, preferments, though never so eminent, advantage not; though we have them all for the present, yet we have not the use of them: we see, we hear, but we feel nothing but sin; as experience teacheth them that have been distressed in this kind.

—Lake, 1627.

(1336.) A guilty conscience is a real tomb, wherein the possessed person lodges, and where stench and darkness reign.

—Quend.

(1337.) The envenomed head of sin's arrow that lies burning in conscience, and by its continual booming and throbbing there, keeps the poor sinner out of quiet, yea, sometimes in insupportable torment and horror, is guilt. —Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1338.) Conscience is too great a power in the nature of man to be altogether subdued : it may for a time be repressed and kept dormant ; but conjectures there are in human life which awaken it ; and when once re-awakened, it flashes on the sinner's mind with all the horrors of an invisible ruler and a future judgment.

—Blair, 1718-1800.

(1339.) As soon as the conscience becomes sensitive, it brings a man's sins to a more solemn account than before.

There are many things that we adjudge to be sinful. We condemn them as sinful. A man says, "Profanity is sinful," or "dishonesty is sinful;" but, after all, he has a good-natured way of dealing with these things. If men were as good-natured to their enemies as they are to their own sins, there would be much less conflict in the world than there is, for they contrive to live on the best of terms with their faults. I knew a man that had a huge rock in his field. He did not want to waste time and powder to blast and remove it. What did he do? Why, he planted ivy and roses and honeysuckles about it to cover it up; and he invites people to come and see how beautiful it is. A certain part of his farm was low, moist, and disagreeable. And, instead of collecting the water, and letting it run in a central channel, he planted mosses, ferns, rhododendrons, and the like over the place, and let them grow; and now he regards that as one of the handsomest parts of his farm. And men treat their faults so. Here is a man that has a hard and ill-temper; but he has planted all about it ivy and roses and honeysuckles which cover it, so that when he looks at it he sees only flowers and green leaves. He thinks he is a better man because all his imperfections are hidden from his sight. Here is a man that does not drain his swamps of evil courses, but covers them over with mosses and various plants, and thinks he is better because he is more beautiful in his own eyes. And men are for ever decorating themselves, smoothing their asperities, covering up their boulders. And there come times in the history of men when it seems as though God, with the voice of resurrection, called out to their conscience, and shook it, and made it awake. And then comes to them a sense of that which was spoken of by the apostle—the exceeding sinfulness of sin.

—Becher.

(1340.) When a man's conscience is aroused, and he is attempting to reform, he says: "As long as I did about as well as I knew how, I did very well; but, as soon as I attempted to regulate pride and vanity and the appetites and passions, it seemed to me that I never had so much turmoil and confusion. And is it so," he says, "that religion makes a man worse? I have been trying to live a religious life; and I think I have been a worse man than I was before." I will tell you what you have been like; you have been like an old family well, that has not been cleaned for twenty years, and that is undergoing the process of cleaning. A man has a well that has become very foul, and threatens to breed disease, and he is determined to clean it out; and men go down and scoop up bits of sticks, and pieces of crockery, and all manner of filth. And immediately after these things have been removed, the man draws a bucket of water, and says: "It is dirtier than ever before!" Of course, it is, for it has not had time to settle yet. By and by it will be purer than ever before, but not yet.

—Becher.

(1341.) The next fact of this reviving of the conscience is that, while it carries up the judgment of the sinfulness of sinful acts, it brings into the category of sins a thousand things that before we never have called such. Consider how very small a part of your daily life is morally judged at all. You have set apart a few great staple sins, and if you commit any of these you think you are sinful; but all the rest of your conduct goes almost without examination. You scarcely think about it. Why, the wastes of human life in this direction are perfectly incalculable! Of the feelings that flow through your mind, the probability is that nine hundred and ninety-nine in a thousand are not registered. You do not consider them at all. You give them no moral standing. You have no sense of whether they are right or wrong. A vast majority of the judgments of myriads of flashing feelings in the way of retrospections or outward lookings are never recorded, never classified, never tested.

When gold comes into the Assay Office, they treat it as we do not treat ourselves. It is carefully weighed when it is brought in, and during the process of assaying it is worked up to the very last particle. Every particle is deemed precious; yea, the very sweepings of the floor are gathered together and are assayed again.

Now men throw in their conduct in bulk, and do not care for the sweepings; and vastly the greatest portion of it comes out without being brought to any test. The most transcendent feelings, the most important interior agencies in the structure of man's moral character are being acted on and worked out, and men neither scrutinise nor form just judgments of them; and it is to the last degree important that there should come periods in which men are obliged to bring into the category of sins those practices which otherwise they would call their faults, or weaknesses, or foibles, or infirmities, or what not.

See how it is to-day in New York. They have a board of health there. And how much dirt there was found the moment there was an authority to make men look for it. Everybody is scouring, and everybody is scrubbing dirt. It is not half as dirty as it was a little while ago; but the dirt is more apparent, because it is stirred up. Once bring the influence of sanitary law to bear, and see how gutters that time out of mind have been neglected are attended to. Men, looking at them, say: "They are filthy."

Now, let the power of conscience be brought to bear on men who have been indulging in wrong, and they pause and say: "That is not right, is it? I ought to stop it." Only give a clearer sense of what is right to men, and they will instantly see in themselves much wrong that they have not before discovered.

The probability is that now, in New York, there is more apprehension of danger from a want of cleanliness than there has been during the last twenty-five years put together. This has arisen not from the fact that the city is less cleanly than it has been—it is more cleanly; but from the increased sensibility of men on the subject, and the application of a higher test to it.

It is so in housekeeping. You go in and out of your house, and do not perceive that it is wanting in cleanliness; but by and by comes the bustle and preparation of cleaning. Owing to a seeming annual instinct, when the birds build their nests, the housekeeper begins to clean hers. Now, see what a sense there is of webs and dust and concealed dirt, and how everything is probed, or winnowed, or tested, or washed and scoured, and what a vast amount of neglected, treasured dust and various filth there is. But take a magnifying glass, and let it reveal to you what is the structure of what you call dust. This is a particle of bone; this is a bit of shell; this is insect dirt; and what you call dust, and brush off from your hand or your clothes, is composed of specks and fragments of hundreds of different objects, which, if you saw them in a mass, would be horrible to you.

Now, that which is true of the accumulation of dust on the body is more signally true of the accumulation of particles of thought and feeling and conduct upon the soul. Men are insensible of it until there comes this revealing power of God, and the conscience is awakened so as to bring them to judgment; and then how do they say, "We are swallowed up in transgression!" —Becker.

XIV. THE DIFFICULTY OF SATISFYING IT.

(1342.) When a man begins to labour to satisfy his conscience, his conscience becomes exacting faster than he can learn how to perform. His ideal, associated with his moral sense, augments more rapidly than his performance. So that the more he does, the less he is satisfied. Many a man will witness to me here that the most violent exertions that he ever put forth were toward reformations that brought him the least of comfort. Here stands an old house that has been a hundred years without a repair. The old master dies, and a new man comes in; and with him comes reformation and reparation. He sends for his architect and master workman, that commence searching to ascertain what is required to be done. There is a shingle off, which must be put on. But when that is taken off, it is found that the next one is rotten. When that is taken off, it is found that the next one is rotten. When that is taken off, it is found that the very boards to which the shingles are fastened are rotten. And these must come out. And when these are taken out, it is found that the very beam under them is decayed. And this must come out. And by probing it is found that there is decay all through the building. And the result is, that when the house is gone through, the man has spent enough to have built a new one, and still it is an old one. Part leads to part, and disclosure to disclosure, and decay to decay; and it seems as though it was almost impossible ever to make it good. That is but a faint emblem of the work of reformation in the human soul. When a man begins to probe his disposition, he finds it to be a very different thing from a house. A house is inert, and offers no resistance to his attempts to renew and renovate it; but the human disposition is an ever-fertile, ever-growing, ever-recreating centre. And a man is conscious that the more he tries to regulate it, the harder it is to do it.

—Becker.

XV. IS CAPABLE OF IMMENSE IMPROVEMENT.

(1343.) How far it may be improved, is evident from that high and refined morality which shone forth both in the lives and writings of some of the ancient heathens, who yet had no other light but this, both to live and to write by. For how great a man in virtue was Cato, of whom the historian gives this glorious character: Esse quam rideri bonus mæbal! And of what an impregnable integrity was Fabricius, of whom it was said, that a man might as well attempt to turn the sun out of his course, as to bring Fabricius to do a base or a dishonest action! And then for their writings; what admirable things occur in the remains of Pythagoras, and the books of Plato, and of several other philosophers! short, I confess, of the rules of Christianity, but generally above the lives of Christians.

(1344.) The sailor, by using his eye, can see farther than any one else; the athlete can accomplish physical results the physically untrained cannot. So, in the fine arts, the faculty of perception of the beautiful, by using it, becomes finer and more subtle. It is the same with the conscience, which may become so educated as to be the subtle detector of wrong—a good conscience. The faculty used strengthens; the faculty disused withers and decays.

—Chapin.

(1345.) A parboiled conscience is not right, soft in one part and hard in another. The spirit of God is uniform in its work.

—Gurnall.

XVI. TENDERNESS OF CONSCIENCE.

(1346.) Tenderness applied to the conscience properly imports quickness and exactness of sense, which is the perfection of this faculty, whose duty it is to be a spiritual watch to give us warning of whatsoever concerns us. It is indeed the eye of the soul: and though the eye is naturally the most tender and delicate part of the body, yet it is not therefore called weak so long as its sight is quick and strong. Conscience, the more sensible it is to accuse or excuse (which is its office), and to spy out every little thing which may annoy or defile the soul, so much the more tender it is to be accounted, but not therefore so much the more weak; which sufficiently shows weakness and tenderness of conscience to be, in strictness of speech, two different things.

(1347.) A tender conscience, like the eye, is offended with a mote. A dead corpse is unaffected with the deepest wounds; but the point of a needle makes the living body to writhe. While others do not groan, though charged with heinous crimes, the Christian complains even of infirmities, of wandering thoughts, of earthly affections. A look from his offended Lord will make him "go out and weep bitterly."

—Jay.

CONTENTMENT.

1. Is a characteristic of the Christian.

(1348.) The Christian is content with his situation, because the Lord chooses it for him ; his spirit is not eager for alterations in his circumstances. If Divine providence points out and leads to a change, he is ready to follow, though it should be what the world would call from a better to a worse ; for he is a pilgrim and a stranger here, and a citizen of heaven. As people of fortune sometimes, in travelling, submit cheerfully to inconvenient accommodations, very different from their homes, and comfort themselves with thinking they are not always to live so ; so the Christian is not greatly solicitous about externals. If he has them, he will use them moderately. If he has but little of them, he can make a good shift without them : he is but upon a journey, and will soon be at home. If he be rich, experience confirms our Lord's words (Luke xii. 15) ; and satisfies him, that a large room, a crowd of servants, and twenty dishes upon his table, add nothing to the real happiness of life. Therefore he will not have his heart set upon such things. If he be in a humbler state, he is more disposed to pity than to envy those above him ; for he judges they must have many encumbrances from which he is freed. However, the will of God, and the light of His countenance, are the chief things the Christian, whether rich or poor, regards ; and therefore his moderation is made known unto all men.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

2. The example of St. Paul.

(1349.) God had brought St. Paul into as great a variety of conditions as ever we read of any man, and yet he was content ; else sure he could never have gone through it with so much cheerfulness. See into what vicissitudes this blessed Apostle was cast : "we are troubled on every side," there was the sadness of his condition ; "but not distressed," there was his content in that condition : "we are perplexed," there is his affliction ; "but not in despair," there is his contentation. And, if we read a little further, "In afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults," &c.—there is his trouble : and behold his content, "As having nothing, yet possessing all things." When the Apostle was driven out of all, yet in regard of that sweet contentment of mind (which was like music in his soul) he possessed all. We read a short map or history of his sufferings, (2 Cor. xi. 23-25) : "In prisons more frequent, in deaths oft," &c. Yet behold the blessed frame and temper of his spirit, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content." Which way soever providence did blow, he had such heavenly skill and dexterity, that he knew how to steer his course. For his outward estate he was indifferent : he could be either on the top of Jacob's ladder, or at the bottom ; he could sing either the dirge or the anthem ; he could be anything that God would have him : "I know how to want, how to abound." Here is a rare pattern for us to imitate. Paul, in regard of his faith and courage, was like a cedar, he could not be stirred ; but for his outward condition, he was like a reed bending every way with the wind of providence. When a prosperous gale did blow upon him, he could bend with that, "I know how to be full ;" and when a boisterous gust of affliction did blow, he could bend in humility with that, "I know how to be hungry." St. Paul was (as Aristotle speaks) like a die that hath four squares ; throw it which way you will, it falls upon a bottom : let God throw the Apostle which way He would, he fell upon this bottom of contentment. A contented spirit is like a watch : though you carry it up and down with you, yet the spring of it is not shaken ; nor the wheels out of order, but the watch keeps its perfect motion : so it was with St. Paul, though God carried him into various conditions, yet he was not lift up with the one nor cast down with the other ; the spring of his heart was not broken, the wheels of his affections were not disordered, but kept their constant motion towards heaven ; still content. —Watson, 1696.

3. Is peculiar to the children of God.

(1350.) If we should put some men to an art that they are not skilled in, how unfit would they be for it ? Put an husbandman to limning or drawing pictures, what strange work would he make ? This is out of his sphere. Take a limner that is exact in laying of colours, and put him to plough, or set him to planting and grafting of trees ; this is not his art, he is not skilled in it. Bid a natural man live by faith, and when all things go cross, be contented ; you bid him do what he hath no skill in ; you may as well bid a child guide the stern of a ship. To live contented upon God in the deficiency of outward comforts is an art which "flesh and blood hath not learned ;" nay, many of God's own children who excel in some duties of religion, when they come to this of contentment, now do they bungle ! They have scarcely commenced masters of this art. —Watson, 1696.

4. From what it arises.

(1351.) Content is the gift of heaven, and not the certain effect of anything upon earth ; and it is as easy for Providence to convey it without wealth as with it ; it being the undeniable prerogative of the first cause, that whatsoever it does by the mediation of second causes, it can do immediately by itself without them. The heavens can and do every day derive water and refreshment upon the earth without either pipes or conduits, though the weakness of human industry is forced to fly to these little assistances to compass the same effects. Happiness and comfort stream immediately from God Himself, as light issues from the sun, and sometimes looks and darts itself into the meanest corners while it forbears to visit the largest and the noblest rooms. Every man is happy or miserable, as the temper of his mind places him, either directly under, or beside, the influences of the Divine nature ; which enlighten and enliven the disposed mind with secret, ineffable joys, and such as the vicious or unprepared mind is wholly unacquainted with. "We have nothing, and yet we possess all things," says the Apostle (2 Cor. vi. 10). And can a greater happiness be imagined, than that which gives a man here all things in possession, together with a glorious eternity in reversion ? In a word, it is not what a man has, but what he is, which must make him happy. —Smith, 1633-1716.

5. How it is to be attained.

(1352.) As the remedy to quench his thirst that is vexed with a hot fever cometh not of giving him drink, but of taking away his fever which causeth his thirst : even so the way to grow rich is not by heaping of riches, but by diminishing the covetousness and unlawful desire of the same.

—Cawdrey, 1598-1664.

(1353.) To secure a contented spirit, measure your desires by your fortunes, and not your fortunes by your desires. —Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

(1354.) Be content: and the best way to be contented is, believe that condition best which God carves out to you by His providence. If God had seen it fit for us to have more, we would have had it; but His wisdom sees this best for us. Perhaps we could not manage a great estate, it is hard to carry a full cup without spilling, and a full estate without sinning. Great estates may be snares; a boat may be overturned by having too great a sail. The believing that estate best God carves for us makes us content. —Watson, 1696.

6. Reasons for contentment.

(1355.) If a traveller hath but enough to bring him to his journey's end, he desires no more. We have but a day to live, and perhaps we may be now in the twelfth hour of that day; and if God give us but enough to bear our charges till night, it is sufficient; let us be content. If a man had the lease of a house or farm but for two or three days, and he should fall a-building and planting, would he not be judged very indiscreet? So, when we have but a short time here, and death calls us presently off the stage, to thirst immoderately after the world, and pull down our souls to build up an estate, were it not extreme folly? Therefore, as Esau said once, in a profane sense, concerning his birthright, "Lo! I am at the point to die, and what profit shall this birthright do to me?" so let us all say, in a religious sense, "Lo! I am even at the point of death, my grave is going to be made, and what good will the world do to me? If I have but enough till sun-setting, I am content." —Cowdrey.

(1356.) We stand oft in our own light; if we should sort, or parcel out our own comforts, we should hit upon the wrong. Is it not well for the child, that the parent doth choose for it? Were it left to itself, it would perhaps choose a knife to cut its own fingers. A man in a paroxysm calls for wine, which if he had, it were little better than poison: it is well for the patient, that he is at the physician's appointment.

The consideration of a decree determining, and a providence disposing of all things that fall out, should work our hearts to holy contentment. The wise God hath ordered our condition: if He sees it better for us to abound, we shall abound; if He sees it better for us to want, we shall want; be content to be at God's disposal.

God sees, in His infinite wisdom, the same condition is not convenient for all; that which is good for one, may be bad for another; one season of weather will not serve all men's occasions; one needs sunshine, another rain; one condition of life will not fit every man, no more than one suit of apparel will fit everybody. —Watson, 1696.

(1357.) God will place us as an architect places the stones of a building, each one in the spot to which it is adapted. —Vianney.

7. Its wisdom.

(1358.) That happy state of mind, so rarely possessed, in which we can say, "I have enough," is the highest attainment of philosophy. Happiness consists, not in possessing much, but in being content with what we possess. He who wants little always has enough. —Zimmermann.

(1359.) Two chimneys stood near each other on separate houses; one high, and therefore very conspicuous; the other short, just jutting above the roof.

"What a contemptible figure you cut," said the tall one, looking down disdainfully on his neighbour, the short chimney.

"I know it," said the short one; "I am but a very humble thing, I know."

"You need to look up very high to see my top," remarked the tall chimney.

"Yes," said the little one.

"Why, you are hardly worthy the name of a chimney at all," observed the other; "you are short!"

"I don't pretend to be greater than I am, though I am just as high as I ought to be for my place," replied the little chimney.

"As high as you ought to be! Well, that is good, truly; why, you are little better than a mere hole in the roof," said the tall one with a loud laugh.

"It isn't becoming that all chimneys should be of one height," said the little one modestly. "It is fitting that some should be high, like you; and some low down, like me; and, as our duties are the same, we are pretty much upon an equality after all, whether tall or short."

The morning light showed the short chimney smoking as usual. Where was the tall one? Alas! a storm which had come on suddenly in the night had swept it from its place because so exposed—it lay only a heap of bricks on the ground.

"How thankful I am," said the little chimney, "that I was so low; had I been high, like my poor neighbour, I might, and no doubt should, have shared his unhappy fate" (Prov. xvi. 18).

—Bowden.

(1360.) "If I cannot do any worthier service, it is not unworthy to be what I am," said the button on the old barn door.

And then it went on to say:—

"No doubt there are stronger and much better buttons than myself; but, after all, a button's a button, whether of iron or brass, whilst I am but a plain wooden one. Well, but if my master does not despise me, and I answer the purpose for which buttons are designed, I ought to be happy in being what I am, and thankful I've lasted so long. Many better things than buttons wear out in shorter time, and my labour is much less than theirs. The poor hinges have harder work, and therefore often crack and groan with the weight of the hatch hanging upon them, and the door itself would be roughly served by the wind and other causes, were it not for me to fasten it; and therefore, with all my poverty, who am but a humble wooden button, let me be thankful I have nothing worse in my lot to complain of, and that I still can do the work for which I was at first affixed to this post."

Nothing of His works is despised by Him who made all things (Ps. cxlv. 9); but, without self-respect, an individual sinks himself to the level of the most abject.

The humblest, but honest offices in society, have their good uses, and those members of the body which seem to be more feeble are necessary (1 Cor. xii. 22).

Right views of ourselves will prove grounds for humble thankfulness. What have we that we "have not received"? Grace excludes boasting; therefore, said St. Paul, "By the grace of God I am what I am." —Bowden.

(1361.) "Ours is a very humble business," said one of the stepping-stones across the stream which went splashing and rattling along its way.

"Our heads are above water, however; that's one thing in our favour," said a second.

"True," observed the first speaker, "there are plenty below us."

"I judge we are very serviceable in our place, which is as much as the finest bridge over the largest river in the world can say of itself," remarked the third.

"It's just as well to be here as there, for aught that I can see," observed another.

"My opinion is, that plenty are glad of our help in crossing the stream, and would be sorry to lose our assistance," said a fifth; the truthfulness of which last observation was so apparent, that the stepping-stones together signified their assent; and therefore resolved, in future, not to be dissatisfied with their station, which, although so humble, was really so useful.

Those who are but low in the world, may find such as are even lower than themselves.

Not to be entirely overwhelmed by trials is a mercy above many. It will greatly help to reconcile the mind to its lot, to reflect that there are those whose conditions are inferior, and whose trials are greater than ours.

Some do great good that are but little known; and the poorest, with the grace and blessing of God, may further in some way the progress of truth.

In every station in life it should be the desire of the heart to do the will of the Lord, and "by love serve one another." —Bowden.

(1362.) "We travel far and travel fast," said the coach one day to his wheels; stopping near an old milestone by the side of the road, to which, calling, it said with a laugh—

"Aren't you tired of always standing in one place?"

"If you are not tired with running, why should I be of staying?" answered the old milestone gravely.

"Ah! but I am on wheels, and my duties require nimbleness," remarked the coach.

"Granted," replied the milestone, "but I don't see there is so great a difference between us, after all. You would be as motionless as myself without your horses; and, as to usefulness, milestones have their duties as well as have stage-coaches. If yours are to carry passengers from place to place, mine are to afford travellers information on their way. Besides, boast as you may, I have sometimes heard of coaches upsetting, and breaking down, and wearing out, and being stopped and robbed; but I never heard of such things happening unto milestones. Therefore, friend, taking all into consideration, I fancy I am the safer if the quieter of the two; and if you are happy in running, I am contented in staying, humbly to do the duties of my station; and perhaps as honourably as yourself, although you are a fast coach, and myself am but a poor milestone on the road."

All have their places in the world, and duties to perform; and

"They also serve that only stand and wait."

Great boasters are oftentimes the least secure (Eccles. ix. 11; Prov. xvi. 19). —Bowden.

8. Its blessedness.

(1363.) One observes concerning manna, when the people were contented with the allowance that God gave them, then it was very good; but when they would not be content with God's allowance, but would be gathering more, then, says the text, "there were worms in it." So, when we are content with our conditions, and that which God disposeth of us to be in, there's a blessing in it; but if we must needs be reaching out for more than God hath allotted, or to keep it longer than God would have us to have it, then there will be worms in it, a canker to eat it, a moth to fret it—nothing at all that is good. —Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(1364.) The soul which is possessed of this rich treasure of contentment, is like Noah in the ark, that can sing in the midst of a deluge.

—Watson, 1696.

(1365.) The contented heart is never out of heart. Contentation is a golden shield, that doth beat back discouragements. Humility is like the lead to the net, which keeps the soul down when it is rising through passion; and contentment is like the cork, which keeps the heart up when the heart is sinking through discouragements. Contentment is the great under-prop: it is like the beam which bears whatever weight is laid upon it; nay, it is like a rock that breaks the waves. —Watson, 1696.

(1366.) Contentment is a pearl of great price, and whoever procures it at the expense of ten thousand desires makes a wise and happy purchase.

—Belguy, 1686-1746.

CONTROVERSY.

1. Is often foolish and unprofitable.

(1367.) As in the burning of some wet fuel, we cannot see the fire for smoke; so the light of the Scriptures is dusked by the vapours of controversies.

—Adams, 1653.

(1368.) Some spend their time in nice questions, as, what Christ disputed of amongst the doctors? Where Paradise stood? In what part of the world is local hell? What became of Moses' body? How many orders and degrees of elect spirits? These curious persons, the further they go, the nearer they approach a sun that blinds them. Others spend their time in circumstantial controversies, when in the interim the essentials of religion are laid by. Such talk is but a wasting of time, and those that sweat at it are but laborious loiterers; like those that take great pains to crack a date-stone, which, when they have done, affords them no kernel. Would it not be counted a piece of great folly for a man that had a wound near some vital part, to be very busy in laying a plaster on his scratched finger, while the other lay unregarded? Were it not a piece of strange madness, when the enemy is at the walls, and the town every moment in danger of being stormed, the bullets flying thick about the streets, for the people within to be sitting still and consulting, whether a musket would carry further than a trunk, or whether more are killed with bullets or arrows? Truly, such folly, such madness, is it to employ ourselves about needless discourse about the world or superficial things, when our inestimable souls are continually in danger of being surprised and slain. —Swinmock, 1673.

(1369.) Many controversies of these times grow up about religion, as suckers from the root and limbs of a fruit tree, which spend the vital sap that should make fruit. —Flavel, 1630-1691.

(1370.) There are some controversies prickly like brambles, and apt to scratch those that handle them, but yielding no savoury or wholesome fruit. —Barrow, 1630-1677.

(1371.) Three natural philosophers go out into the forest and find a nightingale's nest, and forthwith they begin to discuss the habits of the bird, its size, its colour, and the number of eggs it lays; and one pulls out of his pocket a treatise of Buffon, and another of Cuvier, and another of Audubon, and they read and dispute till at length the quarrel runs so high over the empty nest, that they tear each other's leaves, and get red in the face, and the woods ring with their conflict; when, lo! out of the green shade of a neighbouring thicket, the bird itself rested, and, disturbed by these rude noises, begins to sing. At first its song is soft and low, and then it rises and swells, and waves of melody float up over the trees, and fill the air with tremulous music, and all the forest doth hush; and the entranced philosophers, subdued and ashamed of their quarrel, shut their books and walk home without a word.

So men who around the empty sepulchre of Christ have wrangled about the forms of religion, about creeds, and doctrines, and ordinances, when Christ Himself, disturbed by their discords, sings to them, out of heaven, of love, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, are ashamed of their conflicts, and go quietly and meekly to their duties. —Becker.

2. Is sometimes necessary.

(1372.) It is in the Church, as it is with nations; war must sometimes be carried on, in order to establish a sound and durable peace at last.

—Toplady, 1740-1778.

(1373.) Controversy, though always an evil in itself, is sometimes a necessary evil. To give up everything worth contending about, in order to prevent hurtful contention, is, for the sake of extirpating noxious weeds, to condemn the field to perpetual sterility. Yet, if the principle that it is an evil only to be incurred when necessary for the sake of some important good were acted upon, the two classes of controversies mentioned by Bacon would certainly be excluded. The first controversy, on subjects too deep and mysterious, is indeed calculated to gender strife. For, in a case where correct knowledge is impossible to any and where all are, in fact, in the wrong, there is but little likelihood of agreement: like men who should rashly venture to explore a strange land in utter darkness, they will be scattered into a thousand devious paths. The second class of subjects that would be excluded by this principle are those which relate to matters too minute and trifling.

—Whately.

3. Is better than ignorant indifference.

(1374.) The servants of God do mind the matter of religion more seriously than others do; and therefore their differences are made more observable to the world. They cannot make light of the smallest truth of God; and this may be some occasion of their indifference; whereas the ungodly differ not about religion, because they have heartily no religion to differ about. Is this a unity and peace to be desired? I had rather have the discord of the saints, than such a concord of the wicked. They are so careful about their duty that they are afraid of missing it in the least particular; and this (with their imperfect light) is the reason of their disputings about these matters. But you that are careless of your duty, can easily agree upon a way of sin, or take anything that comes next to hand. They honour the worship of God so much, that they would not have anything out of order; but you set so little by it, that you will be of the religion that the king is of, let it be what it will be; and it is easy to agree in such an ungodly, careless course. Astronomers have many controversies about the positions and motions of the heavens, and all philosophers have many controversies about the matter of their sciences; when ignorant men have none of their controversies, because they understand not, and therefore regard not the things that the learned differ about: and will you think ever the better of ignorance, or ever the worse of learning for this? The controversies of lawyers, of historians, chronologers, geographers, physicians, and such like, do never trouble the brains of the ignorant; but for all that, I had rather be in controversy with the learned, than without such controversy with you. If you scatter a handful of gold or diamonds in the street, perhaps men will scramble for them, and fall out about them, when swine will trample on them and quietly despise them, because they do not know their worth; will you therefore think that swine are happier than men? The living are vexed with strifes and controversies, about almost all the matters in the world, when the dead carcasses in the grave lie still in peace, and are not troubled with any of these differences; will you say therefore that the dead corpse is happier than the living? It is a death in sin, and compliance with the times and carnal interest, and a disesteem of spiritual holy things, that is the cause of the agreement of the wicked. But the godly know the worth of the things that you set light by, and therefore make a greater matter of them than you, and therefore no wonder if they have more debates and controversies about them.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

4. Its advantages.

(1375.) There is no learned man but will confess he hath much profited by reading controversies,—his senses awakened, his judgment sharpened, and the truth which he holds more firmly established. If then it be profitable for him to read, why should it not at least be tolerable and free for his adversary to write? In logic, they teach that contraries laid together more evidently appear: it follows, then, that all controversy being permitted, falsehood will appear more false, and truth the more true; which must needs conduce much to the general confirmation of an implicit truth.

—Milton, 1608-1674.

(1276.) However some may affect to dislike controversy, it can never be of ultimate disadvantage to the interests of truth or the happiness of mankind. Where it is indulged to its full extent, a multitude of ridiculous opinions will no doubt be obtruded upon the public; but any ill influence they may produce cannot continue long, as they are sure to be opposed with at least equal ability and that superior advantage which is ever attendant on truth. The colours with which wit or eloquence may have adorned a false system will gradually die away, sophistry be detected, and everything estimated at length according to its value.

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

5. Should not be engaged in rashly.

(1377.) When you have nothing to say, say nothing: a weak defence strengthens your opponent, and silence is less injurious than a weak reply.

—Collins, 1832.

6. In what spirit it is to be conducted.

(1378.) A good man should not be very willing, when his Lord comes, to be found so doing, and, as it were, beating his fellow-servants. And all controversy, as it is usually managed, is little better. A good man would be loath to be taken out of the world, reeking hot from a sharp contention with a perverse adversary, and not a little out of countenance to find himself in this temper, translated into the calm and peaceable regions of the blessed, where nothing but perfect charity and good-will reign for ever.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(1379.) We must rejoice when we see the golden chain which links the different members of the body of Christ together is not weakened; that amidst many differences of opinion among us, there is still a sound practical feeling of love to God and good-will to men. If, therefore, we see Christian love struggling against the convulsions of the moment, and that it is not subdued by these convulsions, then we may believe, as the wind which shakes the oak of our country only strengthens and increases the nourishment it derives from the roots, so all disputes and agitations without will only strengthen the great work of religion in our hearts, and give a lovelier influence to the blessed gospel of our Lord.

—Chancellor Raikes.

(1380.) Controversy may for the present be needful; but there never was, and never will be, need for its rancour. We may have all its victories without its virulence; and its truths without its personal tragedies; and that will be the most wholesome state of the Church when discussions wax kindly, and controversies are conducted in the spirit, not of party feuds, but of friendly investigations. Iron sharpens iron; and the day may come when, like honest experimenters in physics, earnest inquirers in theology will employ their respective acumen, not in perplexing one another, but in pursuing joint researches; and will find their full reward, not in a bewildered public, but in a text clearly interpreted, and a doctrine finally demonstrated, in a long debate concluded, and a weary question for ever set at rest.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

7. Heat inseparable from it

(1381.) In this imperfect state it is perhaps as impossible for two parties, as it is for flint and steel, to come into collision without exciting some sparks of fire. It were foolish to expect that there should be nothing said or done in a time of religious controversy, which good men will see no reason afterwards to regret and to recall; for that were to expect lesser men to be greater than apostles—holier than Saint Paul and Barnabas, between whom, as we are told, there rose a "sharp contention." Nor even after the controversies have ceased, need we wonder that their unhappy influences do not always, and all at once, cease with them. That were such a miracle as was only seen in Galilee, when at Christ's voice the wind and the waves went down at once, and together. It is with human passion as with the sea, when violently agitated, stirred by some storm to its briny depths, it continues, hours after the wind has ceased, to swell, and heave, and roll its foaming breakers on the beach. We are not to wonder that wounds received in controversy, like those received in battle, take some time to heal. It is reasonable to expect that, though, as it were a bad sign of a man's constitution, if his wounds, however deep, turned into running sores, there is something wrong, unhallowed, and unchristian in our spirit, if grace does not soften the asperities, and time close the wounds of controversy.

—Guthrie.

8. Whose judgments are to be regarded as authoritative.

(1382.) In controversies which depend on the experience of particular Christians or of the Church, regard most the judgment of the most experienced, and prefer the judgment of the later ages of the Church before the judgment of less experienced ages (except the Apostolic age that had the greater help of the Spirit). An ancient experienced Christian or divine is more to be regarded in many points, which require experience, than many of the younger sort, that are yet more zealous and of quicker understanding and expression than the elder. So those that we call the Fathers or ancients, were indeed in the younger ages of the Church, and we that are fallen into the latter and more experienced age, have all the helps of the wisdom and experience of the ages that were before us; and therefore God will require at our hands an account of these greater talents which we have received. As it were inexcusable now in a physician, that hath the help of such voluminous institutions, observations, and experiments of former ages, to know no more than those former ones that had no such helps; so would it be as inexcusable for this present age of the Church to be no wiser than those former ages.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1383.) In controversies which depend most upon skill in the languages, philosophy, or other parts of common learning, prefer the judgment of a few that are the most learned in those matters, before the judgment of the most ancient, or the most godly, or of the greatest numbers, or even whole churches that are unlearned. In this case neither numbers, nor antiquity, nor godliness, will serve their turn: but as one clear eye will see farther than ten thousand that are purblind, so one Jerome or Origen may judge better of a translation, or the grammatical sense of a text, than a hundred of the other Fathers could. One man that understandeth a language is fitter to judge of it than a whole nation that understandeth it not. One philosopher is fitter to judge of a philosophical question than a thousand illiterate persons. Every man is most to be regarded in the matters which he is best acquainted with.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

9. The ignorant are usually the most confident.

(1384.) None so bold as the blind. "The fool rageth and is confident." If he be in an error or entangled in any evil cause or way, you know not what to say to him for his recovery. The less he knows, the more he despiseth knowledge, and sets his face against his teachers, as if they were but fools to him, and scorns to be ruled by such as they whom God hath made his rulers. Will you go to dispute or debate the case with one of these? Why be sure of it, they will put you down and have the day. He will go away and boast that you could not convince him: as if a madman should boast that the physicians could not all of them cure him. He that speaks nonsense saith nothing while he seems to speak. And there is no refuting a man that saith nothing. Nonsense is unanswerable, if there be but enough of it. Who would dispute against a pair of bagpipes, or against a company of boys that hoot at him? If you will make a match at barking or biting, a cur will be too hard for you. And if you will try your skill or strength at kicking, a horse will be too hard for you. And if you will contend with multitudes of words, or by rage and confidence, a fool will be too hard for you (as you may see by Solomon's descriptions, and by daily experience). But if you will dispute by equal, sober reasoning, it is only a wiser man by evidence of truth that can overcome you; and to be thus overcome is better than to conquer; for you have the better if truth overcome you, and you have the worse if you overcome the truth.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

10. Is not confined to Christians.

(1385.) Lawyers contend about law, and princes about dominions, which others mind not, and religious persons strive about religion, and what wonder is this? It doth but show that they value their souls and religion, and that their understandings are yet imperfect.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1386.) Is there any of the sciences which afford not matter of controversy? If the laws of the land did yield no matter of controversy, lawyers and judges would have less of that work than now they have. And was there not greater diversity of opinions and worship among the heathens than ever was among Christians?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1387.) The differences among Christians are nothing in comparison of the differences among heathens. The truth is, religion is such an illustrious, noble thing, that dissensions about it, like spots in the moon, are much more noted by the world than about any lower, common matters. Men may raise controversies in philosophy, physic, astronomy, chronology, and yet it maketh no such noise, nor causeth much offence or hatred in the world; but the devil and the corrupted nature have such an enmity against religion, that they are glad to pick any quarrel against it, and blame it for the imperfections of all that learn it, and should practise it. As if grammar should be accused for every error or fault that the boys are guilty of in learning it; or the law were to be accused for all the differences of lawyers, or contentions of the people; or physic were to be accused for all the differences or errors of physicians; or meat and drink were culpable because of men's excesses and diseases. There is no doctrine or practice in the world by which true unity and concord can be maintained, but by seriousness in true religion. And when all contention cometh for want of religion, it is impudence to blame religion for it, which is the only cure. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

11. Absurdity of the interference of the ungodly in religious controversies.

(1388.) It would make a man's heart ache to hear wretched sinners talk of their differences about bishops, and ceremonies, and common-prayer, and holy-days, and infant baptism, and the like, that are dead in their sins, and are yet disagreed from us in the very bent of heart and life. Alas! sirs, you have other matters than these first to talk of and trouble yourselves with. A man that is ready to die of a consumption should not be taking care to cure the warts or freckles in his face. We have greater matters wherein we differ from you, than kneeling at the sacrament, or observation of days, or other ceremonies, or doubtful opinions in matters of doctrine. Let us first be agreed all to serve one master, and seek one end, and be ruled by one law, and hate known sin, and live a holy life, and then we shall be ready to treat with you about a further agreement. But to talk of small matters, when we differ in the greatest matters in the world, is as much as your souls are worth, and in matters which heaven or hell lieth on; this is but childish trifling, and whatever we may do for the peace of the Church with such, yet to ourselves that will be small advantage.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

12. Received truths not to be subjected to controversy.

(1389.) It is nowise a safe or advised course (except in case of necessary defence) to subject received opinions to the hazardous trial of a tumultuary conflict, their credit being better upheld by a stately reservedness than by a popular forwardness of discourse; as buildings stand fastest that are never shaken, and those possessions remain most secure that are never called in question.

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

13. Its causes.

(1390.) Those subjects, which are too difficult in their very nature for our powers, are the source of very many of the unhappy controversies which agitate the Church. The mind is not capable of grasping fully the whole truth. Each side seizes a part, and building its own inferences upon these partial premises, they soon find that their own opinions come into collision with those of their neighbours. Moralists tell the following story, which very happily illustrates this species of controversy. In the days of knight-errantry, when individual adventurers rode about the world seeking employment in their profession, which was that of the sword, two strong and warlike knights, coming from opposite directions, met each other at a place where a statue was erected. On the arm of the statue was a shield, one side of which was iron, the other of brass; and as our two heroes reined up their steeds, the statue was upon the side of the road, between them, in such a manner that the shield presented its surface of brass to the one, and of iron to the other. They immediately fell into conversation in regard to the structure before them, when one incidentally alluding to the iron shield, the other corrected him, by remarking that it was of brass. The knight upon the iron side of course did not receive the correction. He maintained that he was right, and after carrying on the controversy for a short time by harsh language, they gradually grew angry, and soon drew their swords. A long and furious combat ensued, and when at last both were exhausted, unhorsed, and lying wounded upon the ground, they found that the whole cause of their trouble was, that they could not see both sides of a shield at a time. Now religious truth is sometimes such a shield, with various aspects, and the human mind cannot clearly see all at a time. Two Christian knights, clad in strong armour, come up to some object, as moral agency, and view it from opposite stations. One looks at the power which man has over his heart, and laying his foundation there, he builds up his theory upon that alone. Another looks upon the Divine power in the human heart, and laying his own separate foundation, builds up his theory. The human mind is incapable, in fact, of grasping the subject—of understanding how man can be free and accountable, and yet be so much under the control of God as the Bible represents. Our Christian soldiers, however, do not consider this. Each takes his own view, and carries it out so far as to interfere with that of the other. They converse about it—they talk more and more warmly—then a long controversy ensues—their dispute agitates the Church and divides brethren from brethren; and why? Why, just because our Creator has so formed us that we cannot, from one point of view, see both sides of the shield at the same time. The combatants, after a long battle, are both unhorsed and wounded; their usefulness, and their Christian character, is injured, or destroyed.

—Jacob Abbott.

14. What would end it.

(1391.) If we saw God, and heaven, and hell before us, do you not think it would effectually reconcile our differences and heal our unbrotherly exasperations and divisions? Would it not hold the hands that itch to be using violence against those that are not in all things of their minds? What abundance of vain controversies would it reconcile! As the coming in of the master doth part the fray among the school boys; so the sight of God would frighten us from contentions or uncharitable violence. This would teach us how to preach and pray better than a storm at sea can do, which yet doth it better than some in prosperity will learn. Did we see what we preach of, it would drive us out of our man-pleasing, self-seeking, sleepy strain, as the cudgel drives the beggar from his canting, and the breaking loose of the bear did teach the affected cripple to find his legs and cast away his crutches. I would desire no better outward help to end our controversies about indifferent modes of worship than a sight of the things of which we speak.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

CONVERSION.

I. IN WHAT IT CONSISTS.

(1392.) I cannot give a more just idea of the new principle which the Spirit of God imparts to us in our conversion than by comparing it with the modern invention of the compass. Before the invention of the compass, mariners in a dark night were unable with any precision to direct their course. Whilst they were in sight of land, or had a view of the sun or stars, they could proceed with some degree of certainty; but, in the absence of these, they were altogether at a loss. But it is not so with mariners at this time. By the help of the compass, they can by night steer the ship as well as in the day; having constantly at hand, as it were, a sure directory: now this is the difference between the natural and the spiritual man; the natural man has reason and conscience, which, to a certain degree, are capable of directing his path. But numberless occasions arise whereon they fail him utterly. The spiritual man has superadded to these a new and living principle abiding in him; a principle infused in him by the Spirit of God, and in exact accordance with His mind and will: and by this principle the Spirit Himself guides him in all his ways.

—Salter.

(1393.) A man often passes through many stages before he becomes truly converted to God. When he is first awakened to serious impressions, and sees his folly of pursuing intently worldly things, to the neglect of the more durable riches, he resembles a boy emerging from his childhood, who throws aside his trifles and playthings for amusements of a higher and more intellectual kind. He now sets himself with all diligence to working out his own salvation in his own strength; multiplies his religious duties, and reforms his bad habits; yet all this while he is like one who has been employed in new-painting and varnishing a wooden statue, it has no life within. But when the Holy Spirit influences his heart, and "reveals Christ in him," he is in the state of one who has awakened from a dream (in which he has been acting a fictitious part), to live and move, and use all his faculties in reality, and enter on the great business of life.

—Salter.

(1394.) I passed by a piece of common which some lord of the manor or other had been enclosing, as those rascals always will if they can, to rob the poor of their rights, and filch every morsel of green grass upon which we may freely plant our feet; but I noticed that the enclosers had only railed it round, but had not dug it up, nor ploughed it, nor planted it; and though they had cut down the gorse, it was coming up again; of course it would, for it was a common still, and a bit of fence or rail could not alter it; the furze would come peeping up, and ere long the enclosure would be as wild as the heath outside. But this is not God's way of working. When God encloseth a heart that has laid common with sin, does He cut down the thorns and the briars and then plant fir trees? (Isaiah lv. 13.) No, no; but He so changeth the soil, that from the ground itself, from its own vitality, there spontaneously starts up the fir tree and the myrtle. This is a most wonderful result. You take a man and leave him at heart the same godless man. You mend his habits; you make him go to church, or to the meeting-house; you clothe him; you break his wine bottle ; you rinse his mouth out so that he does not talk so filthily ; and altogether you say, "He's now a respectable man." Ah ! but if these outward respectabilities and rightnesses are only skin deep, you have done nothing. At least what you have done is no great wonder ; there is nothing in it to be proud of. But suppose this man can be so changed, that just as freely as he was wont to curse he now delights to pray, and just as heartily as he hated religion he now finds pleasure in it, and just as earnestly as he sinned he now delights to be obedient to the Lord ; ah ! then, this is a wonder, a miracle which man cannot accomplish, a marvel which only the grace of God can work, and which gives to God His highest glory. —Spurgeon.

(1395.) There is no difference in a piano, whether a tyro or a Beethoven plays upon it ; the difference is in their power of combination : so in us, when converted we have the same old faculties.

—Becker.

II. IS POSSIBLE.

(1396.) An entire change may take place, so radical, that a man will hate what he once loved, and love what he once hated. Human character is capable of this change. It is not an uncommon, we were about to say not a difficult, step from one extreme of like or dislike to another. Who has not found himself loving the company, services, and surrounding circumstances which he once loathed ? Who has not followed back with equal zest and pleasure the path he walked in the outward journey of life ? A young man, who had wasted a large patrimony in a profligate life, while hanging over the brow of a precipice from which he had determined to throw himself, and for which purpose he had gone thither, formed a counter-purpose—that he would return to his home and regain what he had lost. It was all the work of a minute. The purpose he had then formed he kept. He began his new life by shovelling a load of coal into a cellar ; he proceeded step by step, until he had more than regained what he had lost, and died a millionaire. In a wordy sense he was converted. This is not a solitary, but a representative, case. There are thousands like him in their resolves and efforts, if not in their success.

These facts demonstrate the possibility of a radical and sudden change of life and character. This, then, is our reply to the objection urged by so many respecting the unreasonableness and impossibility of such a change, that nothing is more common, or more necessary, in life, than a change, than a conversion from one class of feelings to another, from one state of character to another, from one condition of life to another,—from being influenced by one class of motives to being influenced by an entirely different class,—from being born once to being born again. When this conversion is commenced through religious motives, and is carried on by Divine agency, then it becomes religious, instead of social conversion. This constitutes the vital difference between the two.

—Townsend.

III. HOW IT IS EFFECTED.

1. Not by eloquence.

the soul. They are not adequate to do that. You all know that there is an invention to electrify dead bodies ; by bringing the dead into contact with an electric battery, they can be made to imitate the living, they look, they stare, they move, they gesticulate ; there is the semblance of life, but not the reality. And I have seen under powerful and eloquent sermons stout-hearted sinners start from their seats. I have seen them weeping ; I have seen them praying. Well, are they alive ? Not they—they are only the dead acting the living. Let the electric current which flows from the preacher subside, and they fall back to their former torpor and indifference. What are many of the so-called revivals ? electric shocks disturbing the dead, but leaving them dead notwithstanding. Eloquence can move men, but it cannot save them. Eloquence, like the wind, moves the sea from without, but that which saves must move it from its own depth. Eloquence works upon the soul ; that which saves must work in the soul. I do not disparage nicety of language and eloquence of style ; but this I know, that Paul's preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom.

—J. C. Jones.

2. Not by argument.

(1398.) It is trite and commonplace to say that argument cannot convert a soul. Conquer a man in argument, and, as a rule, you only confirm him in his error. Last Monday I was looking at a picture which bore the title, "Conquered but not Subdued." The young lad was evidently conquered by his mother. There he stood, with his face half turned towards the wall : but there was determination in the mouth, defiance in the eye, anger in the nostrils ; he was conquered but not subdued. Drive a sinner in argument to a corner, so that he cannot move, yet he can sink, and sink he will to his own hell. You have all seen sheet-lightnings ; they flash, they dazzle, but they never kill. And arguments after all are only sheet-lightnings—flashing, dazzling, enlightening, but not killing in the sense in which Paul says that he was slain. I say nothing against logic : have as much of it in the pulpit as you can ; but, after all, logic will not save the world. God can never save you by argument ; the world will defy the Almighty in a debate. There is argument in the Bible : and argument is indispensable : but it is not by argument that men are made new creatures.

—J. C. Jones.

3. Not by intellectual power.

(1399.) All of us know by experience and observation that ideas wield immense power in the world ; that brilliant thoughts exercise a kind of magic influence on those that hear them : yet we must admit that the power of ideas is not that which saves. The Bible does not claim superiority on account of its ideas. I believe, of course, that it contains the sublimest ideas, the profoundest thoughts ever clothed in human language : but it is not upon its literary or intellectual character that it rests its claim to the homage of mankind. Indeed, you may study the Scriptures for sixty years, you may be the best Biblical scholar in the land, and be at last a castaway. It is not the ideas of the Bible that save. The history of preaching abundantly proves this. Read the sermon which was preached by Peter on the day of Pentecost, and it will not strike you as sparkling with ideas ; it will not astonish you with the profundity of its thoughts. Sermons that display as great mental calibre had been preached before, and have often been preached since. The Sermon on the Mount, and the sermon that Paul preached on Mars Hill, stand higher on the intellectual and philosophic side; and yet they made but few converts. Why? Because the power of thought is not the power that saves. Look again from the pulpit to books. It is not the most intellectual books that have been mainly blessed to the salvation of souls. Take the "Analogy," by Butler; no book in the language perhaps displays more solid intellectual power; yet I question very much if there be twenty people now living that would point to the "Analogy" as the means of bringing them to Jesus. I may be mistaken, but this is my impression. I have heard a great many people praising it, referring to it, saying they are indebted to it; but not one ascribing his salvation to it. But read the "Dairyman's Daughter," by Leigh Richmond; or the "Anxious Inquirer," by John Angell James; and you do not find the millionth part of the mental power in them that you find in the "Analogy"; but there are thousands in England to-day who trace their conversion to these books. It is another power than that of thought which saves. I do not say that thought is not necessary; but it is not of itself adequate to bring about the desired change.

4. But by the Spirit of God.

(1400.) A smith that undertakes to open such a lock that is out of order must, of necessity, first know all the wards; else he may make a key that will not fit; he may endeavour, but not be able to turn the lock. Thus it is that, whereas there are in the heart of man so many windings, so many turnings, such a labyrinth, such a depth in it, that in the eye of human reason there is no possibility to find out the bottom thereof; how, then, is it to be imagined that the most knowing, quick-sighted man should be able fully to persuade the heart? He cannot; that is peculiar to God only. He only knows all the secret passages, all the cross-wards of the heart, to Him only belongeth that especial key of David; it is He that can best unlock the heart, answer all objections, enlighten all the corners, turn all the wheels of the soul, suit and fit the heart with such arguments as shall be effectual to persuasion.

—Preston, 1587-1628.

(1401.) If a ship that is launched, rigged, and with her sails spread, cannot stir till the wind comes fair and fills them, much less can the timber that lies in the carpenter's yard hew and frame itself into a ship; if the living tree cannot grow except the root communicates its sap, much less can a dead, rotten stake in the hedge, which hath no root, live of its own accord. And thus, if the Christian's strength be in the Lord (as most certainly it is) and not in himself, then the Christless person must needs be a poor, impotent creature, void of all strength and ability of doing anything of itself towards its own salvation; if a Christian, that hath a spiritual life of grace, cannot exercise that life without strength from above, then surely one void of that new life, dead in sins and trespasses, can never be able to beget it in himself or any way concur to the production of it—so helpless is the state of unregeneracy, so impotent the condition of every man by nature. —Drexelius, 1581-1638.

(1402.) Water may be easily dammed up, but no art or industry can make it run backward in its own channel. It was by a miracle that the river Jordan was driven back: and it is very near, if not altogether a miracle, that a man accustomed to do evil should learn to do well; that the tide of sin, which before did run so strong, should be so easily turned; that the sinner, who before was sailing hellward, and wanting neither wind nor tide to carry him, should now alter his course and tack about for heaven. To see the earthly man become heavenly, to see a sinner move contrary to himself, in the ways of Christ and holiness, is as strange as to see the earth fly upward, or a bowl run contrary to its own bias. —Spencer, 1658.

(1403.) If a man should sit in a dark room among snakes and toads, and think verily that it were no such matter but he were in his bed-chamber, you might persuade him long enough to come away, and tell him of the danger; but he will not stir, but laugh at you, because he doth not believe you. But if you come into the room with a light, and he sees them crawling all about him, and making at him, then you need not another word to bid him begone; he is quickly up, and leaveth them with abhorrence. We tell unconverted sinners of the hatefulness of sin, and the danger that they are in, and pray them to leave it, but they believe us not, and do but laugh at it; but when the Spirit of God bringeth in the light, and they see all this with their own eyes, that it is even worse than ever we made it, then away goes their sins without any more ado. Like a child that hath a fine yellow crab which he taketh for an apple, he will not part with it, nor let you take it from him; but when he hath set his teeth in it once and tasted it, he will throw it away without any more ado. If such a foolish child be playing with a nettle, while he taketh it for a common herb he is bold with it, but when he feels the sting, he throweth it away; or if he be playing about a nest of wasps or bees, while he takes them to be but harmless flies, you cannot call him away, but when once they have stung him, he cries and runs away of himself without another word. Even so it is with a poor sinner about his sins before conversion. We pray him to come away, and tell him that sin hath a sting, and a deadly sting, and assure him from the Word of God that it will be bitterness in the latter end, and he makes no great matter of our words, but can hear us as if we came into the pulpit to tell him a tale, and not to save his soul from hell. And therefore he can go on in his old way for all this, and take his cups, or follow the world and his fleshly lusts, and give the preacher leave to talk. But when converting grace comes, it makes him taste the bitterness and sourness of sin, and then he quickly spits it out. It makes him feel the sting and smart, and then he cries to God for help, and wishes he had never known it, and runs away from it with detestation. Grace bringeth in that light from God which shows them that which they did not see before; how all this while they have had a multitude of crawling serpents in their bosom, and they have been playing even at the brink of hell. And when they see this with their own eyes, it is time for them to take another course.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1404.) On a winter's day I have noticed a row of cottages, with a deep load of snow on their several roofs; but as the day wore on, large fragments began to tumble from the eaves of this one and that other, till, by and by, there was a simultaneous avalanche, and the whole heap slid over in powdery ruin on the pavement; and before the sun went down, you saw each roof as clear and dry as on a summer's eve. But here and there you would observe one with its snow-mantle unbroken, and a ruff of stiff icicles around it. What made the difference? The difference was to be found within. Some of these huts were empty, or the lonely inhabitant cowered over a scanty fire; whilst the peopled hearth and the high-blazing fagots of the rest created such an inward warmth that grim winter melted and relaxed his grip, and the loosened mass folded off and tumbled over on the trampled street. It is possible by some outside process to push the main volume of snow from the frosty roof, or chip off the icicles one by one; but they will form again, and it needs an inward heat to create a total thaw. And so, by sundry processes, you may clear off from a man's conduct the dead weight of conspicuous sins; but it needs a hidden heat, a vital warmth within, to produce such a separation between the soul and its besetting iniquities, that the whole wintry incubus, the entire body of sin will come spontaneously away. That vital warmth is the love of God abundantly shed abroad—the kindly glow which the Comforter diffuses in the soul which He makes His home. His genial inhabitation thaws that soul and its favourite sins asunder, and makes the indolence and self-indulgence and indevotion fall off from their old resting-place on that dissolving heart. The easiest form of self-mortification is a fervent spirit.

—Hamilton, 1814-1867.

(1405.) When the heart of man is fortified in his weakness, when it is desperately set in him to do evil, all that men can do is to break upon them as the sea breaks on the rocky shore. It is the sea that is sent back, and the rock that stands firm. There are scores of men who live for the flesh; who live under the dominion of the senses; and who yet live in the full light of truth. None know it better than they. There are men that have read every word of scripture; there are men that are familiar with every argument and statement in theology; there are men that have known and seen much of the power of God in revivals; but there is within them that fixed, rooted, toughened life of sin that refuses to yield itself to any power which can be wielded merely by the hands of men.

—Baker.

5. Who works without impairing the freedom of the human will.

(1406.) I look upon you as a physician upon his patient, in a dangerous disease, that saith unto him, "Though you are so far gone, take but this medicine, and forbear but these few things that are so hurtful to you, and I dare warrant your life; but if you will not do this, you are a dead man." What would you think of such a man, if the physician and all the friends he hath cannot persuade him to take one medicine to save his life, or to forbear one or two poisonous things that would kill him? This is your case. As far as you are gone in sin, do but now turn and come to Christ, and take His remedies, and your souls shall live. Cast up your deadly sins by repentance, and return not to your poisonous vomit any more, and you shall do well. But yet if it were your bodies that we had to deal with we might partly know what to do with you. Though you would not consent, you might be held or bound while the medicine was poured down your throats, and hurtful things might be kept from you. But about your souls it cannot be so; we cannot convert you against your wills. There is no carrying madmen to heaven in fetters. You may be condemned against your wills, because you sinned with your wills; but you cannot be saved against your wills.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1407.) When we see a casket wrenched open, the hinges torn away, or the clasp destroyed, we mark at once the hand of the spoiler; but when we observe another casket deftly opened with a master-key, and the sparkling contents revealed, we note the hand of the owner. Conversion is not, as some suppose, a violent opening of the heart by grace, in which will, reason, and judgment are all ignored or crushed. This is too barbarous a method for him who comes not as a plunderer to his prey, but as a possessor to his treasure. In conversion, the Lord who made the human heart deals with it according to its nature and constitution. His key insinuates itself into the wards; the will is not enslaved but enfranchised; the reason is not blinded but enlightened; and the whole man is made to act with a glorious liberty which it never knew till it fell under the restraints of grace.

—Spurgeon.

IV. HINDRANCES TO CONVERSION.

(1408.) One hindrance of conversion is foolish self-love, that makes men unwilling to know the worst of themselves, and so keepeth them from believing their sinfulness and misery; and causeth them to presume and keep up false deceiving hopes that they may be saved, whether they are converted or not; or that they are converted when indeed they are not. They think it every one's duty to think well of themselves, and therefore they will do so; and so, while they hope they are converted already, or may be saved without conversion, no wonder if they look not seriously after it. Like many a sick man that I have known in the beginning of a consumption, or some grievous disease, they hope there is no danger in it; or they hope it will go away of itself, and it is but some cold; or they hope that such or such medicine will cure it, till they are past hope, and then they must give up these hopes and their lives together, whether they will or no. Just so do poor wretches by their souls. They know that all is not well with them, but they hope God is merciful, that He will not condemn them; or they hope to be converted some time hereafter; or they hope that less ado may serve their turn, and that their good wishes and prayers may save their souls; and thus, in these hopes they hold on, till they find themselves to be past remedy, and their hopes and they be dead together. I speak not this without the Scripture (Prov. xi. 17; Job xxvii. 8, 9; xi. 20). There is scarcely a greater hindrance of conversion than these false deceiving hopes of sinners.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1409.) Another hindrance of conversion is unresolvèdness, and half-purposes; when men will hang wavering between God and the world, and though the light be never so clear to convince them, yet they will not be persuaded to resolve. . . . If you would be converted and saved, do not stand wavering, but resolve, and presently turn to God. If it were a doubtful business, I would not persuade you to do it rashly, or if there were any danger to your souls in resolving, then I would say no more. But when it is a case that should be beyond all dispute with men of reason, why should you stand staggering as if it were a doubtful case? What a horrible shame is it to be unresolved whether God or the world should have your hearts? Were it not a disgrace to that man's understanding that were unresolved whether gold or dung were better? Or whether a bed of thorns or a feather bed were the easier? or whether the sun or a clod of earth were the more light and glorious? It is a far greater shame for a man to be unresolved whether it be God or the world that must make him happy, and that should have his heart, and whether a life of sin or holiness be the better.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

V. THE EXPERIENCE OF THE CONVERTED IS VARIED.

1. In accordance with their constitutional tendencies and previous life.

(1410.) But must this change, if radical, be attended with great distress of mind, or tumult of heart and conscience, before, and with a thrilling joy which recreates the world, during and immediately after conversion? These experiences may occur, and they may not. They may, and they may not, be any part of conversion. They are dependent upon the constitutional tendencies of the man, and upon his previous life. The highwayman, arrested by God's Spirit while in the act of murder, will, most likely, have a tumultuous experience. It will differ entirely from that of the innocent child starving by the roadside. There will be discovered precisely the same differences in experiencing this change that occur in the events of practical life. No two persons will, or can, appear precisely the same under the same circumstances, whatever these circumstances may be. Take the common illustration: Two sisters lose a much-loved brother. In the bosom of each there will be a deep sense of loss and loneliness, but the amount and kind of emotion at the grave may be very different. In the one will be seen the gush of tears, while not a tear moistens the cheek of the other. The one will turn away from the silent grave with outbursting sorrow, the other in silence, but with a cold dark mountain upon her heart. One mother may never weep, whose sorrow is as intense as that of her who is bathed in tears at the slightest sickness of her child.

These manifestations are the result of constitutional tendencies. They argue nothing, one way or another, as to the soundness of conversion. Conversion is not a question of smiles and tears, of sunshine or clouds. It is not a question of this or that emotion or feeling, any more than it is one of time and place. It is a simple question of a change of character through a Divine agency, induced by religious motives, without regard to the time or the manner of its accomplishment. It is, therefore, the sheerest folly to attempt to force every religious experience into the same mould. It cannot be stereotyped. To give directions in each individual case respecting how a man must or must not feel, is the last business of the preacher. If any person waits to have a religious experience exactly like that of some one else, he will wait for ever without receiving it. There are no exact repetitions; if you find them, one is a counterfeit. Seize the hand of Christ in your own way; step forth: all will be well.

—Townsend.

(1411.) You are too apt to feel that your religious experience must be the same as others have; but where will you find analogies for this? Certainly not in nature. God's works do not come from His hand like coins from the mint. It seems as if it were a necessity that each one should be in some sort distinct from every other. No two leaves on the same tree are precisely alike; no two buds on one bush have the same unfolding, nor do they seek to have.

What if God should command the flowers to appear before Him, and the sunflower should come bending low with shame because it was not a violet, and the violet should come striving to lift itself up to be like a sunflower, and the lily should seek to gain the bloom of the rose, and the rose the whiteness of the lily; and so, each one, disdaining itself, should seek to grow into the likeness of the other. God would say, "Stop, foolish flowers! I gave you your own forms, and hues, and odours, and I wish you to bring what you have received. O sunflower, come as a sunflower; and you, sweet violet, come as a violet; and let the rose bring the rose's bloom, and the lily the lily's whiteness." Perceiving their folly, and ceasing to long for what they had not, violet and rose, lily and geranium, mignonette and anemone, and all the floral train, would come, each in its own loveliness, to send up its fragrance as incense, and all to wreath themselves in a garland of beauty about the throne of God.

Now God speaks to you as to the flowers, and says, "Come with the form and nature that I gave you. If you are made a violet, come as a violet. If you are a rose, come as a rose. If you are a shrub, do not desire to be a tree. Let everything abide in the nature which I gave it, and grow to the full excellence that is contained in that nature."

The popular impression is, that grace is designed to change men from nature. No. They are sinful simply because they have deviated from their true nature, or fallen short of it. Grace is given to bring out the fullness of every man's nature. Not the nature which schoolmen write about; but that nature which God thought of when He put forth man, and pronounced him a child of God, bearing his Father's likeness.

—Bacher.

2. As to the time of their conversion.

(1412.) The wind bloweth where it listeth (yea, and when it listeth too), even so the Spirit, both time and place uncertain. Some are called at the first hour—that is, in their infancy or childhood, as Samuel, Jeremiah, and John the Baptist; some in the third hour—that is, in their youth, as Daniel the prophet and John the evangelist; others at the sixth hour—in their middle age, as Peter and Andrew; others at the eleventh hour—in their old age, as Gamaliel and Joseph of Arimathea; and some again, not only in the last hour of the day, but even in the last minute of that hour, as the thief upon the cross. Again, our calling is uncertain in respect of place, for God calls some from their ships, some from their shops, and some from under the hedges, and others from the market; so that, if a man can but make out unto his soul that he is certainly called, it matters not much for the time when nor the place where, both of them being so uncertain.

—Boys, 1560-1643.

(1413.) Men come into the kingdom of God in as many different ways as plants come to flower. Some come right up out of the earth to blossom. Some come up and grow the whole summer, and then blossom. Some grow a year, and then blossom the second year. Some grow up like trees, and do not blossom till they are three or four or five or six years old. Some put the leaves out first, and the blossoms afterward; and some put out the blossoms first, and the leaves afterward. There is every conceivable method of inflorescence.

Now, when a man is converted, he blossoms; and some persons blossom almost from the cradle. I do not doubt that God's work begins in the hearts of children three or four years old, and of persons of every age beyond that period. As "the wind bloweth where it listeth," so God's Spirit works where it pleases. It comes when it pleases, and as it pleases; and no man can tell beforehand how it will come or when it will come. The way in which the mind is affected when it blossoms into the kingdom of love and duty varies in almost all cases.
—Becher.

3. As to the means employed to effect their conversion.

(1414.) Sometimes you shall have impetuous and heavy showers bursting from the angry clouds. They lash the plains, and make the rivers flow. A storm brings them, and a deluge follows them. At other times, thin gentle dews are formed in the serene evening air. They steal down by slow degrees with insensible stillness: so subtle that they deceive the nicest eye; so silent that they escape the most delicate ear; and when fallen, so very light, that they neither bruise the tenderest, nor oppress the weakest flowers. Very different operations! Yet each concurs in the same beneficial end, and both impart fertility to the lap of nature. So I have known some persons reclaimed from the unfruitful works of darkness by violent and severe means. The Almighty addressed their stubborn hearts, as he addressed the Israelites of Sinai, with lightning in His eyes, and thunder in His voice. The conscience, smitten with a sense of guilt and apprehension of eternal vengeance, trembled through all her powers; just as that strong mountain tottered to its centre. Pangs of remorse and agonies of fear preceded their new birth. They were reduced to the last extremities, almost overwhelmed with despair, before they found rest in Jesus Christ. Others have been recovered from a vain conversation by methods more mild and attractive. The "Father of spirits" applied Himself to their teachable minds in "a still and small voice." His grace came down like the rain into a fleece of wool; or as these softening drops which now water the earth. The kingdom of God took place in their souls without noise or observation. They passed from death unto life, from a carnal to a regenerate state, by almost imperceptible advances. The transition resembled the growth of corn: it was very visible when effected, though scarcely sensible while accomplishing.
—Salter.

(1415.) God is sovereign; and He calls men as He pleases. Some He calls amid thunder and storm, some in a calm, some in winter, and some in summer. Some He calls as He calls flowers in spring, and some as He calls flowers in autumn. And our business is not so much to determine what is the way in which God must call us, nor the way in which we should like to come, as to get up and come to our Father, walking in whatever path our feet find. Come—that is the thing; with a deep experience, if you have it; without a deep experience, if you have it not; with a great tumult, if you cannot help it; without much tumult, if it please God that it should be so. It is not to come in any particular way, or with any particular experience, but to arise and come to our Father, and say unto Him: "Father, I have sinned against heaven and before Thee, and am no more worthy to be called Thy son; make me as one of Thy hired servants." It is to come back to God, at any rate.
—Becher.

4. As to the emotions they experience.

(1416.) If we plainly see that many are insensibly changed, and made good by pious education "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord;" and that some who have long lived in a profane neglect and contempt of religion, are by the secret power of God's Word and Holy Spirit, upon calm consideration, without any great terrors and amazements, visibly changed and brought to a better course; it is in vain, in these cases, to pretend that this change is not real, because the manner of it is not answerable to some instances which are recorded in Scripture, or which we have observed in our experience, and because these persons cannot give such an account of the time and manner of their conversion as is agreeable to these instances;—which is just as if I should meet a man beyond sea whom I had known in England, and would not believe that he had crossed seas, because he said he had a smooth and easy passage and was wafted over by a gentle wind, and could tell no stories of storms and tempests.
—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

(1417.) There are some whose passage from a state of nature to a state of grace has been gentle and easy. They cannot understand the measureless extent of joy which is felt by the poor castaway rescued from depths of wretchedness to peace. There is something like intoxication of delight about the conversion of certain great offenders which others, like the elder brother in the parable, are offended with; they do not recognise it as belonging to their experience: they call it enthusiasm, fanaticism; "they are angry, they will not go in." Let them not doubt the reality of it. A man who comes from a dark chamber into the bright shining light of day, experiences a dazzling brilliancy in that which to another is mere ordinary sunshine. As with their joys, so it is with their groaning and sorrows. A soldier that has been scarred and wounded in the wars shall find his wounds smart in old age and bring on premature decrepitude. And the soul that has suffered in its spiritual contests with the devil, that has long lain in the captivity of the enemy, will long mourn the wounds and scars, and weaknesses and deficiencies, that his more happy brethren will know nothing of.
—Salter.

(1418.) When different men are brought to Christ, though the general result is the same, the process is not. You will hardly find two cases in which the method was the same in all particulars.

To illustrate this matter, suppose there were a vast malarial district, a great circuit of country, in which were generated all manner of diseases; suppose there were towards the centre of that district, or circuit of country, a mountain lifted up; suppose that on that mountain there was a sanitarium—an immense building to which men might go, and going to which they might rise out of the morbid influences beneath into the pure air above, where all the conditions of health were fulfilled; and suppose word should be sent out to all the sick in the region round about, "Come up hither, for here is health." Now, if a man was sent to me, as the one having charge of that sanitarium, to inquire what steps were necessary to get there, how could I tell him? For, here, on the north, is one man a little sick. If he undertake to come, he will be obliged to travel by easy stages. And the particular experiences which he will have on the road will depend in part upon the route he takes. But, whatever those experiences may be, if he persevere, and no serious accident befalls him, he will finally reach the sanitary height. On the south is another man who is sick of a certain disease, who has not left his bed in six months, and who requires a certain kind of treatment. He has heard of the sanitarium; and he says to his attendants, "Will you carry me over this road by easy stages, and get me there?" He will have to go northward, and his experiences, as regards climate at least, will be different from those of the man who goes southward. But he will recover at the sanitarium. Another man is off at the east. He has a different disease, and requires a different kind of treatment. He must go by another road, right west, and his experiences will differ from the experiences of the other men; but he will find his way to the sanitarium. Each man, whether he travel north, or south, or east, or west, will sooner or later, and with more or less difficulty, come into the enjoyment of the advantages proffered to him, and such as be on this mountain in the centre of the malarial district. They will go by short stages or by long ones; they will travel a great many miles or but a very few; they will ride, or will walk on their own feet, and if they ride, they will go by public conveyance, or by their own conveyance. These various matters will be determined by the circumstances which surround them. But they will all go to one point. They will go with different degrees of activity or speed, and with different degrees of comfort; but the destination will be the same in each case. Do you not see it?

Well, it is just so in going to the Lord Jesus Christ. When men are sick, there is this great central Mountain of spiritual refuge to which they may go for relief. But where they are, how ignorant or how wise they are, how much or how little they have given way to their appetites and passions, what their entanglements and temptations are—all these things will have an influence upon them in their journey. And what steps are necessary, and how many of them, and how hard or how easy it will be to break away from that which is evil, and take hold upon that which is good, it is impossible to say. No specific answer can be given on these points. But let me say, in one word, that this Mountain is provided for all, and that the steps which are necessary in the case of each to enable him to reach it, will be determined by his peculiar circumstances.

But we will suppose that, after these various sick persons have reached the sanitarium, they hold a conference with themselves, some calm evening, sitting on the porch. All of them feel greatly relieved. Some are almost nimble, and are exuberant. Others, who have not been there long, say: "We are better; but still we have not the enjoyment that those people have." And they begin to talk over the question of their evidences that they are there. One man, springing up and capering about the floor, says: "Ah! I know I am here!" Another man, lifting himself up goutily, says: "I cannot jump in that way, and I am very uncertain whether I am here or not!" Another man, turning on his couch, and looking around languidly, says: "Oh, if I could sit up I should feel more sure that I was here." And so they reason, from their different sensations, as to whether or not they are in that sanitarium.

They go further. One says, talking with another, "Where did you come from?" "I came from North Perdition," is the reply. "Ah! I came from South Perdition." "What sort of a road did you travel?" "Why, I came from a region where it is winter six months of the year; and the roads were horrible. It seemed as though I never should get out of the quagmires. I did not see one flower or leaf till I got to the foot of this mountain. If it had not been for getting my health and life again, I never would have undertaken such a dreadful task." "Well, then, I am afraid I am not here." "Why; what sort of a road did you come?" "Oh, I came a most beautiful road! I travelled all the way in the midst of flowering vines, and blossoming apple-trees, and everything sweet. It seemed to me as though I was between gardens all the time; and either you are not here, or else I am not—we had such different experiences." And yet, they are both there.

You see how absurd this is in speaking of men in a physical, actual place; but it is just as absurd in speaking of men in spiritual experience.

I hear one man say to another: "Did you have such awful feelings as you describe? I never had any such feelings; and I am afraid I am not a Christian." The other man says: "You say that the moment you thought of religion you broke out into rapture; but I did not. I was two months without the dawn of light; and I fear I am not a Christian." Each thinks he is not a Christian because he did not feel as the other did. One thinks he is not a Christian because he did not feel joyous, and the other thinks he is not a Christian because he did not feel bad.

—Becher.

5. As to the definiteness with which they can trace the history and fix the period of their conversion.

(1419.) He that is locked up in a dungeon, or otherwise immured within some darksome place, may easily discover the very moment of time when either the least beam of the sun shall break in upon him; whereas he that is in the open air is very sensible that the day is broke, that the sun is up, but cannot make out any certain account of the springing of the one or rising of the other. Thus it is in the matter of our spiritual calling: it is possible that a man may know the very time when the Day-spring from on high did visit him, when it was the good pleasure of God to dart into his soul the graces of His blessed Spirit, as in the case of St. Paul, the good centurion, the jailer, the Jewish converts, and some others ; but this is not ordinary.

—Boys, 1560-1643.

(1420.) We have known those who, having mispent their younger times in notoriously lewd and debauched courses, have been suddenly heart-stricken with some powerful denunciation of judgment, which hath so wrought upon them, that it hath brought them within sight of hell ; who, after long and deep humiliation, have been raised up, through God's mercy, to a comfortable sense of the Divine favour ; and have proceeded to a very high degree of regeneration, and lived and died saints. But this is not every man's case.

Those, who, having from their infancy been brought up in the nurture and fear of the Lord, and from their youth have been trained up under a godly and conscionable ministry, and have, by an insensible conveyance, received the gracious inoperations of the Spirit of God (though not without many inward strifes with temptations, and sad fits of humiliation for their particular failings), framing them to a holy obedience ; these cannot expect to find so sensible alterations in themselves. As well may the child know when he was naturally born, as these know the instant of their spiritual regeneration, and as well may they see the grass grow, as they perceive their insensible increase of grace. It is enough that the child, attaining to the use of reason, now knows that he was born ; and that when we see the grass higher than we left it, we know that it has grown. —Hall, 1574-1656.

(1421.) Can Christ be in thy heart, and thou not know it? Can one king be dethroned and another crowned in thy soul, and thou hear no scuffle?

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1422.) Many are prone to look for a conversion, always uniform, not only in its effects but in its operation, and also too much bordering on the miraculous. The soul must be exceedingly terrified with fear, then overwhelmed with anguish, then plunged into despair, then suddenly filled with hope, and peace, and joy ; and the person must be able to determine the day on which, the sermon under which, or the providence by which, the change was wrought. But this is by no means necessarily, or generally, the case. There is a variety in the temperaments and habits of men ; and in the methods employed to bring them to repentance. And we should remember that there are "differences of administration, but the same Lord ;" that often He prefers to the earthquake, the wind, and the fire, the small still voice ; that He can draw by the cords of love and the bands of a man that He can work as effectually by slow, as by instantaneous exertion, and that He can change the soul in a manner so gradual and mild as to be scarcely discernible to any but the glorious Author. And here, my brethren, we are furnished with evidence from analogy. In nature, some of God's works insensibly issue in others ; and it is impossible for us to draw the line of distinction between them. "The path of the just is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day." But who can ascertain which ray begins, or which ends the dawn? If you are unable to trace the process of the divine life, judge by the result. When you perceive the effects of conversion, never question the cause. And if perplexed by a number of circumstantial inquiries, be satisfied if you are able to say, "One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see."

—Jay.

(1423.) The greatest powers of nature work most calmly and noiselessly. What so gentle as the day-dawn rising mutely in the brightening east, and pouring its light upon the eye so softly, that swift as are those rays, the tenderest texture of the eye endures no wrong? And what more soft than the spring's falling rain? It may come preceded by the thunder, but it is gentle itself, and when most efficacious descends almost as a spiritual presence, "as small rain on the tender herb, and as showers that water the earth."

And like to these in their operations are the Gospel and Spirit of Christ. When our Saviour came into the world it was silently and alone. All heaven was moved, and followed Him down to the threshold, but few on earth knew it. One solitary star pointed to the humble birthplace, and hymns sang of it, heard only at night by the watching shepherds. He walked our world through years softly in the bitterness of His soul ; He left where the common eye beheld but an ignominious sufferer, one of three, and men became aware that the Son of God had come and gone only when the clear light began to break in the eastern sky from that great work of His, and when the open gate of mercy was thrown back, with a cross before it to call the lost and wandering home.

And as it was with His descent into the world, so it is, in general, with His entrance by the Spirit into the heart. There may be the thunder and the mighty rushing wind before it, the providences may be loud and violent, but the Spirit itself is like the rain. It moves from soul to soul among the rising generations, and there is no outward crisis to tell of the birth of souls. It is like the dew that falls at night, and in the morning it is there, and man cannot tell when it formed itself, like a celestial guest, within the flower-cup. The kingdom of heaven cometh not with observation. And, even in times of revival more marked, for such times are promised and should be expected ; yet even in such times, the Spirit's great work is not in the earthquake or the mighty rushing wind, but is in the still small voice. Unless it meet us there, in the secrecy of the soul, in the privacy of the closet, in the rising to seek Christ at His grave in the quiet resurrection morn when the busy world and all the guards are fast asleep, unless it bring the soul into close and secret communion with Christ Himself, it meets us not at all. In His Gospel and His Spirit, Christ is moving through the great inner world which men too much neglect, the world of souls, and there in the solitude of the heart, alone with Him, it must be ours to seek and find.

—Ker.

(1424.) The change sometimes takes place in such a manner that the subject only knows by the review of months, and possibly years, that he is not the man he was. It is perhaps more frequently the case that the light struggles for a season with the darkness ; doubt is mingled with hope ; clouds hang about the horizon, or even shut in the heavens, with only an occasional glimmer of light. With the majority of people in a Christian land, conversion is like the dawning of the morning in the east, in which the change from deep night to commencing day can scarcely be marked. It is so gradual that you can select no points or sudden advances until the sun appears. The beholder knows it was once dark: he knows equally well that it is now light. "One thing I know," exclaimed the blind man to the hard question of the Pharisees, "that whereas I was blind, now I see." The child learning the alphabet, may not know when it is mastered. The thing of importance is, can he read?

So far as the soundness of the crisis of conversion is concerned, it makes no difference whether it is like the "torrent frozen in mid air," the "lightnings pinioned while playing across the clouds," or like the slow and gradual development of childhood into manhood. The only question that need concern us is, whether or not the heart is now devoted to God and to His service? Has there been a change of character or of citizenship? Are the chief interests transferred from this to the world to come? Have the sins with which he was laden disappeared? Does the man know that a change—a spiritual change—has actually taken place? Is the soul roused to its true dignity? If so, that is enough. The man has been converted. With no time specified, without a form to signalise it, without a whisper to proclaim it to the world, there will be joy in heaven. —Townsend.

(1425.) I think there are many and many persons that are Christians and do not know it.

My watch stops. Something is broken in it. I take it to the watchmaker, and he puts in a new mainspring. I do not know anything about it, except that he does it. And when it is repaired he lays it aside. Presently I go for my watch, and ask him if it is done. "Oh yes," he says, "but I do not know as it is going." And he takes it, and finding that it does not go, he winds it up. And then it does not go, perhaps; but he gives it a little turning shake, and it commences ticking and keeping time.

I know many persons who have a mainspring in them, and have been wound up, for that matter, but who have not been shaken yet! And there they are. If somebody would only take them up and whirl them round a few times, and say to them, "You are Christians; tick! tick!" they would commence keeping time, and go on keeping time. —Becker.

(1426.) When the Spirit of God changes the heart, some persons want to be as much aware of it as when an arm is broken and the surgeon puts it in place: the bones crack as they go in again—some men want to feel the power of God's hand constraining them. A man feels pain and the doctor prescribes a bitter draught. He drinks it, and feels better in five minutes; he feels better and better until the attack passes away. So many feel they must have a deep and bitter conception of sin, and then come out of it all changed. Many are anxious to know when they were changed, and to be able to say, "Thursday, at nine o'clock at night, I was converted." To put their finger on that Thursday night is a great comfort which will go with them all their life long. I would not take it away from them, but if there are others who cannot say so, how is that?

A man is blind—the doctor performs an operation and puts the patient in a dark room while the eye is strengthening. He will not let a particle of light into the room till the inflammation is gone down. At first the doctor will let in just a film of light, then a little more to-morrow, and in a week he will let the room be full of a shaded and subdued light, and in a little time the man's eyesight is restored. Suppose you ask, "When did the man begin to see? Did he begin to see in one fortnight?" No. You cannot put your finger on the point where one moment the man was blind and the next he could see.

You cannot touch the dividing line, and will the man himself say, "I cannot see because I cannot say when I was healed?" He can say, "Whereas I was blind, now I see," and when he can say that, he don't need to be very particular as to the moment when he began to see. —Becker.

(1427.) There may be a change so gradual as to be imperceptible. When the thermometer falls forty degrees in twenty-four hours, men say, "What a change!" but when it falls forty degrees in three weeks, and only one or two degrees at a time, and it is hot to-day, and it is hot to-morrow, and the next day it is a little doubtful whether it is as hot or hotter, there is, though men do not perceive it, a time when the thermometer passes an intermediate point, on one side of which it is hot, and on the other side of which it is cold. Now, it is possible for a change to take place with such decisiveness that a man is conscious of it distinctly; and it is possible for a change to take place so quietly that a man is not conscious of it. And there are a great many men that have a religious tendency, that are blessed with Christian instruction, and that are guided by the Spirit of God to the new life, who are not conscious of the moment of time when they pass the line of decision, though they do pass it. —Becker.

(1428.) Does it not strike you as being very foolish reasoning if you should say in your heart, "I am not converted because I do not know when?" Nay, with such reasoning as that, I could prove that old Rome was never built, because the precise date of her building is unknown; nay, we might declare that the world was never made, for its exact age even the geologist cannot tell us. We might prove that Jesus Christ Himself never died, for the precise date on which He expired on the tree is lost beyond recovery; nor doth it signify much to us. We know the world was made, we know that Christ did die; and so you, if you are now reconciled to God, if now your trembling arms are cast around that cross, you are saved, though the beginning was so small that you cannot tell when it was. Indeed, in living things it is hard to put the finger upon the beginning. Here is a fruit—will you tell me when it began to be? Was it at the time when first the tree sent forth its fruit-bud? Did this fruit begin when first the flower shed its exhalations of perfume upon the air? Indeed, you could not have seen if you had looked. When was it? Was it when the full-ripe flower was blown away, and its leaves were scattered to the wind, and a little embryo of fruit was left? 'Twas hard to say it did not begin before that, and equally hard to say what precise instant that fruit began to be formed. Ay, and so it is with Divine grace, the desires are so faint at the beginning, the convictions are but the etchings upon the plate, which afterwards must be engraven with a harder instrument; and they are such flimsy things, with transient impressions of Divine truth, that 'twere difficult to say what is transient and what permanent, what is really of the Spirit of God and what is not; what hath saved the soul, or what only brought it to the verge of salvation; what made it really live, or what was really the calling together of the dry bones before the breath came and the bones began to live. Quit your fears, my hearers, upon this point, for if ye are saved, no matter when.

—Spurgeon.

(1429.) It matters not if you cannot tell just when you became a Christian! If we sow a handful of wheat in our garden, we could not tell, though we watched it ever so narrowly, the exact moment when it germinated. But when we see the waving grain in the autumn we know it did germinate, and that is all we care for.

VI. PROOFS OF ITS REALITY.

1. A radical and thorough change of heart.

(1430.) There is no part of a man's nature which the gospel does not purify, no relation of his life which it does not hallow. . . . Christ did not cast six devils out of Mary Magdalene and leave one; He cast out all the seven. He did not partly cure the lame man at the pool of Bethesda; He made him every whit whole.

—A. W. Hare, 1784-1834.

(1431.) But, again, it is asked, "Is this birth from above such that we can always decide correctly whether the individual who makes the profession has in reality experienced the change? Will the conduct, at all times, unmistakably foreshadow it?" Go to the dress parade of a regiment. There are the soldiers,—under the same uniform, obeying the same commands, equally prompt and equally perfect in their execution. That is what appears to the eye. But one is a traitor, who will betray the command for thirty pieces of silver; another is a deserter, who leaves his companions alone in the long march and deadly encounter; another, whose outward conduct for a time is not more commendable, is a patriot, who is ready at every point and at every moment of peril to throw his blood and life into the defences of his nation.

Conversion, in many instances, may not much change the outward conduct; that depends upon what the conduct has hitherto been. But the heart-allegiance is changed. God knows—we do not—whether all those who are professing to follow Christ, who are acknowledged as Christians, are such in fact. The principle upon which He makes His decision is not that there has been a change in the outward deportment merely. He requires a radical and thorough change of the heart.

—Townsend.

2. Thankful acknowledgment of God's grace and mercy.

(1432.) The pardoned soul is a God-admirer; "Who is a God like Thee, that pardoneth iniquity?" A man that goes over a narrow bridge in the night, and the next morning comes and sees the danger he was in, and how miraculously he escaped, he is stricken with admiration; so, when God shows a soul how near he was a-falling into hell, and how that this gulf is shut, all his sins are pardoned, he is amazed, and cries out, "Who is a God like Thee, that pardoneth iniquity?"

—Watson, 1696.

3. Hatred of sin.

(1433.) If friends have weapons in their hands, they will but play with them, but deadly enemies will seek the blood of one another. There is a difference between fencing and fighting for life. Though a man, that knoweth nothing of their meaning, might think a fencer is fighting in good sadness, seeing he seemeth to make as great a stir as if it were so indeed. Yet the issue will show you that it is otherwise, because you see that there is no bloodshed, nor men killed. So is it with a hypocrite in his seeming reformation; when he makes the greatest stir against his sin in confessing and prayer, and other means, yet he will not resolutely cast it away, but he secretly useth it as his friend, while he openly abuseth it as his enemy; and he puts it into his bosom, while he calls it all to naught. He will not be brought unfeignedly to renounce it, and give it a bill of divorce, and cast it out as a man doth his vomit, with resolution never to take it in more. Oh, how sweetly doth he roll it in his thoughts in secret, when he frowneth upon it with the severest countenance! How easily is he drawn to it again and again, when he takes on him to repent of it and abhor it! But it is clean contrary with a man that is converted. Though the remnants of sin will remain in him while he liveth, yet as to the reign of it, he presently casteth it off, and biddeth defiance to it. He fighteth against it in good earnest, as knowing that either he or it must die.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

4. Holiness of life.

(1434.) A man's heart will persuade him that he is converted from a state of sin, when perhaps he is only converted from one sin to another; and that he has changed his heart, when he has only changed his vice. This is another of its fallacies, and that none of the least fatal and pernicious. A man has perhaps for a long time taken the full swing of his voluptuous humour, wallowed in all the pleasures of sensuality; but at last, either by age or design, or by some cross accident turning him out of his old way, he comes to alter his course, and to pursue riches as insatiably as formerly he did his pleasures, so that from a sensual epicure he is become a covetous miser; a worthy change and conversion indeed! But as a river cannot be said to be dried up because it alters its channel; so neither is a man's corruption extinguished, though it ceases to vent itself in one kind of vice, so long as it runs with as full and as impetuous a course in another.

Suppose among the Jews, a man had passed from the society of riotous and debauched livers, from the company of publicans and sinners, to the strictness and profession of the Pharisees, this man indeed might have been termed a new sinner, but not a new creature; he had changed his intemperance, or his extortion for the more refined sins of vainglory and hypocrisy; he had changed a dirty path for one more cleanly, but still for one in the same road. One man perhaps goes to a town or a city through the fields, another through the highway, yet both of them intend and arrive at the same place, and meet and shake hands at the same market. In like manner, a man may pass as surely to hell by a sin of less noise and infamy as by one more flaming and notorious. And therefore he that changes only from one sin to another, is but the devil's convert, and the whole business of such a conversion is but a man's altering of the methods of his ruin, and the casting of his damnation into another model.

—South, 1633-1716.

5. Growth in grace.

(1435.) All believers do grow in grace. And this ye know is the difference between a painted child and a living child; take a living child, and though he be but little and very weak, yet he grows bigger. But a child that is painted upon a wall grows not; and if a man come to you and say, What is the reason that this child does not grow? two or three years ago he was as big as he is now? you will easily answer, Because he is but a painted child, he is not a living child; if he were a living child he would grow.

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(1436.) A violent motion is quick in the beginning, but slow in the end; a stone cast upward is then most weak when it is most high; but a natural motion is slow in the beginning, quicker in the end. If a man from a high tower cast a stone downward, the nearer to the centre the quicker is the motion. When a man at his first conversion is exceeding quick, but afterwards waxeth every day slower in the ways of goodness, his motion is not natural, but forced: otherwise, like a constant, resolved Christian, the longer he lives, and the nearer he comes to the mark, the more swiftly doth he run, the more vehemently doth he contend for that everlasting crown which he shall be sure to attain at his race's end.

—Spencer, 1658.

(1437.) To say that personal religion is characterised by growth, is only another form of saying that the man who has it is spiritually alive. Growth in the animal and vegetable worlds is the sure sign, and the only sure sign of life. If a branch does not sprout, and put forth leaf and blossom in the spring, we know that it is a dead branch; the sap which is the life of the tree does not reach it, is not circulating through it. If an infant lives, it grows; increases in stature daily, while its features fill out gradually into that definite shape which they are to wear through life. But we need not restrict the remark to infants. The bodies of adults grow as really, though not as sensibly, as those of children. Particles of matter are continually flying off from our bodies, and being replaced by others; so that, according to a very old and often quoted computation, the whole mass of the human body undergoes an entire change; becomes, in fact, a new body once in every seven years. This constant discharge of old particles, and accretion of new ones, though accompanied with no change of feature or stature, is growth; and it is a sign of the vitality of the body. A dead body lacks the principle of life, by which alone nourishment can be taken in from air and food, and transmuted into the substance of the human frame.

Now we know that nature is everywhere a parable of grace. Its being so is the basis of all those beautiful illustrations which are called the parables of our Lord. And in the case before us, nature furnishes a most important parable of religious truth. There is no organic life without growth in nature; and there is no spiritual life without growth in grace. I say, no spiritual life, no continuous state of life, spiritual impulses there may be many. Impulses, however, are not life, though they may originate or restore life.

—Goulburn.

VII. NOT TO BE DELAYED.

1. Because instant conversion is our duty.

(1438.) "But I do not know about submitting to God so suddenly. I must have time. Conversion is not a hasty but a gradual work."

How much time do you want? How much have you had? How long has God called and you refused, stretched out His hand and you have not regarded? What if you were sailing swiftly down Niagara's flood; would you ask for time to turn? What if your house were wrapped in flames; would you talk of gradual escape? What do you mean by a gradual conversion? Can a man gradually stop fighting? fire a few more guns as the war is over? gradually exchange his enmity to love? oppose God to-day, only not so violently as yesterday, and with less and less bitterness as time rolls on? What would become of the soul, he dying in process? Whose would it be, God's or Satan's? Sinner! God now commands you to repent. As the Roman ambassador drew a circle around the captive princes and bade them accede to his terms before they had passed its bounds, so God now requires an immediate accession to His overtures of mercy.

—John Marsh.

(1439.) When men grow virtuous in their old age, they only make a sacrifice to God of the devil's leavings.

—Pope.

2. Because our position is so perilous.

(1440.) Consider but what a case you are in while you thus delay. Do you think you stand on dry ground, or in a safe condition? If you knew where you are, you would sit as upon thorns, as long as you are unconverted; you would be as a man that stood up to his knees in the sea, and saw the tide coming towards him, who certainly would think that there is no standing still in such a place.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1441.) While you are delaying, your judgment doth not delay, and when it comes, these delays will multiply your misery, and the remembrance of them will be your everlasting torment. As a man that is in a coach on the road, or in a boat on the water, whatever he is speaking, or thinking, or doing, he is still going on, and hastening to his journey's end or going down the stream: so whatever you think, or speak, or do, whether you believe it or mock at it, whether you sleep or wake, whether you remember it or forget it, you are hastening to damnation, and you are every day a day nearer to it than before; and it is but a little while till you shall feel it.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1442.) If thy dead heart were but well awakened to consider and feel thy own condition, thou wouldst be quickly affrighted out of thy delay, and run as hastily from thy state of sin, as thou wouldst out of a house all on fire over thy head, or out of a boat sinking under thee. What, hast thou not yet served the devil long enough? Hast thou not yet sufficiently abused Christ, not oft enough rejected the grace of God! Hast thou not yet wallowed long enough in the filth of sin? But must thou needs have more of it? Hast thou not yet done enough to the destruction of thy soul? Not drunk in enough of that deadly poison, nor stabbed thyself sufficiently by thy wickedness, but thou must needs have more? Will sin come up easier, when it is deeper rooted? and canst thou more easily be converted, when thou hast driven away the Spirit of God that should convert thee? Wilt thou travel out of thy way till night, before thou wilt turn back again? And wilt thou drive the nail yet faster to the head, which thou knowest must be drawn out again? Oh, be not wilfully befooled by sin. Wilt thou be converted, or wilt thou not? If not, thou art a lost man. If thou knowest thou must, why not to-day rather than to-morrow? What reason have you for any longer delay? Is a state of sin, or a state of grace better? If sin be better, keep it, and make the best of it: but if grace, and happiness, and holiness be better, why then should you delay? If you were sick, you would not care how soon you were well: and if you had a bone broken, you care not how soon it were set, and when your soul is in a state of sin and misery, are you afraid of being safe and happy too soon? —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1443.) You may put God to it to fetch you in by some sharp affliction, and send out so churlish a messenger to call you home as may make you wish you had hearkened to a more gentle call; when the sheep will straggle, the dog must be sent to afright them home. Many foolish sinners make light of the gentle invitations of grace, and they stand hovering between their sins and Christ; and sometimes they have a mind to turn, and the next temptation they are off again, and then they come on again coldly and with half a heart; and thus they stand trifling with the God of heaven till He is fain to take another course with them, and resolves to use some sharper means; and when He layeth them under His rod, and they can neither fly from, nor resist Him, but see that their lives and souls are at His mercy, then they begin to look about them and see their folly, and change their minds. You can tarry, and delay, and dally with the dreadful God in the time of your prosperity, and we may ask you over and over, whether you will turn before we can have a hearty answer; but what will you do when God shall begin to frown, and when He takes you in hand by His irresistible power, and lets loose upon you the terrors of His wrath? Will you then make as light of His mercy as you do now? Have you not read how small an apparition of His anger did make a carousing king look pale, and his joints to tremble in the midst of his joviality? (Dan. v. 6.) A Manasseh will bethink himself and come in when he is laid in irons, though he could set light by God before. (2 Chron. xxxiii. 13.) If Jonah will run away from God, He can send a boisterous messenger to arrest him, and cast him as it were into the belly of hell, and make him cry for mercy to Him whom he disobeyed. So if you will stand trifling with God, and will not by fair means be persuaded to yield and come away, you may shortly look to hear from Him in another manner; for He hath a voice that will make the proudest face look pale, and the most stubborn heart to tremble. If an idle, stubborn child will not learn nor be ruled, the master or parent will teach him with the rod, and give him a lash, and ask him, "Will you yet learn?" and another lash, and ask him, "What say you now, will you yet obey?" So will God do by you, if He love you, and means to save you; when He hath taken away your wealth, your friends, your children, will you then hearken to Him or will you not? When you lie groaning on your couch, and all your parts are overwhelmed with pains, and death begins to lay hands upon you, and bids you now come and answer for your rebellions and delays before the living God, what will you do then? Will you turn or not? Oh, the lamentable folly of sinners, that put themselves to so much sorrow, and great calamity for themselves. When sickness comes, and death draws near, you beg, and cry, and groan, and promise: when you feel the rod, what Christians will you then be! And why not without so much ado? You then think God deals somewhat hardly with you, and why will you not turn then by gentler means? You might spare yourselves much of this misery if you would, and you will not. Is it a seemly thing for a man to be driven to heaven by scourges? Is God so bad a Master, and heaven so bad a place, that you will not turn to them and mind them, and seek them, till there be no remedy, and you are, as it were, driven to it against your will? Is the world such an inheritance, and sin so good a thing, and the flesh or devil so good a master, that you will not leave them till you are whipped away? What a shameful, unreasonable course is this?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

3. Because life is so uncertain.

(1444.) To all who seek Him through a Redeemer, He is merciful and gracious, long-suffering and slow to wrath, abundant in goodness and in truth. Our highest interests, therefore, our present, and future, and eternal happiness, lie in yielding implicit and immediate obedience to the call, "Seek ye the Lord while He may be found." How does the lapse of years, the close of every day, enforce it? The setting sun; the clouds that, like the infirmities of age, gather round his sinking head; the fading light; the workman wending homeward, the peasant leaving his plough in the furrow, the weaver his shuttle on the loom; the larks that have dropped out of silent skies; the birds sitting mute on the branches; the flowers with their eyes closed and leaves folded up; the tenants of lone cottages and crowded city retiring to rest; and by and by the silence of a world wrapped in darkness and sleep—these are suggestive to a thoughtful mind of the close of life, the sleep of death, and our bed beneath a grassy sod. And each night that sun, whose lines go throughout all the earth, and his words to the ends of the world, with the heavens for his pulpit and the world for his audience, seems as he leaves us to say, "Work while it is called to-day, seeing that the night cometh when no man can work." —Guthrie.

4. Because the work will never be less difficult.

(1445.) A man that waits for a more convenient season for thinking about the affairs of his soul, is like the countryman in Æsop's fable, who sat down by a flowing river, saying, "If this stream continues to flow as it does now for a little while it will empty itself, and I shall walk over dry-shod." Ah, but the stream was just as deep when he had waited day after day as it was before. And so shall it be with you.

—Spurgeon.

5. Because delay multiplies its difficulties.

(1446.) Dost thou not find by experience that the longer thou delayest, the farther thou wanderest from God and holiness, and the more unfit thou art for, and the more unwilling unto, the work of conversion? Is it not time therefore to turn with speed, when continuance in sin insensibly hardeneth thy heart, and gradually indisposeth it more to the work of repentance? As the ground, so is thy heart, the longer it lieth fallow, not ploughed up, the harder it will be. Wilt thou go one step farther from God, when thou must come back every step, and that by Weeping-cross all the way, or be damned for ever? The purchase of heaven is like buying the Sibyl's prophecies, the longer thou holdest off, the dearer. A stain which has been long in clothes is not easily washed out; a house that hath long run to ruin will require the more cost and labour for its reparation; diseases that have been long in the body are cured, if at all, yet with much difficulty. The devil which had possessed the man from his infancy was hardly cast out, and not without much renting and raging (Mark ix. 21-26). Satan thinks his evidence as good as eleven points at law, now he hath once got possession; and the longer he continueth commander-in-chief in the royal fort of thy heart, the more he fortifieth it against God, and strengtheneth himself against the Almighty. All the while thou delayest, God is more provoked, the wicked one more encouraged, thy heart more hardened, thy debts more increased, thy soul more endangered, and all the difficulties of conversion daily more and more multiplied upon thee, having a day more to repent of, and a day less to repent in.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(1447.) It is true indeed there is in every man a moral indisposition to a spiritual renovation, but the indisposition is greater when the habits of sin are more than ordinarily strengthened. The more the soul is frozen, the harder it will be to melt. A body dead some few hours is a subject more capable of having life breathed into it than when it is putrefied and partly mouldered to dust. A young tree may more easily be taken up and transplanted than a strong old oak, which has spread its roots deep into the earth. The more rooted the habit of sin, the harder the alteration of the soul. Every sin in an unregenerate man is an adding a new stone to the former heap upon the grave to hinder his resurrection. It is a fetter and bond (Acts viii. 23); bond of iniquity, and the more new chains are put upon thee, the more unable wilt thou be to stir. The habits of sin will become the more natural to the soul, and fortify themselves with new recruits.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(1448.) The longer you stay, the more leisure you give the devil to assault you, and to try one way when he cannot prevail by another, and to strengthen his temptations: like a foolish soldier that will stand still to be shot at, rather than assault the enemy.

And the longer you delay, the more your sin gets strength and rooting. If you cannot bend a twig, how will you be able to bend it when it is a tree?

If you cannot pluck up a tender plant, are you more likely to pluck up a sturdy oak? Custom gives strength and root to vices. A blackamoor may as well change his skin, or a leopard his spots, as those that are accustomed to do evil can learn to do well (Jer. xiii. 23).

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1449.) Men are apt to persuade themselves that they shall find it an easy matter to grow virtuous as they grow old. But it is a way of arguing highly irrational and fallacious. For that is a maxim of eternal truth, and nothing grows weak with age but that which will die at length with age, which sin never does. The longer a blot continues, the deeper it sinks. And it will be found a work of no small difficulty to dispossess and throw out a vice from that heart where long possessions begins to plead prescription.

—South, 1633-1716.

(1450.) There is less hope for us each year and day we live in sin. Every hour we are drifting out to sea—the helpless, helpless barque is leaving the lessening shore farther and farther behind. Our disease becomes incurable. Like those stones which, though soft as clay on being raised from the quarry, grow hard as flint through exposure to the weather, our hearts are growing harder day by day.

—Guthrie.

(1451.) Sin is like the descent of a hill, where every step we take increases the difficulty of our return. Sin is like a river in its course; the longer it runs it wears a deeper channel, and the farther from the fountain it swells in volume and acquires a greater strength. Sin is like a tree in its progress; the longer it grows, it spreads its roots the wider; grows taller; grows thicker; till the sapling which once an infant's arm could bend raises its head aloft, defiant of the storm. Sin in its habits becomes stronger every day—the heart grows harder; the conscience grows duller; the distance between God and the soul grows greater; and, like a rock hurled from the mountain's top, the farther we descend, we go down, and down, and down, with greater and greater rapidity. How easy, for example, is it to touch the conscience of childhood; but how difficult to break in on the torpor of a hoary head! A child, with few sins on his young head, will tremble at the idea of death and judgment; while the old man lies on his dying bed, and whether you thunder in his ears the terrors of a broken law, or, holding up the cross before his dim eyes, tell him of the love of Jesus, no tears run down these furrowed cheeks, nor prayers move lips, whose oaths are recorded in the books of judgment.

I know that God, bending stubborn knees, and breaking the hardest heart, can call at the eleventh hour. Is anything too hard for Me? saith the Lord. He saves at the very uttermost. But I would say to him who tries how near he may go to hell, and yet be saved—it is a dangerous experiment—a desperate venture. It provokes God to recall His Spirit, and leave you to your fate, saying, "He is joined to his idols, let him alone."

—Guthrie.

(1452.) Not without the strongest reason does the wise man address himself to the young, saying, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth;" for the difficulty of resisting the bad and corrupt passions of our nature grows with man's growth, and strengthens with his strength. Some things become weak, and wear away by use; but not the power of sin. Like the muscles of a blacksmith's brawny arm, the more it is used the stronger it grows; and thus all sinners, as well as "seducers, wax worse and worse." The dead become twice dead; the dry bones more dry. Every new act of sin casts up an additional impediment in our way of return to virtue, and to God; until that which was once only a molehill swells into a mountain that nothing can remove, but the faith at whose bidding mountains are removed, and cast into the depths of the sea.

—Guthrie.

(1453.) There is a sense in which the difficulties of conversion increase with years—every year adding strength to our sinful habits; deepening, as by the constant flow of water, the channels in which they run.

—Guthrie.

(1454.) Who, wishing to give a sapling a peculiar bend, would wait till the nursing had become a full-grown tree, or stood in its decay, stiff and gnarled, hollow in the heart and hoar with age? None but a fool. Yet, with folly greater still, we defer what concerns our conversion, a saving change, and our everlasting welfare, till long years have added to the power, and strengthened the roots of every wicked, worldly habit!

—Guthrie.

(1455.) It is painful now to tear the world from our hearts—when the love of it has grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength, when it has spread its roots wider, and struck them deeper, to tear it up will demand a mightier effort, and inflict a greater pain. If sin has already so seared the conscience, that we can hear another St. Paul reason of "righteousness, temperance, and judgment," nor tremble in our seats as the Roman trembled on his throne, in what state shall our conscience be when the sins of future years have passed over it like a hot iron—searing, till, all sensibility destroyed, it becomes as hard as horn; like callous flesh, which the knife finds it difficult to penetrate, and impossible to pain? This is no exaggeration. Of all tasks, we know none so difficult as to touch the feelings, and rouse the conscience of godless old age.

—Guthrie.

6. Because delay is so foolish.

(1456.) In other cases, common sense prompteth men to proceed otherwise; for who, having rendered one his enemy that far overmatcheth him, and at whose mercy he standeth, will not instantly sue to be reconciled? Who, being seized by a pernicious disease, will not haste to seek a cure? Who, being fallen into the jaws of a terrible danger, will not nimbly leap out thence? And such plainly is our case; while we persist in sin we live in enmity and defiance with the Almighty, who can at His pleasure crush us; we lie under a fatal plague, which, if we do not seasonably repent, will certainly destroy us; we incur the most dreadful of all hazards, abiding in the confines of death and destruction; God frowning at us, guilt holding us, hell gaping for us: every sinner is, according to the wise man's expression, "as he that lieth down in the midst of the sea, or as he that lieth upon the top of a mast." And he that is in such a case, is he not mad or senseless, if he will not forthwith labour to swim out thence, or make all speed to get down into a safer place? Can any man with comfort lodge in a condition so dismally ticklish?

—Barrow, 1630-1677.

7. Because late conversions are so rare.

(1457.) A pious old age, following a youth of vice and a manhood of worldliness and indifference to religion, is not the rule, but the exception—and a rare exception. There is a close analogy here between the phenomena of the material and the spiritual world; conversions in old age, or advanced manhood, being as uncommon as a fine afternoon with cloudless skies and a glowing sunset, unless the rain ceases, and the weather clear before twelve o'clock.

—Guthrie.

(1458.) Judging by results, old age is, of all the ages of life, the least fitted for the work of salvation. No doubt we have read of hoary sinners becoming as little children, and turning to God; but in the experience of more than thirty years we have never met with one such case.

At the close of a dark and stormy day, we have seen the sun break forth at his setting, to bathe the whole landscape in a flood of glory, and having painted a rainbow on the storm-cloud, to sink to rest amid the odours of flowers, and the joyful songs of groves and skies. But whatever others may have done, we have met nothing corresponding to this in the realm of spirits; not one old man who lived the life of the wicked, and died the death of the righteous. I am not speaking of those who, in circumstances that were more their misfortune than their fault, had no opportunity of knowing the truth till they were old—who, like the penitent thief, perhaps received their first as well as last offer of a Saviour at death; never had Christ in their offer, as Simeon never had Him in his arms, till their eyes were dim, and their heads were gray with age. I speak of those who have gone Sabbath after Sabbath to the house of God, whenever Christ was brought forward, to reject Him, and cry, like the Jews of old, "We will not have this man to rule over us."

—Guthrie.

8. Because the reality of late conversions is always doubtful.

(1459.) The possibility of conversion at the eleventh hour I do not deny; still, its reality is exceedingly doubtful.

Take the case, for instance, of a convicted thief. You find him where silver-plate, gold, and jewels glitter temptations on his eye. Alarmed, you reckon up your money, examine your treasures, to be agreeably disappointed. They are safe; and you naturally conclude that he has turned over a new leaf, and become an honest man. But, however, willing to judge charitably, how would your confidence in him vanish on discovering that his hands were shackled, and that, though it was in his heart, it was not in his power to rob you? So far as many gross vices are concerned, such is exactly the position of hoary-headed sinners. Age has frozen their passions, and unfitted them for pleasures after which they once "ran greedily;" and so many infirmities have come with years, that a regard to health, and to life itself, forcing them to refrain from debauchery, produces an apparent reformation. A boat rotten in every plank, and gaping at every seam, has to avoid the seas and swell that others brave; and it were death to old men to venture on debaucheries in which others indulge. Thus the decorum which in some cases marks the closing years of such as had been notorious for vice, may be due to other causes than an inward, saving, and gracious change. The lion has not become a lamb when he has lost his teeth.

—Guthrie.

(1460.) Here is a hoary penitent. Poor old man, he trembles to hear of death and judgment; his aged limbs carry him to what he once neglected—the house of God; the glasses through which he scans his Bible are bedewed and dimmed with tears; bitterly lamenting his sins, he warns others; and on knees unused to bend, pours forth prayers for pardon in tones of deepest earnestness. It seems cruel to entertain doubts of such a case. But what is it we doubt? Not that he is sorry for his sins, after a fashion; not but that he would give a world, which he must any way soon part from, to be saved. In this case we may cling to the hope that He who can save to the uttermost, has called him at the eleventh hour; still this sorrow may only correspond to what the felon feels for crimes which have brought him to the gallows, cut short a mad and guilty career. Sorrow for sin and wishes to be saved? What death-condemned man does not feel these? does not bitterly lament the hour he embued his hands in blood? does not petition the crown to spare his life? would not give the world for a file to cut his chain; for a key to unlock his prison? Repentance for crimes at the foot of a gallows is not more open to suspicion than repentance for sins on the brink of a burning hell.
—Guthrie.

(1461.) Solemn warnings have come from scaffolds; but no one standing on the brink of time, with the white cap on his head, and his feet trembling on the drop, as he made his last speech to the awe-struck crowd, ever uttered voice so full of warning as the recorded experience of the chaplain of a large gaol in England. With the death-bell slowly tolling, he had accompanied many to the scaffold, and also prepared not a few for execution who were unexpectedly reprieved. Of these a large number seemed to be converted. Their repentance appeared sincere; and had they suffered the penalty of their crimes, he and others would have believed that, whom earth rejected, Heaven in its mercy had received for the sake of Christ's righteousness; acquitting at its bar those whom man had condemned at his. But they were spared to lead a new life? Alas, no! Thrown back into the world, the reality of their conversion was put to the test. The glittering coin was tested, exposed to a fiery trial; and what deceived others, deceived perhaps themselves, proved counterfeit. With hardly an exception, all who seemed to be converted within the prison, under the shadow of the gallows—in circumstances to be condemned corresponding with old age and the closing days of life, returned to their former courses; went back like the dog to his vomit, and the sow that is washed to her wallowing in the mire. A melancholy fact! What a dark suspicion does it cast on late conversions? In these cases the sun that sets on this world may rise to shine in the better; but dark clouds obscure such a close of life; and so long as men will risk their souls on these desperate ventures, however trite the remark, it cannot be too often, or too loudly, or too solemnly repeated, that the Bible, which ranges over a period of four thousand years, records but one instance of a death-bed conversion—one that none may despair, and but one that none may presume.

—Guthrie.

VIII. IN WHAT SENSE IT IS INSTANTANEOUS.

(1462.) When you are weighing things in the balance you may add grain after grain, and it makes no turning or motion at all till you come to the very last grain, and then suddenly that end which was downward is turned upward. When you stand at a loss between two highways, not knowing which way to go, as long as you deliberate you stand still; all the reasons that come into your mind do not stir you; but the last reason which resolves you sets you in motion. So it is (most often) in a sinner's heart and life; he is not changed (but preparing towards it) while he is deliberating whether he should choose Christ or the world. But the last reason which comes in and determines his will to Christ, and makes him resolve and enter a firm covenant with Him, this makes a greater change than even is made by any work in the world. For how can there be a greater than a turning of the soul from the creature to the Creator? So distant are the terms of this change. After this one turning act Christ hath that heart, and the main heart and endeavours of the life, which the world had before. The man hath a new end, a new guide, and a new master. Before the flesh and the devil were his masters, and now Christ is his master. So that you must not think so meanly of the turning, determining, resolving act of grace, because it lieth but in a gradual difference naturally from common grace. If a prince should offer a condemned beggar to marry her, and to pardon her, and to make her his queen, her deliberation may be the way to her consent, and one reason after another may bring her near to consenting. But it is that which turns her will to consent, resolve, covenant, and deliver herself to him, which makes the great change in her state. Yet all the foregoing work of common grace hath a hand in the change, though only the turning resolution do effect it: it is the rest with this that doth it: as when the last grain turns the scales, the former do concur.
—Baxter, 1615-1691.

IX. MUST BE THOROUGH.

(1463.) As a man purposing to destroy a tree, yet doth no more than lop off certain boughs, leaving the stump and root behind, deceiveth himself: even so, likewise, so long as concupiscence doth live in men. They may seem in the eyes of men to be great converts, if, of ignorant idiots, they are become such as have gotten some skill or knowledge; or as if, of drunkards, ruffians, adulterers, and such like, they have become sober and modest and of good behaviour—all this may be done before men, and yet the heart nothing altered before God; for there be many causes which may move men to seem outwardly to be godly, when the heart within is fraught with loathsome lusts, which make them still altogether abominable before God, and thus they have hereby gained nothing.

—Cambray, 1598-1664.

(1464.) If you do not go through with the work when you are upon it, you may make it more difficult than it was before you meddled with it, and make it a very doubtful case whether ever it will be done. As it is with a wound: if you tamper with it with salves that are not agreeable to it, or are disorderly applied; or if you skin it over before it be searched to the bottom, it must be opened again, and will cost you double pain before it be cured. Or as I have seen it with some that have had a bone broken, or out of joint, and it hath been set amiss at first: Oh, what torments were the poor creatures fain to undergo, in having it broken, or stretched and set again, which might have been spared, if it had been thoroughly done at first. So, if you will shrink, and will not go to the quick, you will make your conversion much more difficult; you must be brought to it again, and fetch your groans yet deeper than before, and weep over all your former tears; your doubts will be multiplied; your fears and sorrows will be increased; and all will go sorer with you than at first. Oh what a case will you be in, when your sores must be lanced a second time, and your bones, as it were, broken again! Then you will wish you had gone through with it at the first.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1465.) That scholar is never like to read well that will needs be in his grammar before he is out of his primer. Cloth that is not wrought well in the loom will never wear well, nor wear long; so that Christian that has not a thorough work of grace begun deeply in his heart, will never wear well; he will shrink in the wetting, and never do much service for God.

—Mead, 1629-1699.

X. IS ONLY THE BEGINNING OF THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

(1466.) Conversion may be the work of a moment, but a saint is not made in an hour. Character—Christian character—is not an act, but a process; not a sudden creation, but a development. It grows and bears fruit like a tree, and, like a tree, it requires a patient care and unwearied cultivation.

(1467.) No man was ever converted to Christianity at one flash. No man ever built a house at a single blow, except in a summer dream. When we shut our eyes, and are architects of reverie, we can build worlds; we can multiply the dew-drop till it swings like a crystal sphere in the realms of space. We can create cities, we can cause millions of troops to spring up, we can populate heaven and earth, by reverie; but no man ever did anything worth doing—anything complex, large, noble—by reverie. Many suppose that when a man is converted by the power of God, the Spirit of God acts as the lightning acts—instantaneously. But suppose it does, did you ever know the lightning to strike a mountain and instantly clear away all the dross and leave nothing but pure gold, in the shape of coin, with the superscription of the government upon it, and waiting for men to use it? When you see the metal in a mountain set free by a stroke of lightning, you may expect to see a man set free from the circumstances of life by conversion with overpowering suddenness.

The conversion by which the Spirit of God starts a man, just starts him—that is all. It turns him away from the wrong direction. It turns him toward the right model. It gives his heart an inspiration for things higher, and then says to him, "Work out your salvation."

—Becher.

(1468.) Men wish to be converted so that the whole field shall be cleared, and so that they will have nothing to do but to go right forward in the new life. They believe, as it were, that if God will only touch the rock, and let the springs of sanctified affection gush out, then, just as soon as they have found their channel, their life will be like the running of a brook out of the mountains and through its channel, down to its destination, unchecked and undisturbed. They think that if they are once converted, they are converted for all time. It used to be taught that, once a deacon, always a deacon; once an elder, always an elder; once a minister, always a minister; and, according to this general scheme, once converted, always converted. And so men feel that when God takes hold of a man's heart, when the man is regenerated, when by the power of the Holy Ghost he is translated from the kingdom of Satan and darkness into the kingdom of light and of God's dear Son, it is a work that is completed. I say it is not a completed work.

Here is a man who has been lying around, a lazy vagabond, sucking his substance from those to whom he is related, and he is taken to the great West, put upon a hundred and sixty acres of ground, and told to work out his own living. He has his ground; he owns it; he is no longer one of the lazzaroni; and he goes to work on his farm. It is not converted yet. It has on it thorns and briars and weeds, and it brings him in nothing, at first; but he goes to work, and by his industry and application begins to develop its resources. He is an honest yeoman, he is the owner of property, and he has been converted from a street-beggar into a man of means and respectability; but his own conversion is not complete, any more than the conversion of his farm is complete, which he has begun to cultivate, but which needs much tilling to bring it to a state of perfection. When a man is converted, he has a new start—that is all. The work of his conversion is not carried through.

Now, no man was ever taken from darkness to light so that he saw clear through to the kingdom of glory at one glance. When a man is taken out of the gall of bitterness and the bonds of iniquity, the angel comes to him as he did to Peter, knocks off his chains, opens the door, and says, "Rise up and go out." And when he has risen up and gone out, he has to find his own way to his friends, and has to get his living as best he can.

In regard to religious things, men are under precisely the same necessity of drill and education, and of the application of means to ends, that they are in any other sphere of life. If a man, therefore, expects that there is any labour-saving conversion, he is greatly mistaken.

—Becher.

XI. ITS RESULTS.

(1469.) There are two classes of circumstances by which we are all surrounded. Temporal circumstances comprise the outward accidents of man's present life; spiritual circumstances consist of the relations in which he stands to eternity and God. The temporal surroundings are but as the little garden, with its gates and rails, around a shepherd's cottage, while the spiritual are as the everlasting mountains, that gird the horizon and touch the heavens—or as the grand march of the seasons, now bathing the windows with warm sunlight, now pelting the roof with rain or snow. Changes take place in the outwardly temporal

It is just like altering the tiny garden; the spiritual landscape all around is the same—the same dark hills, and the same cloudy heavens. Men rise from poverty to wealth, from obscurity to honour, but remain condemned by God's law, and subject to His righteous displeasure.

On the other hand, the outwardly temporal remains as it was. The dimensions of the seed-plot by the cottage door continue unchanged, but summer has followed winter, and the snows on the mountain have melted, and all nature has become another self, are seen in the golden and purple light of autumn's morning or eventide. And so a man may remain poor as he ever was—as neglected as he ever was; but God is no longer angry with him. His anger is turned away, and the whole universe to him has become changed—life's prospects, and especially eternity's, are completely different.

—Stoughton.

XII. WHY CONVERSIONS ARE SO RARE.

(1470.) There are many in the community who stand quite disconnected from any true religious work, or any useful occupation of beneficence or of mercy, and are perpetually finding fault with churches, and with ministers, and with all the varied institutions which have sprung up under the gospel of Christ. And they would fain make us believe that the reason why they are not better, is that these things are so poor. But, after all, the reason why men are not truly spiritual and Christian, is not the incompetence of external institutions; it is not the poorness of preaching; it is not the imperfections of the Church; it is not the adaptations in the external institutions of the religious world. It is that men have at heart an indisposition to conform to that by which they might go out of the animal and lower life, into the spiritual life. The trouble is in the men themselves, and not in the institutions that surround them. They are like sick children. Whatever the nurse may bring, whether it be of food, or of drink, or of some object of amusement, the child pushes it pettishly away. Nothing suits the child. It is not because the picture is not beautiful; it is not because the drink is not cooling and palatable; it is not because the food is not good: it is because the irritable nerve is such that nothing seems good, no matter how good it may be, and nothing seems desirable, no matter how attractive it may be. And there are hundreds of men in every community who refuse to bow down the pride of their nature, and who refuse to accept the service of our Lord Jesus Christ, because of the heart that they carry in them, although the reasons which they allege are reasons of exterior religion.

—Becher.

XIII. HISTORY OF A CONVERSION.

(1471.) While spending a week lately in the society of a great number of faithful pastors from the Canton of Vaud, one of them, at a public meeting, related to us the recent conversion of a lady in his parish. She was one of those who lived only for this world; the thoughts of her sins had never caused her uneasiness; she was careful and troubled about many things, but neglected the one thing needful. One night, while alone in her room, she saw the lamp which lighted it suddenly go out. Although she was alone, she said aloud, (thinking only of the accident which left her in the dark), "There is no oil in the lamp!" The words thus spoken, echoed in the room and sounded in her ears, but with a new sense. She recalled the parable of the five foolish virgins who had no oil, and whose lamps had gone out at the coming of the bridegroom; and from that moment, day and night, that word of God remained in her soul, as an arrow remains in the side of a stag who flies away from the hunters. It recurred to her constantly: "No, I have no oil in my lamp! My God! what will become of me? I have not Thy grace in my heart!" She was filled with fear; then she began to pray, and continued in prayer until God answered her favourably, and gave her His peace.

CONVICTION.

1. Its nature.

(1472.) Conviction of sin denotes something beyond the common views of the mind concerning its sins; and is always a serious, solemn, heartfelt sense of their reality, greatness, guilt, and danger. There is a total difference between merely seeing or understanding a subject, and feeling it. A man may contemplate, as a mere object of speculation and intellect, the downward progress of his own affairs towards bankruptcy and ruin, and have clear views of its nature and consequences, and still regard it as an object of mere speculation. Should he afterwards become a bankrupt, and thus be actually ruined, he will experience a state of mind entirely new, and altogether unlike anything which he experienced before. He now feels the subject; before he only thought on it with cool contemplation, and however clear his views were, they had no effect on his heart. His former views never moved him to due efforts for the prevention of his ruin; those which he now possesses would have engaged him, had they existed at the proper time for this purpose, in the most vigorous exertions. Just such is the difference between the common views of sin, and those which are experienced under religious conviction. What before was only seen, is now realised and felt.

—Salter.

2. The commencement of the Divine life in the soul.

(1473.) If a man be quite out of his way, what must be the first means to bring him in again? Why, a despair of ever coming to his journey's end in the way that he is in. If his home be eastward, and he be going westward, as long as he hopes he is in the right, he will go on; and as long as he so goes on hoping, he goes further amiss: therefore, when he meets with somebody that assures him that he is clean out of his way, and brings him to despair of coming home, except he turn back again; then he will return, and then he may hope and spare not. Why, sinner, just so is it with thy soul: thou art born out of the way to heaven; and in that way thou hast proceeded many a year; yet thou goest on quietly, and hopest to be saved, because thou art not so bad as many others. Why, I tell thee, except thou be brought to throw away those hopes, and see that thou hast all this while been quite out of the way to heaven, thou wilt never return and be saved! Who will turn out of his way while he hopes he is right?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1474.) Conviction is very necessary, and an excellent preparative to conversion; as ploughing fits the ground for sowing, so does this fit the heart for grace: and therefore the first work of the Spirit is to "reprove the world of sin."

—Thomas Hall, 1659.

3. Its design.

(1475.) As in a dangerous storm, the mariner will cast silk and satin overboard, and the most valuable things, rather than perish; even so God raises a storm of conviction in the man's conscience, that threatens everlasting shipwreck, that he may cast away his confidence and legal righteousness: that what things were gain to him, these he may count loss for Christ.

—Erskine, 1685-1752.

(1476.) Sir James Thornhill was the person who painted the inside of the cupola of St. Paul's, London. After having finished one of the compartments, he stepped back gradually to see how it would look at a distance. He receded so far (still keeping his eye intently fixed on the painting), that he was got almost to the very edge of the scaffolding without perceiving it: had he continued to retreat, half a minute more would have completed his destruction, and he must have fallen to the pavement underneath. A person present, who saw the danger the great artist was in, had the happy presence of mind to suddenly snatch up one of the brushes, and spoil his painting by rubbing it over. Sir James, transported with rage, sprang forward to save the remainder of the piece. But his rage was soon turned into thanks, when the person told him, "Sir, by spoiling the painting I have saved the life of the painter. You had advanced to the extremity of the scaffold without knowing it. Had I called out to you to apprise you of your danger, you would naturally have turned to look behind you, and the surprise of finding yourself in such a dreadful situation would have made you fall indeed. I had, therefore, no other method of retrieving you but by acting as I did." Similar, if I may so speak, is the method of God's dealing with His people. We are all naturally fond of our own legal performances. We admire them to our ruin, unless the Holy Spirit retrieve us from our folly. This He does by marrying, as it were, our best works; by showing us their insufficiency to justify us before God. When we are truly taught of Him, we thank Him for His grace, instead of being angry at having our idols defaced. The only way by which we are saved from everlasting destruction, is by being made to see that "by the deeds of the law no flesh shall be justified."

—Salter.

4. How it is effected.

(1477.) As in the night, by reason of the darkness, we cannot discern the spots we have on our faces, but when the light beginneth to appear, and we take a glass to behold ourselves therein, then they are discovered: even so, likewise, during the time that we are covered with the darkness of ignorance, the vices that dwell in us are hidden there; and oftentimes we think, being leprous and deformed, that we are beautiful and perfect, but our eyes being open and illuminated by the Spirit of God, and taking the glass of the law, therein to behold the state of our nature and our life, then we begin to know the grievous imperfections that are in us, and we at once lose the opinion which we had conceived of our own righteousness, and perceive what danger we were in before.

—Cawdray, 1598-1664.

(1478.) Let me illustrate my way of convicting persons of sin. How would I attempt to convict a person of ignorance? If a little sprig of a fellow comes where I am, thinking that he knows everything, and that he is going to teach me everything, it is not necessary for me to say to him, "You are a popinjay, sir; you are a conceited fool!" One of the best ways to deal with him is to assume that he knows everything. I introduce one subject, and assume that he is familiar with it, and question him upon it till he begins to say to himself, "I do not know quite as much as I thought I did." I at once pass from that to another subject, and assume that he knows something on that, and push him along till he begins to boggle, and feel that he is not half so wise as he thought he was. And by the time I have swamped him on half-a-dozen subjects, he will be quite crestfallen, and have some idea of his ignorance.

And if a man comes to me and says, "I cannot see that I am a sinner," I say, "Then you do not need any change nor repentance. But you ought to act like a Christian, if you cannot see that you are a sinner. Do you pray?" "Well, I—yes." "Do you enjoy prayer?" "I cannot say that I do." "But why not?" "Well, my thoughts wander, and I do not seem to be speaking to anybody, and nobody seems to hear me." "Ha! you do not think that you are sinful; but the moment you attempt to speak to God He is nothing to you, and you are nothing to Him. You are from Him; and your breath is from Him; the bounties that every day shower upon you are from Him; and yet, according to your own admission, nothing is so foreign to your nature as communion with Him; and when you address a few words to Him, your thoughts are roving from one end of the earth to the other!" "And how is it," I say, "in respect to Christ, His sacrifice, His resurrection, and His ascension? What are your feelings towards Him?" "Well, I want to love the Saviour." "Do you love the Saviour?" "I cannot say that I do." "You profess to have no sense of sinfulness, and yet you admit that you have no love toward the Saviour who died for you, and who, having ascended to heaven, there intercedes in your behalf!" But I say still further, "Take the idea of a Christian life as the rule of your conduct, and attempt to govern yourself by the law of gentleness, meekness, and love for one day." The moment he does this he finds himself in difficulty; and at the end of the day he comes back and says, "Oh, I broke it here, and I broke it there. I found myself unequal to the task." I do not care which one of the fundamental precepts of Christ a man undertakes to follow, he needs undertake to follow it but one day to have revealed to him the barrenness of his spiritual life and the sinfulness of his nature.

—Becher.

5. Should instantly lead to action.

(1479.) The sooner we turn to the ways of God, the better we speed. How so? Partly in this, that the work goes on the more kindly as being carried forth in the strength of the present influence and impulsion of grace; whereas, if the heart grow cold again, it will be more difficult. A blow when the iron is hot does more than ten at another time when it grows cold again : so when thy heart grows cold, thou wilt not have that advantage as when thou art under warm conviction.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(1480.) Of all things in the world, do not wait to see if your convictions will not do something of themselves. When the dairyman brings in his overflowing pail from the yard, and pours the milk into the pans, and sets them on their various shelves, there is nothing better than that these pans should stand still, that the cream may rise; and many people seem to treat their hearts as though they were pans of milk, which should stand still while the cream rises on them. But nothing comes from involuntary life. "Work out," says God, "your own salvation." It is not passivity, but activity, that befits the nature of that which you carry within yourselves. Therefore, if you have a yearning desire for something, carry it forward and ratify it.

Do you ask what you shall do? One of the first things I exhort every man to do is this: Look and see what sin, what hindrance, what entanglement, what yoke or bondage, there is in you. Begin that way, but do not feel that the work is accomplished when you have done that. That is only the preparation. As, when a person that is working in mortar or clay is summoned to go and see a friend, he begins by throwing off his working-clothes and washing his hands as a preliminary step to getting ready, so a man who is going to see God should begin to prepare himself by breaking off his outward sin. If it is love of liquor, if it is any dishonest trait, if it is any cherished hatred, if it is any bitter animosity, if it is any illicit attachment, if it is an entanglement of any kind, the first step for you is to cut loose from it. If it requires you to break with companions that are leading you on in sin, break with them at once. Nothing will test a man's earnestness quicker than this. If you do that, you are in a state in which, even though you are not a Christian, there is much hope for you.

—Becher.

(1481.) My friends, consideration is a good thing; but if I were in a railway car, and had gone over a cliff, and were rolling down, and down, and down, and the stove had begun to pour its coals out, and the flames were beginning to take hold of everything that was combustible, and I saw that there was a chance to get out, I should lose no time in attempting to escape; and if a man should pull me by the skirt and say, "Consider, my friend, consider," I would say, "Let me get out first, and then I will consider." Suppose, finding your dwelling in flames, and yourself in imminent danger of being consumed or suffocated, you should make haste to escape, and a man should say to you, "It is all right to be concerned about yourself, but consider." Consider? What! when a man stands under an avalanche, and hears the crash coming down, and runs to get out of its way, and some one says to him, "Stop, consider," which is the fool under the circumstances? When a man sees that there is danger before him, and that he is moving toward it, there is an instinct of self-preservation which is aroused, and which should not be disregarded. And there is a self-preserving instinct given to the spirit as much as to the body.

And such a time is a time, not for consideration, but for action. When your soul is in danger, flee. Flee for your life. Do not wait, nor even look back. The very object of haste is to rescue men before the fascination of evil, which has been broken, shall return.

There are bays along rocky coasts. Where promontories stretch out, a bay runs in. When the tide is out, it is charming to walk about on the sand. But when the tide comes in there is danger, unless one is on the alert. For it comes stealing in almost imperceptibly, and often shuts off the promontories long before it runs up into the bay. And if a man is amusing himself there with no heed and no outlook, the insidious tide, which comes in sweet as the blossoming of a flower, but with all the power of the ocean behind it, will overtake him. If he does not flee before the promontories are shut off, he will never flee. It is now or never with him. There is many and many a man hemmed in between two promontories which invite the tide and the ocean. Now is your time to escape. If you wait till the tide comes in, you will be drowned. If there are any here in whom the tide of appetite, or the tide of passion, or the tide of infatuation for gambling, or the tide of corruption, is out, now is the time for you to flee. Do not wait for it to come back again. Be precipitate, and save your souls.

—Becher.

(1482.) A man who feels that he is sinful in such a sense that he needs God's forgiving mercy, and that sinfulness in him is of such a nature that he needs God's help to overcome it, has a sense of sin that is deep enough for practical exigencies. How strongly must he feel who has this sense of his sin, and of his need of the influence of the Divine nature in his character and conduct? In other words, how intensive must be that conviction? It must be intense enough to lead him to make exertion, and the needed exertion, to escape from the evil, and go toward the good. How heavy must the wind blow to take a man out of the harbour of New York? Must it blow twenty knots an hour? Well, that will take him out easily. Fifteen knots? Yes, that will take him out. Ten knots? That will take him out too. Five knots? Yes, he will get out with that. But suppose the wind blows but one knot an hour? Well, it is better to go out with one knot an hour than not to go out at all.

How much must a man feel the hatefulness and malignity of sin? How much must he feel the danger of sin? What stress of conviction must a man have in order that that stress may carry him away from lethargy, and indifference, and neglect, and low desires? Not so much as many suppose. If it does carry him away from these things, it is sufficient. It would be easier if the outflow were strong. Nevertheless, the lowest measure of religious experience is enough, if a man avail himself of it, and flee from selfishness and pride, and take the help of God which is proffered to him.

—Becher.

6. Should lead us to Christ.

(1483.) Suppose one of your children has offended you, and you say to him, "Come, my dear, I freely forgive you; come and give me a kiss, and it is all over." He shakes his head, and says, "No, father, I cannot kiss you;" and he runs away upstairs and shuts himself up. You knock at the door, and say,

"Come, my child, come and kiss me, and it is all forgiven." But he shakes his head and says, "No, never." He shuts himself up there all alone, and he thinks he is doing more to put away your anger by so doing than by obeying your command. You say to him solemnly, "My child, I will chasten you again for disobedience if you do not come and accept the forgiveness which I offer to you if you will but kiss me." The child sullenly says, "No, father, I will do something else that is more humbling;" and then you feel in your soul that that is an unhumiliated child or else he would at once do what his father told him, without thinking whether it would be a humiliating thing or not. It would be a humbling thing because his father told him to do it, and if he were a right-minded child he would do it from a spirit of obedience. Now, you may think it very humble on your part to want to feel a great deal of conviction, and to shed a great many tears, and to pray a great many prayers, but the most lowly thing you can do is to perform what the Master tells you. "Trust me," saith He; "do not go over there to weep; come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

—Spurgeon.

(1484.) I will tell you a little anecdote which I have often told before; it brings to your mind more clearly than any other means your right to believe in Christ. I am speaking to those who say, "I have no right to trust Christ." But if Christ commands you to do it, and if, moreover, He tells you, "you are condemned already because you do not believe." You certainly have a right to believe. Sitting one day in court with a judge interesting myself with some trials that were going on, there was wanted a witness. I am not clear about his name, but I think it was Brown. So it was said from the bench that Brown was wanted next. The usher down in the court cried out, "Brown!" Some one near the door cried, "Brown!" and I could hear them calling out in the street two or three times, "Brown! Brown! Brown!" The court was very crowded. By-and-by there came in at the court door, with a great deal of difficulty, a little, ugly, mean-looking creature. He came pushing and elbowing his way. There was a fine, tall gentleman standing in the court, looking on. He did not like to be pushed about, and he said in a very peremptory manner, "Who are you?" "Brown," said the man, "I am Brown." "Well, but," said the other, "who is Brown?" "Nobody," said he, "only I was told to come." It was wonderful how everybody made way for Brown, because he was told to come. They just cleared a lane for him, and I do not suppose for my lord and duke they would have made room, they were so tightly packed; but Brown must come in anyhow, because he was wanted. It did not matter how poor he looked, how ragged, how greasy, how dirty, Brown was wanted and he had a right to come. So now, God commands you to trust Christ. But you say, "There is a big sin standing up." And He says, "Who are you?" You say, "A poor sinner." "And what is a poor sinner?" says He. "Nothing at all," you say; "but Jesus Christ told me to trust in Him. If He is wrong I leave the blame with Him, I will not keep back from Him."

—Spurgeon.

7. Saving conviction is thorough.

(1485.) As knives and lancets must first be used to open that wound which is full of corruption, even to the bottom, and then sharp and bitter salve to draw out the corruption and to eat out the dead flesh thereof, before there come any healing plaster near it, the nature whereof is to close up and skin the upper part of the wound, which, if any corruption remain, afterwards breeds much inconvenience and makes the wound far more dangerous: even so it fareth with all those who are wounded with the venomous dart of self-love, which wound, being choked with the corruption and dead flesh of covetousness and pride, they yet will use no other medicine for the curing thereof than that pleasant healing salve of the Gospel, which, if they knew in truth how little the same did profit them before such time as the sharp lancing knife of God's law had opened the wound, and the bitter salves of His judgments and sharp threatenings had eaten out the rottenness thereof, they would go another way to work, and use a more suitable course for the obtaining of health, although it be very tedious and sharp at the first.

—Calvary, 1598-1664.

(1486.) The soul in this great work is convinced and sensible, as of the evil of sin, so of its own misery by reason of sin. They who before read the threats of God's law, as men do the whole stories of foreign wars, or as they behold the wounds and the blood in a picture, or piece of arras, which never makes them smart or fear: now they find it is their own story, and they perceive they read their own doom, as if they found their names written in the curse, or heard the law say; as Nathan, "Thou art the man." The wrath of God seemed to him but as a storm to a man in a dry house, or as the pains of the sick to the healthful stander-by, or as the torments of hell to a child that sees the story of Dives and Lazarus upon the wall; but now he finds the disease is his own, and feels the pain in his own bowels, and the smart of the wounds in his own soul. In a word, he finds himself a condemned man, and that he is dead and damned in point of law, and that nothing was wanting but mere execution to make him most absolutely and irrecoverably miserable.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1487.) This conviction is not by mere argumentation, as a man is convinced of the verity of some inconcerning consequence by dispute; but also by the sense of our desperate misery, as a man in famine of the necessity of food; or a man that had read or heard his sentence of condemnation, is convinced of the absolute necessity of pardon; or as a man that lies in prison for debt, is convinced of the necessity of a surety to discharge it. Now the sinner finds himself in another case than ever he was aware of; he feels an insupportable burden upon him, and sees there is none but Christ can take it off. He perceives that he is under the wrath of God, and that the laws proclaim him a rebel and an outlaw, and none but Christ alone can make his peace: he is a man pursued by a lion, that must perish, if he find not present sanctuary. He feels the curse doth lie upon him, and upon all he hath for his sake, and Christ alone can make him blessed: he is now brought to this dilemma, either he must have Christ to justify him, or be eternally condemned; he must have Christ to save him, or burn in hell for ever; he must have Christ to bring him again to God, or be shut out of His presence everlastingly; and now no wonder if he cry as the martyn Lambert, "None but Christ! none but Christ!" It is not gold, but bread, that will satisfy the hungry; nor anything but pardon that will comfort the condemned. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

8. Abortive convictions.

(1488.) What makes convictions prove abortive? Wherein is the defect?

1. They are not deep enough: a sinner never saw himself lost without Christ; the seed that wanteth depth of earth withered. These convictions are like blossoms blown off before they come to maturity.

2. These convictions are involuntary; the sinner doth what he can to stifle these convictions; he drowns them in wine and mirth; he labours to get rid of them: as the deer when it is shot, runs and shakes out the arrow; so doth he the arrow of conviction: or as the prisoner that files off his fetters, and breaks loose; so a man breaks loose from his convictions. His corruptions are stronger than his convictions.

3. Men have some kind of humiliation, and have shed tears for their sins, therefore now they hope the kingdom of grace is come into their hearts. But this is no infallible sign of grace; Saul wept, Ahab humbled himself. —Watson, 1696.

9. The duty of those who are under conviction.

(1489.) When a man is under conviction of sin, and is on the point of deciding for Christ, it is a perilous thing for him to throw himself where pleasures may entice, where indulgences may solicit, where anything may come in to unsettle his purpose. It takes very little to carry down the scale when it stands at equipoise. Very often the least thing will do it.

I say this because I have been so long a time dealing with men that I know what their feelings are, and I know that such warning is often needed when men are serious-minded; when they are very near to the kingdom of God—as near as some of you are to-night—so near that it would take the merest pressure of the hand to bear them over the line, and within the sacred precinct. Men ridicule us sometimes, who do not well consider what they say, and who do not understand the nature of moral qualities, when we say to a man, "Withhold yourself even from lawful pleasures; do not go into company which at other times you might properly keep; God's Spirit strives with you; your heart is brought into such a temper, and under such influences, that that which would be perfectly allowable at another time, is not wise at this crisis." As, when a person is sick, diet which in health is perfectly right is bad for him; so when a man is coming back to himself and to his Saviour, there are many things which he ought not to do, because in such critical hours and moments little things go so far.

When guides are taking men along Alpine stretches in the forenoon, when the sun has begun to shine, and the vast avalanches lie above, they will not let them speak, and say to them, as they begin to make the turn, "While going round this ravine on the narrow path, let no man say a word." And so they go on in silence, one after another. Why? Because so exactly balanced, sometimes, is the avalanche, that the echo, and the vibration of the air which is produced, will be just what is necessary to break the last icicle that holds it, and down will come the avalanche. At other points in the passage they may shout as loud as they please, and it will do no harm; but there are critical points where the guide says, "Hush, and do not even whisper." It is a very little thing; but oh! does it not take hold of tremendous consequences?

A companion that is good for hours of health may be a bad companion for hours of sickness. A companion that is good for ordinary times may, at certain critical times of a man's moral history, be ruinous, not intending it. Thousands of men have been destroyed in this world, I doubt not, who never knew, nor suspected even, that it was the smallest circumstance that determined their destruction. As trains are destroyed by the movement of a switch no more than the tenth part of an inch, so little things often determine, at critical periods, men's fate for time and for eternity.

—Becker.

10. Is deepened by every attempt to obey the law of God.

(1490.) The first attempt which he makes to govern himself according to the laws of God will show to him the incredible power and control which pride has gained in him. And when he undertakes to govern that pride, he will have a sense of its un-governableness which perhaps he never had before.

There is a five-year-old colt in the pasture. I call him to me. I shake the oats in the measure. I feed him. He eats out of my hand. And I say, "Talk to me about this colt's being fractious! See how docile he is." I lead him into the yard. I put the harness on him. I undertake to drive him. Oh, how docile he is now! The moment he feels the harness how he rears and plunges! How fractious he is! He is unwilling that anybody but himself shall have the control of him. You could not bring out his spirit till you laid the harness on him.

A man thinks himself to be all right. Yes, so waters that flow almost on a level, singing and murmuring as they go, suppose they are all right. But lay across their channel an obstruction so that they cannot move just as they wish. How they begin to plunge over that obstruction, with hoarse plaints! If you let man's pride and selfishness run as they want to, they do not make any report. So long as they are undisturbed they are quiet enough. But lay upon them the law of God, attempt to bring them into subjection to the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ, say to them, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbour as thyself," and see how they will like that. Let them undertake to put that rule in practice. Let pride subscribe to it; let vanity subscribe to it; let avarice subscribe to it; let passion and temper, in all their vagaries, subscribe to it. Let envy and jealousy come up, and submit themselves to it. When a man does that, he will find that he has a different nature to deal with. If you do it yourself, you will find how hard it is for a man to live according to the law of God.

—Becker.

CREATION.

1. Is at once a proof of the being, and a revelation of the character, of God.

(1491.) If there were beings who lived in the depths of the earth, in dwellings adorned with statues and paintings, and everything which is possessed in rich abundance by those whom men esteem fortunate; and if these beings could receive tidings of the might and majesty of the gods, and could then emerge from their hidden dwellings through the open fissures of the earth to the places which we inhabit; if they could suddenly behold the earth and the sea and the vault of heaven; could recognise the expanse of the cloudy firmament, and the might of the winds of heaven, and admire the sun in his majesty, beauty, and radiant effulgence; and lastly, when night veiled the earth in darkness, they could behold the starry heavens, the changing moon, and the stars rising and setting in the unvarying course ordained from eternity, they would surely exclaim, "There are gods! and such great things must be the work of their hands." —Aristotle: Quoted by Humboldt in his Cosmos.

(1492.) As a prisoner in a dungeon may easily, by a little beam that shineth in at a chink, conceive there is a sun, from whence that beam descendeth; or as a traveller in the wilderness, that falleth upon some channel or brook, may ascend by the same to the well or fountain: even so he that beholdeth and considereth the wonderful works of the world may thereby conceive of the wonderful Artificer or Worker that made them.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(1493.) The visible world and every part of it is a book, wherein we may read some syllables of God. The heathens saw God in heaven, earth, fire, water, plants, and animals; all creatures being lines drawn from the centre. Though man has not the knowledge which Adam had, since the flaw he contracted upon his understanding, yet there being some scattered relics of this knowledge, he may, by looking near to the creatures, discern, by his purblind and dim sight, something of the attributes of God, every creature being a glass which reflects some beams of God upon his mind; for no man in his wits can conclude that the world was made by chance, but by some being more wise than any being in the world can be, or than all the wisest men in the world put together. We know the courage, conduct, and power of a general by the sight of his conquests, the skillfulness of an artificer by the excellence of his work, and the eloquence of an orator by reading his speech, though we never saw the faces of any of them. There are very few attributes but the works of creation and providence discover in some measure to us; the invisible things of God from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead" (Rom. i. 20).

We may as truly conclude all this of God, by the prospect of the creation, as a man might conclude the wisdom, power, and magnificence of the Romans by sight of their pyramids, theatres, statues, buildings, and other conveniences in the city for the people; for it is a rational way of arguing, from the excellency of the effect to the excellency of the cause, and from the perfection of the creature to the perfection of God.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(1494.) The philosopher conjectured truly, who, being shipwrecked on the island of Rhodes, and come to the shore, spying some mathematical figures drawn on the sand, cried out with joy, "Vertigia hominum vides," I see the footsteps of men, and comforted his despairing companions, that they were not cast into a desert, or place of savages, but of men civil and wise, as he discovered by those impressions of their minds. And if we observe the frame of the world, the concatenation of the superior with the middle, and of the middle with the lower parts, whereby it is not an accidental aggregation of bodies, but an entire universe: if we consider the just disposing them conveniently to their nature and dignity, the inferior and less noble depending on the superior, and that so many contrary natures with that fidelity and league of mutual love embrace and assist each other, that every one working according to its peculiar quality, yet all unite their operations for one general end, the preservation and benefit of the whole, must we not strongly conclude that it is the work of a designing and most wise agent?

—Bates, 1625-1699.

2. Its revelation of God is necessarily imperfect.

(1495.) All nature is incapable of discovering God in a full manner as He may be known. Nature, like Zaccheus, is of too low a stature to see God in the length and breadth, height and depth, of His perfections. The key of man's reason answers not to all the wards in the lock of those mysteries. The world at best is but a shadow of God, and therefore cannot discover Him in His magnificent and royal virtues, no more than a shadow can discover the outward beauty, the excellent mien, and the inward endowments of the person whose shadow it is. All that a shadow will inform me of, is whether it be the shadow of a man or brute. It discovers something of God, not so much of Him as to give the soul a full complacency; the fruit of it is but a thirst without a satisfaction.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(1496.) Nature discovers that there is a God, but not fully what that God is; nor does the creation furnish man with a notion of God suitable to the excellency and immensity of His nature; as a blind man who hears a discourse of the light and heat of the sun, being brought under the beams of it striking hot upon his body, feels the warmth and knows there is such a thing men call the sun, and is sensible of some effects of it, but has not a full conception of the enlightening nature of the sun, nor knows what the body of the sun is, nor what kind of shape it appears in, and if he should declare his conception of it, it would be strangely different from the true nature of the sun, a monstrous mistaken description of it, not suitable to that planet; nay, what man is there that sees the sun every day, that is able to say he fully knows the nature of it by his sight, or the constant influences which he feels from it?

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(1497.) Though the earth is crowded with proofs of the Divine beneficence, yet the worldly man sees but a glimpse of it; he is as one standing only upon the threshold of the temple which records God's goodness. But the true believer is one who has entered its sacred walls, and mingled with its worshippers. The great display, "the unspeakable gift," remains within. While its walls are filled with testimonies of goodness infinite, on the altar of sacrifice he sees inscribed, "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son." Now he can exclaim, "Herein is love!" It is he that can say, "Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift." —Saller.

2. It is all "very good."

(1498.) Every one of God's works is so profitable, that, as the aromatic fruit, not only is the kernel a nutmeg, but the skin of it is mace. As in a fair suit of arras, though the hangings never appear to their full advantage, but when they are opened in all their dimensions, and seen together, yet a small shred may assure you of the excellency of the colour and the richness of the stuff; so, though the Divine perfections would appear most in their beauty and glory, if we were able at one view to behold the whole world in its several eminences and beauties, yet a little part of it may speak the worth and richness of the whole.

—Swinmock, 1673.

(1499.) We can never neglect the meditation of the creatures without a blemish cast on the Creator's wisdom. As every river can conduct us to the sea, so every creature points us to an ocean of infinite wisdom. Not the minutest of them but rich tracts of this may be observed in them, and a due sense of God result from them.

The whole world is like a looking-glass, which whole and entire represents the image of God, and every broken piece of it, every shred of a creature, doth the like. His name is glorious, and His attributes are excellent in all the earth, as the glory of the sun is in every beam and smaller flash; He is seen in every insect, in every spire of grass.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(1500.) If God be the Creator and cause of all, then we must remember that all His works are good; and therefore nothing must be hated by us that He hath made, considered in its native goodness. God hateth sin, and so must we: for that He made it not (Rev. ii. 6; Ps. xlv. 7; Isa. i. 14). And He hateth all the workers of iniquity as such (Ps. v. 5); and so must we, but we must love all of God that is in them, and love them for it. That is somewhat good and amiable in every creature; yea, all of it, that is of God. Though toads and serpents are odious to us, because they are hurtful, and seem deformed in themselves, yet are they good in themselves, and not deformed as parts of the universe; but good unto the common end. The wants in the wheels of your watch are as useful to the motion as the solid parts. The night is part of the useful order of the creation as well as the day. The vacant interspace in your writing is needful as well as the words; every letter should not be a vowel, nor every character a capital; every member should not be a heart, or head, or eye; nor should every one in a commonwealth be a king, or lord: So in the creation the parts that seem base are useful in their places, and good unto their ends. Let us not, therefore, vilify or detest the works of God, but study the excellences of them, and see, and admire, and love them as they are of God.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1501.) He that considers how little our constitution can bear a remove into parts of this air not much higher than we breathe in, will be satisfied that the All-Wise Architect has suited our organs and the bodies that are to affect them, one to another.

—Locke.

3. Its inequalities are not imperfections.

(1502.) God determined His power by His wisdom, and although His absolute power could have made every creature better, yet His ordinate power, which in every step was regulated by His wisdom, made everything best for its designed intention. A musician has a power to wind up a string on a lute to a higher and more perfect note in itself; but in wisdom he will not do it, because the intended melody would be disturbed thereby if it were not suited to the other strings on the instrument; a discord would mar and taint the harmony which the lutenist designed. God in creation observed the proportions of nature; He can make a spider as strong as a lion, but, according to the order of nature which He has settled, it is not convenient that a creature of so small a compass should be as strong as one of a greater bulk. God's power is always regulated by His wisdom and will, and though it produces not what is most perfect in itself, yet what is most perfect and decent in relation to the end He fixed.

—Charnock, 1628-1680.

(1503.) It is true, indeed, that there are degrees of perfection in the creatures, and God is not equally good to all of them. Those creatures which are of more noble and excellent natures, and to which He hath communicated more degrees of perfection, they partake more of His goodness, and are more glorious instances of it; but every creature partakes of the Divine goodness in a certain degree, and according to the nature and capacity of it. God, if He pleased, could have made nothing but immortal spirits; and He could have made as many of these as there are individual creatures of all sorts in the world; but it seemed good to the wise Architect, to make several ranks and orders of beings, and to display His power, and goodness, and wisdom, in all imaginable variety of creatures, all of which should be good in their kind, though far short of the perfection of angels and immortal spirits.

He that will build a house for all the uses and purposes of which a house is capable, cannot make it all foundation, and great beams and pillars; must not so contrive it, as to make all rooms of state and entertainment; but there must of necessity be in it meaner materials, rooms and offices for several uses and purposes, which, however inferior to the rest in dignity and degree, do yet contribute to the beauty and advantage of the whole. So in this great frame of the world, it was fit there should be variety and different degrees of perfection in the several parts of it; and this is so far from being an impeachment of the wisdom or goodness of Him that made it, that it is an evidence of both.

—Tillotson, 1630-1694.

4. In what spirit it is to be studied.

(1504.) You must carefully note, that the dependence of the creature on God, is not to be fully manifested by the dependence of any creature upon another. The line is locally distant from the centre; and the streams are locally distant from the spring, though they are contiguous, and have the dependency of an effect. But God is not local, and so not locally distant from us. The nearest similitude is that of the body's dependence on the soul (which yet doth fall exceeding short). In God both we and every creature do live, and move, and have our being. As no man of reason will talk to a corpse, nor dwell and converse with any man merely as corporeal, without respect to the soul that doth animate him, nor will he fall in love with a corpse; so no man that is spiritually wise (so far as he is so) will once look upon any creature, much less converse with it, or fall in love with it, barely as a creature, conceiving it as a thing that is separated from God, or not positively conceiving of God as animating it, and as being its Alpha and Omega, its beginning and end, its principal efficient, and ultimate final cause, at least. For this were to imagine the carcase of a creature, and to conceive of it as such a thing as is not in being. For out of the God of nature the creature is nothing, nor can do anything; for there is no such thing; even as out of Christ the Lord of spiritual life and grace the new creature is nothing, and we can do nothing; for there is no such new creature.

You have here the very difference between a carnal and a spiritual life. The carnal man doth see only the carcase of the world, and is blind to God, and seeth not Him, when he seeth that which is animated by Him. But the spiritual man seeth God in and by the creature, and the creature is nothing to him, but in God. As an illiterate man doth look upon a book, and seeth only the letters, and taketh pleasure in their shape and order, and falls a playing with it as children do; but he seeth not, nor understands the sense; and, therefore if it contained the most noble mysteries of the greatest promises, even such as his life did depend upon, he loveth it not in any such respect; nor doth he for that delight in it: but let a learned man have the perusing of the same book, and though he may commend the clearness of the character, yet it is the sense that he principally observeth, and the sense that he loveth, and the sense that he delighteth in; and, therefore, as the sense is incomparably more excellent than the character simply considered, so it is a higher and more excellent kind of knowledge and delight which he hath in the book, than that which the illiterate hath. And indeed it is an imaginary annihilation of the book, and of every character of it formally considered, to conceive of it as separated from the sense; for the very essence of it is to be a sign of that sense; and, therefore, as the illiterate cannot see the sense of words and letters, the wood for trees, so the literate can see no such thing as words without sense, nor would regard the materials but for this signifying use.

I have expressed the similitude in more words than I use in such cases, because it much illustrateth our present matter. It was never the mind of God to make the great body of this world to stand as a separated thing, or to be an idol. He made all this for Himself. The whole creation is one entire volume, and the sense of every line is God. His name is legible on every creature, and he that seeth not God in all, understandeth not the sense of the creation. As it is eternal life to know God, so this God is the life of the creature which we know, and the knowing of Him in it is the life of all our knowledge. The illiterate world doth gaze upon the creatures, and fall in love with the outside and materials, and play with it, but understandeth not a creature. By separating it in their apprehensions from God, the sense, they do annihilate the world to themselves, as to its principal use and significance.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1505.) When I was in the galleries of Oxford, I saw many of the designs of Raphael and Michael Angelo. I looked upon them with reverence, and took up such of them as I was permitted to touch as one would take up a love token. It seemed to me these sketches brought me nearer the great masters than their finished pictures could have done, because therein I saw the minds' processes as they were first born. They were the first salient points of the inspiration. Could I have brought them home with me, how rich I should have been! how envied for their possession! Now, there are open and free to us, every day of our lives, the designs of a greater than Raphael or Michael Angelo. God, of whom the noblest master is but a feeble imitator, is sketching and painting every hour the most wondrous pictures—not hoarded in any gallery, but spread in light and shadow round the whole earth, and glowing for us in the overhanging skies.
—Becher.

(1506.) I have in my house, a little sheet of paper on which there is a faint, pale, and not particularly skillful representation of a hyacinth. It is not half as beautiful as many other pictures I have, but I regard it as the most exquisite of them all. My mother painted it; and I never see it that I do not think that her hand rested on it, and that her thought was concerned in its execution.

Now, suppose you had such a conception of God that you never saw a flower, a tree, a cloud, or any natural object, that you did not instantly think, "My Father made it," what a natural world would this become to you! How beautiful would the earth seem to you! And how would you find that nature was a revelation of God, speaking as plainly as His written Word! And if you are alone, in solitude, without company, desolate in your circumstances, it is because you have not that inner sense of the Divine love and care, which it is your privilege to have, and which you ought to have.

—Becher.

6. "Lo, these are parts of His ways; but how little a portion is heard of Him!"

(1507.) It is probable that there may be some peculiar manifestations of the character and government of God in each one of the worlds that He has made. I mean, that, in the countless numbers of worlds which He has called into existence, there may be that to be learned about God on any one of them which could be learned on no other; that each has its own history, its own vegetable, animal, or mineral arrangement; and perhaps that each may have some one great lesson to teach to all other worlds about the moral government of the Creator. There are indeed certain great lessons which would be common to all—for all make known the same God; but in the endless variety everywhere manifested, it is to be presumed that new views would be unfolded in different parts of the universe respecting the Creator. In the floral department of the kingdom of nature on our own globe, for example, there would be everywhere discerned proofs of the existence of the same God, and of the same attributes of wisdom, power, and goodness, but, in travelling from pole to pole, through the various zones, on hills and through valleys, in lawns and meadows, in journeying in Persia, at the Cape of Good Hope, on the prairie, in the profused and varied vegetation of the tropics, or in the cold of the north, where the lonely flower springs up beside the bank of snow, how varied is the view; how new are the lessons taught; how the mind is kept intensely active in its admiration of a God who is "wonderful in working." A similar thing on a much grander scale, it is probable, occurs in the endless variety of worlds which God has strewed over the heavens.

—Barnes, 1798-1870.

CURIOSITY.

1. Its folly.

(1508.) It is a great sign of knowledge not to be curious about everything, nor to wish to know all things. And if you will allow me, I will explain myself by an example.

Let us suppose a river, or rather rivers (I ask no allowance, I only speak of what rivers really are), all are not of the same depth. Some have a shallow bed, others one deep enough to drown one unacquainted with it. In one part there are whirlpools, and not in another. It is good, therefore, to forbear to make trial of all, and it is no small proof of knowledge not to wish to sound all the depths; whereas he who would venture on every part of the river is really most ignorant of the peculiar nature of rivers, and will be often in danger of perishing, from venturing into the deeper parts with the same boldness with which he crossed the shallows.

So it is in the things of God. He that will know all things, and ventures to intrude into everything, he it is that is most ignorant what God is. And of rivers, indeed, the greater part is safe, and the depths and whirlpools few, but with respect to the things of God, the greater part is hidden, and it is not possible to trace out His works. Why then art thou bent on drowning thyself in those depths?

—Chrysostom, 347-407.

(1509.) He that would comprehend all things, apprehends nothing. As he that comes to a corn heap, the more he opens his hand to take, the less he graspeth, the less he holdeth. Where the Scripture hath no tongue, we should have no ear.

—Adams, 1653.

(1510.) Why do we study that which is impossible to learn? What kind of fruit soever that was for which our first parents sold their birthright in Paradise, I am sure there was not juice enough in it to quench that hot thirst of forbidden knowledge which they imparted to their posterity. But that which only distempered Adam's taste is now become inherent in mankind; that the more they know, the more they desire; and the admitting them to one secret, doth but hearten them on to seek for another. We all take after Eve, and setting our shoulders to the very portals of God's privy chamber, in we must go, and be made acquainted with the Divine counsel.

—Adams, 1653.

(1511.) The way to make us mere fools, is to affect to know more than God would have us.

Adam's tree of knowledge made him and his posterity fools. Curiosity was the bait, whereby the devil caught our first parents, and undid us all.

—Brooks, 1680.

2. Its perilousness.

(1512.) Men may soon be too bold with hidden mysteries; he that modestly looks upon the sun, sees a glorious torch, and receives a comfortable light; but he that fixeth his eyes too earnestly upon it, is struck blind; and because he will see more than he should, comes in the end to see nothing at all.

—Adams, 1653.

(1513.) He that pryeth into every cloud may be stricken with a thunderbolt.

—Eliza Cook.

3. Its injuriousness.

(1514.) (On the sight of a fly burning itself in the candle).—Wise Solomon says, The light is a pleasant thing; and so certainly it is; but there is no true outward light which proceeds not from fire. The light of that fire then is not more pleasing than the fire of that light is dangerous: and that pleasure doth not more draw on our sight than that danger forbids our approach. How foolish is the fly that, in a love and admiration of this light, will know no distance; but puts itself heedlessly into that flame, wherein it perishes! How many bouts it fetched, every one nearer than other, ere it made this last venture, and now that merciless fire, taking no notice of the affection of an over-fond client, hath suddenly consumed it.

Thus do those bold and busy spirits, who will needs draw too near unto that inaccessible light, and look unto things too wonderful for them: so long do they hover about the secret counsels of the Almighty, till the wings of their presumptuous conceits be scorched; and their daring curiosity hath paid them with everlasting destruction.

O Lord, let me be blessed with the knowledge of what Thou hast revealed: let me content myself to adore Thy Divine Wisdom, in what Thou hast not revealed. So let me enjoy Thy light, that I may avoid Thy fire.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(1515.) Nothing wraps a man in such a mist of errors as his own curiosity in searching things beyond him. How happily do they live that know nothing but what is necessary! Our knowledge does but show us our ignorance. Our most studious scrutiny is but a discovery of what we cannot know. We see the effect, but cannot guess at the cause. Learning is like a river, whose head being far in the land, is, at first rising, little and easily viewed; but still, as you go, it gapes with a wider bank: not without pleasure, and delightful winding; while it is still on both sides set with trees, and the beauties of various flowers; but still, the further you follow it, the deeper and the broader it is; till, at last, it enwaves itself in the unfathomed ocean. There you see more water; but no shore, no end of that liquid, fluid vastness. In many things we sound nature, in the shallows of her revelations: we may trace her to her second causes; but beyond them we meet with nothing but the puzzle of the soul and the dazzle of the mind's dim eyes. While we speak of things that are, that we may dissect, and have power and means to find the causes, there is some pleasure, some certainty; but when we come to metaphysics, to long-buried antiquity, and unto unrevealed divinity, we are in a sea which is deeper than the short reach of the life of man. Much may be gained by studious inquisition; but much more will ever rest, which man cannot discover.

—Felltham, 1668, p. 66.

(1516.) I think that faith and much thinking do not dwell well together; not in religion alone. I do not think it does to think too much in friendship. Let a child think about all the things he sees his father and mother do, and see if he loves them any better after that. Let a friend go about insisting upon reducing all feelings and instincts to thoughts, and strive to understand the nature of emotion by thinking—let him, instead of giving liberty in his heart, go to applying his philosophy to his friends, and see if he will stand nobler in friendship or not. Let him go out into the realm of thinking about eternal things, and it would be just as foolish. Let a man begin to study the relations of the race to God's government, and all the mutations of government, all natural and civil law, and all the ten thousand questions that rise up before the mind that thinks and is inquisitive of such thoughts as these, and the fact is that ideas, stars, land, sea, everything—the more a man thinks upon them, the less is he strong, and the more is he enervated. The great depths give up their mists, and these banks of white silver hue are hid in the fog. There are hours when it seems as though everything is swept away from us; that there is no heaven, that it is all fancy and a dream; that there is no responsibility; that there is no such thing as sin and virtue; that we are all so many animals, we are all following the instincts and circumstances that press without us; there is no God, or He would speak, or certainly He would give us some token in our extreme anguish that He is near; there would be some dawn of light. There are a great many men who strive to explain these doubts by reference to the natural laws, but no man has followed this line of thought to any satisfaction. There are a great many happy, genial, and hopeful theologians that think at last they have got up early enough to find out God, and so in every generation you will find a man that explains everything. He does until the next man kicks it, and it all goes back to dust again. When you shall chain the waves of the sea that they shall not rise any more; when you shall fasten in the tops of the forest the winds that rock them, that make them sigh their dirges in winter and sing their anthems in summer; when you shall stay the courses of the stars and bind the earth that it shall not roll in its orbit, then you may take these great questions, and, by the bands of your thought and by the cords of your philosophy you may fasten them; but so long as you cannot do that, so long will they have free course. And so with the thoughts of man. There must needs come hours when a man finds himself quite drifted away from his old thoughts. Contagious hours they are, hours of great trouble, awakening hours of philosophy and of doubt.

In such hours as this there is nothing for it but to run, and there is but one way to run, and that is Godward. A man in these hours that does not run for God, should run for the lunatic asylum. There is but one way in which a man can find any rest, and that is to say blindly but desperately, "There is a Thinker, there is a Controller, and if men have not drawn His lineaments right, and if the portraiture of the books is not right, one thing I know, my soul proclaims there is goodness and wisdom, there is control. Whatever it is I seize it, I hold by an anchor to that blessed hope." The very moment a man begins to hold by that, sometimes, as by an electric touch, the clouds fade away, the sweet beaming face of Christ shines again, and all the mists have gone as sometimes you have seen them in the morning disappear, you know not how; we are bright again and have joy in Christ, and in all the blessed promises of His Word; and the miracles recorded there are not half as marvellous as the miracles wrought in the sweet experience of Christians every day.

—Becher.

4. Its sinfulness.

(1517.) As the Egyptian who carried somewhat wound up in his napkin, answered unto him that demanded what it was, that he had covered it to the end that no man should see it: so, likewise, must we learn, that if there be anything hidden and laid up in the works of God it is of purpose kept from us, to the end that we should not be too curious to inquire after it, that it is far better to be utterly ignorant herein than to have all the knowledge thereof that may be.
—Cawdray, 1609.

(1518.) As there is a foolish wisdom, so there is a wise ignorance; in not prying into God's ark, not inquiring into things not revealed. I would fain know all that I need, and all that I may: I leave God's secrets to Himself. It is happy for me that God makes me of His Court though not of His Council.
—Hall, 1574-1656.

CUSTOM.

1. Defined.

(1519.) It is to be observed that at the present day it is common to use the words "custom" and "habit" as synonymous, and often to employ the latter where Bacon would have used the former. But, strictly speaking, they denote respectively the cause and the effect. Repeated acts constitute the "custom;" and the "habit" is the condition of mind or body thence resulting. For instance, a man who has been accustomed to rise at a certain hour will have acquired the habit of waking and being ready to rise as soon as that hour arrives. And one who has made it his custom to drink drams will have fallen into the habit of craving for that stimulus, and of yielding to that craving; and so of the rest.
—Whately.

2. Reveals character.

(1520.) A man is known by his custom and the course of his endeavours what is his business. If a man be constantly, easily, and frequently carried away to sin, it discovers a habit of soul and the temper of his heart. Meadows may be overflowed, but marsh ground is drowned with the return of every tide. A child of God may be carried away, and act contrary to the bent and inclination of the new nature; but when men are drowned and overcome with the return of every temptation, and carried away, it argues a habit of sin.
—Manton, 1620-1667.

3. Not the standard of right.

(1521.) "Know that the Lord has set apart him that is godly for Himself." Therefore it is no excuse for him to say, "I do but as others do." He is to reckon his hours by the sun, not the town clock; to take God's direction, not the vice of the multitudes, as one of their stamp and at liberty to comply with their fashions.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(1522.) Custom in moral practices becomes law to men, by pressing upon their modesty, and by outfacings truth and piety. So that unless the custom have warranty from the law, it has the same effect against the law as for it; and, therefore, in such cases, is at no hand to be trusted, but at every hand to be suspected, lest it make it necessary that men become vicious. The customs of the German and neighbouring nations so expound the laws of Christ concerning temperance, that if by their measures it be defined, it looks so like intemperance as milk to milk. And the common customs of the world so expound all the laws of the blessed Jesus, so as to be truly obligatory at no time, but in the danger, or in the article of death. But certainly it is but an ill gloss that evacuates all the holy purposes of the commandment; and at the day of judgment, when we shall see numberless numbers of the damned hurried to their sad sufferings, it will be but an ill apology to say, "I did as all the world almost beside me, by whose customs I understood the laws of the gospel to a sense of ease and gentleness, and not by the severity of a few morose preachers." Poggius tells us of a Neapolitan shepherd, that against Easter, going to confession, he told his confessor with a tender conscience and great sorrow of heart, that he had broken the holy feast of Lent, by chance indeed, but yet with some little pleasure; for when he was pressing of a new cheese, some of the whey start from the vessel and leaped into his mouth, and so went into his stomach. The priest, smiling a little at the phantasmic conscience of the man, asked him if he was guilty of nothing else. The shepherd saying, "he knew of nothing else that did or ought to trouble him;" his confessor knowing the customs of those people upon the mountains of Naples, asked him if he had never robbed or killed any stranger passengers. "Oh yes," replied the shepherd, "I have been often at that employment; but that we do every day, and always did so, and I hope that is no sin." But the cheese, the forbidden cheese stuck in his stomach, because every one did abominate such meat upon fasting-days; only the custom of killing and stealing had hardened his heart and forehead, till it was not perceived.

—Jeremy Taylor, 1612-1667.

4. No excuse for sin.

(1523.) It is said of a prisoner, that, standing at the bar, indicted for felony, he was asked by the judge what he could say for himself. "Truly, my lord," says he, "I did mean no hurt when I stole; it is an evil custom that I have gotten; I have been used to it ever since I knew anything." "Why, then," says the judge, "if it be thy custom to steal, it is my custom to hang up thieves." So, if it be any man's custom to swear upon every slight occasion, it is God's custom not to hold them guiltless that take His name in vain. Is it any man's custom to whore and be drunk, it is God's custom to judge them. Whatsoever the sin be, there is no pleading of custom to excuse it—as, that they meant no harm, it was against their will,

&c. All the fig leaves that can be gathered, and sewed never so close, will not hide their nakedness from the eyes of heaven; God will certainly bring them to judgment.

—Fawcett.

(1524.) Our business is not to look to what men do, but to what God speaketh. It is highly derogatory to the Supreme Being to make the examples of men, and not His commands, the rule of our lives. The examples of murderers, thieves, drunkards, swearers, are of as much force against the good and wholesome law of a prince, as the irreligious examples of any men are against the holy and righteous laws of God. A judge would deride the malefactor's plea that should say, "It is true I have broken the king's laws, but have done no more than such an esquire, or knight, or lord; I have but imitated them therein." Or that should say, "I was guilty of such treasons, but I joined with many other traitors; I had good store of company with me." And dost thou think, reader, the Judge of quick and dead, when He shall arraign thee for thine unchangeable estate, and demand of thee why thou omittedst the duties He enjoined thee, will accept thy plea when thou shalt say, "It is true, Lord, I did live without Scripture or prayer in my family, but such and such great men who lived near me did so as well as I; I wrote after their copies, and thought it would be well enough to do as they did." Or when thou shalt say, "Lord, though I neglected Thy worship and service, I followed therein almost all the town and parish where I lived, and I judged it best to imitate the most." Canst thou imagine that such a silly, simple excuse will bear any weight? Thou wilt not take such a pitiful plea from any child or servant in thy family. If thy child, when reproved by thee for drunkenness, or thieving, or disobeying thy commands, should excuse himself and say, "Sir, other men's sons are as bad as I; such a gentleman's sons are worse; the children of very many meet and join with me in all my drinking, stealing, and debauched courses. How ill would such an answer sound in thine ears! Or what wouldst thou think if thy servant, instead of doing the work appointed him, should run from alehouse to alehouse, and spend his time in carling and dicing, and then excuse it to thee that he did as others did; there were many beside himself, and some of quality who were examples to him? Consider how poor, how pitiful, how irrational a plea it is to excuse thy disobedience to God by thy imitation of irreligious men; and do not think that the great God will take that excuse from thee which thou wilt not from a child or servant.

—Swinnock, 1673.

(1525.) "Follow not a multitude to do evil." Examples are not our warrant, but precepts. Neither will it procure a man a discharge, because he had a precedent in his sin. Adam indeed said the woman gave him the apple, but it did not excuse him from paying the reckoning with her; she was indeed first in the transgression, yet both met in the punishment. Wouldst thou eat poison, because another dares be so bold to be thy taster? Surely his example cannot make the poison less deadly to thee that dost pledge him.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1526.) Remember, I beseech you, that your custom is the aggravation of your sins, and not any just excuse. What, if you had taken a custom of spitting in the face of your own father or dearest friend, or any way abusing him, would you think it good excuse for you to continue it, because you are accustomed to it? Why, the oftener you have sinned, the oftener you have wronged God; and the oftener you have wronged Him, the more should you now bewail it, and not therefore go on to wrong Him more. If you had oftentimes hurt yourselves by falls, or cut your fingers by negligence or carelessness, will you do so still to keep a custom? What greater madness can there be than to plead custom for sinning against the living God, and hastening your own souls to everlasting perdition? You shall have custom for suffering then, as you have for sinning now, and see whether you will therefore love your suffering. If you will love sin because you are accustomed to it, you shall try whether you can love hell because you are accustomed to it.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

8. Hardens men in sin.

(1527.) Look but upon a youth when he comes first to be an apprentice to some artificer or handicraft trade: his hand is tender, and no sooner is he set to work but it blisters, so that he is much pained thereby; but when he hath continued some time at work then his hand hardens, and he goes on without any grievance at all. It is just thus with a sinner: before he be accustomed to any evil way, conscience is tender and full of remorse, like a queazy stomach, ready to keck (vomit) at the least thing that is offensive; oh, but a continued custom, and making a trade of sin, that is it which makes the conscience to be hard and brawny, able to feel nothing. As it is in a smith's forge, a dog that comes newly in cannot endure the fiery sparks to fly about his ears, but being once used to it he sleeps securely: so, let wicked men be long used to the devil's workhouse, to be slaves and vassals to sin, the sparks of hell-fire may fly about them, and the fire of hell flash upon their souls, yet never trouble them, never disturb them at all; and all this ariseth from a continued custom in a course of evil.

—Sedgwood, 1644.

9. Its blinding influence.

(1528.) We are so accustomed to see sin within and without us, that we seldom deeply feel it, or are so shocked at it as we should be were it less frequent. If an inhabitant of the Court were to walk through some of the filthy streets and alleys of the metropolis, how would he be disgusted and terrified, while the poor wretches who live in them think nothing of the matter!

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(1529.) Custom will often blind one to the good as well as to the evil effects of any long-established system.

—Whately, 1787-1863.

7. Its power grows continually.

(1530.) Custom is a violent and treacherous schoolmistress. She, by little and little, slyly and unperceived, slips in the foot of her authority, but having by this gentle and humble beginning, with the benefit of time fixed and established it, she then unmasks a furious and tyrannic countenance, against which we have no more the courage or the power so much as to lift up our eyes.

—Montaigne.

8. Wrong customs should therefore be broken abruptly.

(1531.) Be not too slow in the breaking off a sinful custom. A quick courageous resolution is better than a gradual deliberation. In such a combat he is the bravest soldier that lays about him without fear or wit. Wit pleads; fear disheartens; he that would kill Hydra had better strike off one neck than five heads. Fell the tree, and the branches are soon cut off.

—Quarles, 1592-1644.

9. Secret of the power of social customs.

(1532.) Of all tyrants custom is that which to sustain itself stands most in need of the opinion which is entertained of its power; its only strength lies in that which is attributed to it. A single attempt to break the yoke soon shows us its fragility. But the chief property of custom is to contract our ideas, like our movements, within the circle it has traced for us; it governs us by the terror it inspires for any new and untried condition. It shows us the walls of the prison within which we are enclosed, as the boundary of the world; beyond that all is undefined, confusion, chaos; it almost seems as though we should not have air to breathe —Guizot.

10. Innocent customs should be complied with.

(1533.) There is a respect due to mankind which should incline even the wisest of men to follow innocent customs.

—Watts, 1674-1748.

DEATH.

1. IN RELATION TO ALL MANKIND.

1. Its nature.

(1534.) As we have but imperfect notions of the relations and differences between life and death, our Saviour, when He was about to raise a maid to life, said to those who were present, The damsel is not dead but sleepeth. He did not say, "She is dead, and I will raise her to life;" but, "She is asleep:" whence it was to be inferred that she would awake. They who were not skilled in the Divine language of signs and figures laughed Him to scorn, as if He had spoken in ignorance what was expressed with consummate truth and wisdom: for the substitution of sleep for death, when we have it upon such great authority, has the force of a whole sermon in a single word, and is a seed from whence a tree of life may be unfolded.

—Jones of Nayland.

(1535.) Death is but the line at which the little stream of life merges into the great ocean of eternity. Death is but a turning point in the endless path of our existence.

2. It is our common doom.

(1536.) As many as came of the first man must lay down their necks. Death is an indifferent judge, regardeth no person, hath no pity on the fatherless, careth not for the poor, dispenseth not with the rich, feareth not the mighty, passeth not for the noble, honoureth not the aged, spareth not the wise, pardoneth not the foolish. For like as a river is poisoned in the well-spring, or fountain, so was the nature of man altogether in our first parents. And forasmuch as they themselves were naimed through sin, they have begotten upright and mortal children. Touching this saith Paul: "By one man came death upon all men."

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(1537.) The heathen usually compared the sons of Adam to counters, the game at chess, and stage plays, because that counters have their several places and use for a time, but in the end they are jumbled into a heap. In a game at chess, some are kings, some bishops, some knights, &c., but after a while, they all go into the same bag. On the stage, one is in his rags, another in his robes; one is the master, another is the man; and very busy they be, but in the end, the play ends, the bravery ends, and each returns to his place. Such is the estate of man. The man lives not that shall not see death, be he king with Saul, a prophet with Jeremiah, a wise Solomon, a foolish Nabal, a holy Isaac, a profane Esau: be he of what rank soever, he must die—nay, let there be a concurrence of all in one, let Samuel, both a good man, a good minister, and a good magistrate, have as many privileges as are incident to a man, yet can he not procure a protection against death.

—Harris, 1578-1658.

3. It is inevitable.

(1538.) God, to prevent all escape, hath sown the seeds of death in our very constitution and nature, so that we can as soon run from our selves, as run from death. We need no feller to come with a hand of violence, and hew us down; there is in the tree a worm, which grows out of its own substance, that will destroy it; so in us, those infirmities of nature that will bring us down to the dust.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

4. It is a theme of universal interest.

(1539.) The truth of it is, there is nothing in history which is so improving to the reader as those accounts which we meet with of the deaths of eminent persons and of their behaviour in that dreadful season. I may also add that there are no parts in history which affect and please the reader in so sensible a manner. The reason I take to be this: there is no other single circumstance in the story of any person, which can possibly be the case of every one who reads it. A battle or a triumph are conjunctures in which not one man in a million is likely to be engaged; but when we see a person at the point of death, we cannot forbear being attentive to everything he says or does, because we are sure that some time or other we shall ourselves be in the same melancholy circumstances. The general, the statesman, or the philosopher, are perhaps characters which we may never act in, but the dying man is one whom, sooner or later, we shall certainly resemble.

—Addison, 1672-1719.

5. Its nearness.

(1540.) There is not far from youth that hidden certainty of death. I am speaking to some that I shall never speak to again. You are marked. You are going away, and my eye shall never rest on you again. There are some of you within a handbreadth of the grave, and yet it doth not appear who it is. If I were to say that some sharpshooter, hidden, would launch the fated bullet into the midst of this assembly, with what terror would the whole of you rise? and yet death stands with bow drawn back to the uttermost, and that arrow is just on the string that will speed to some of you.

—Becker.

(1541.) We put far away the evil day; and therefore we are not duly impressed by the thought. But fourscore years are soon cut off, and we flee away; and how uncertain is our reaching that lonely verge of life, where the flowery meadows and the golden corn-fields slope gradually down into the bare and stony beach that fringes the eternal sea. The coast of death to most is an abrupt precipice; we are cut off in the midst of our days.

—Macmillan.

(1542.) In a noble passage, Isaiah tell us, how all flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof as the flower of the field. And does not every week, each passing day, and fleeting hour, illustrate that solemn truth? Death lays his sharp scythe in among the grass; and to his stride and sweeping arm it falls in long, broad swathes. I have seen the reapers in the harvest-field sit down on the fallen sheaves of corn to wipe the sweat from their sun-browned brows, and, pausing from work, rest awhile; but who ever saw this grim reaper sitting on the tombstones or green hillocks of the grave, to rest himself and repair his strength? Of Death it may be said, as of God, "He sleeps not, neither is weary." See how he advances on us—every day the nearer, as before an eye that expresses no pity, and an arm that is never weary, and a scythe that never blunts, fall the tallest grass and fairest flowers! "All flesh is grass!" A few years more and these sparkling eyes shall be quenched in death; a shroud around every form; on every lip the seal of dusty death; and all of us lying beneath the grassy sod, mouldering in the grave—saved, or unsaved—the never-dying soul in heaven, or in hell.

—Guthrie.

6. Its period is uncertain.

(1543.) The whole foliage of a tree does not fade and pass away at one time. Some leaves droop and wither even in spring, when the rest of the foliage is in its brightest and most luxuriant beauty. Some are torn away in summer, while green and full of sap, by sudden and violent storms. The great majority fade and fall in autumn; while a few cling to the branches all through the cold and desolation of winter, and are at last pushed off by the unfolding buds of the following spring. There is no tree, however green and healthy, but has a withered discoloured leaf upon it, ready to drop off at the slightest touch of the breeze. There is no group of flowers so perfect but one or more is faded. Watch the blossoming of one of those plants whose flowers grow in spikes or racemes, and you will find that the lowest blossoms unfold and perish, one by one, as those higher up the stem are beginning to expand; so that on the same stalk, you have opening buds, perfect flowers, and brown and withered—a mixed state of things, surely deeply suggestive to every thoughtful mind. Look at the foliage of a tree at any season, and you will not fail to find the same thing—death—in the midst of life—sere and yellow decay streaking the bright greenness and beauty of health. And is it not so with every human generation? Decay and death everywhere, and always, reign. But all do not fade at the same time. Some die in the spring of life; some are cut off suddenly, by accidents and fatal diseases, in ripe manhood; some fade naturally in the autumn of old age. A few survive their generation, like the last red leaves that rustle mournfully in the winter wind on the topmost bough of the tree, the sole relics of the luxuriant foliage that basked in the sunshine, and sang in the breeze of summer. Melancholy indeed is the lot of these aged patriots. Their tent of life is a solitary object in a dreary and lifeless desert. Pilgrims and strangers on earth, they linger alone; whilst all those who began the journey of life with them have folded their tents and gone away, and Ichabod, "the glory is departed," is written upon everything.

—Macmillan.

7. It steals upon us without warning.

(1544.) Death carries off a man who is gathering flowers and whose mind is distracted, as a flood carries off a sleeping village.

—Buddha.

(1545.) Though we live never so long, we are still surprised: we put the evil day far from us, and then it catches us unawares, and we tremble at the prospect.

—Wake, 1657-1737.

(1546.) All the processes of nature are silent and secret. It is God's glory to conceal a matter. As He veiled His wondrous working for the Israelites at the Red Sea with the cloud of night; and the dawn only revealed the completed miracle: so in the field of nature He reveals to us not processes, but results. Spring steals imperceptibly upon the earth, and we are startled, like men that dreamed, by the sudden revelation of green leaves and balmy skies almost amid the gloom and snow of winter. The bud expands into the full-blown rose, but the unfolding is done in secret; the star of evening sparkles like a tear in the spot where the sunset died, but no one marked its falling from the dewy eye of heaven. And as with the glory, so with the decay, of nature. We know the passage of the seasons only by their changes. The precise moment when nature has reached its culminating point, and must descend when her embroidered web has been woven—and must be unravelled—is shrouded in mystery. No boundary line separates the season of life from the season of death; the full vigour and perfection of summer from the feebleness and languor of autumn; at least, none that can be marked by the ordinary senses of man. To-day the forest is green and luxuriant; to-morrow it is faded and desolate. One by one the leaves become discoloured and drop off; but we cannot trace the insidious progress of the blight from its commencement to its consummation, and the first notice we have of the change is the hectic hue upon their surface. Some of them fade before others, but we cannot tell why; there is no mark to point them out, and when all the foliage is waving and murmuring in the summer breeze, we cannot indicate which leaf of all the rich green crowd will be the first to wear the impress of decay. Thus fades the leaf, and so silently do we all fade. The king of terrors comes with a noiseless step, shod with wool, stealthily, silently, with bated breath; he is not seen, he is not heard, he is not suspected; till all at once his cold shadow falls upon us, and his dark form stands between us and the light of the living world. We die daily, but the bark still continues fresh and the leaf green; and we know not the progress of the hidden mortality. We bear the seal of death ere we are conscious of it; and we become aware of our doom only when the gradual secret fading of the bloom on the cheek, and the brightness in the eye, and the vigour in the frame, has reached its final palpable stage. No awful handwriting appears on the wall, telling us in the midst of our rejoicings, as it told Belshazzar, its "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin;" no solemn message from the unseen world comes to us, as it once came to Hezekiah; "Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die and not live." Before the work of death begins, we know not which of our friends and acquaintances will pass away soonest. It may be the old and grey-haired, who have nothing left to live or hope for in the world; it may be the sick who have lingered long on the perilous edge of death, and whose life has been endurance not enjoyment; or it may be the young and healthy, to whom death is a far-off cloud, no bigger than a man's hand, casting no shadow on their sunny horizon. It may be the fragrant rose or the thorny weed; the fruitful vine or the barren fig-tree, the heavenly-minded Christian or the worldly-hearted professor. Who is to be the first to receive the message to pass hence? We know not; an awful uncertainty rests upon that.

—Macmillan.

8. We die daily.

(1547.) When we are born we get as it were so much life given us: we get a reservoir filled with life; day by day we draw so much from it; day by day we use up so much of it: and it is plain enough that the more we draw from it, the less is left. We know how much we have taken from that receptacle, that store of life; but we cannot tell how much remains. There may be very little there to our account: we may have got very near the end of the amount we had to start with; and some day, not long hence, we may find that we have fairly reached the end of it all. But is it not plain enough, that our dying is spread over all the time through which we are exhausting the springs of life? We speak of it as a future thing: we speak of dying as if it were all concentrated on the little point, when the last drop of life shall be drained, and the fountain fairly sunk to the ground and finished. Why, look to any piece of machinery employed by man. The very first day's use of it is so much towards its destruction. It is the daily wear that wears it out. The wearing out is not all gathered upon that closing day, when at last you find it is past working or mending, and throw it finally aside. It is not the last day the locomotive runs that wears it out: the very first on which it darted away with its train of human beings or its hundreds of tons of merchandise, did just as much towards its final wearing out as the last on which, a battered weather-beaten thing, it ran its last crazy race. Now, our bodies are just such machines; and like everything that wears out at all, it is by their daily work they wear out. Every exertion we take out of them leaves so much less behind; every pulse that beats in them is a reason against the next pulse's beating; every breath we draw makes it less likely that we shall draw another; and thus, by the daily consumption of our life, we "die daily."

—Boyd.

9. Its terrors.

(1548.) In death itself there can be nothing terrible, for the act of death annihilates sensation; but there are many roads to death, and some of them justly formidable, even to the bravest; but so various are the modes of going out of the world, that to be born may have been a more painful thing than to die, and to live may prove a more troublesome thing than either.

—Colton, 1832.

(1549.) Another pang which belongs to death, we find in the sensation of loneliness which attaches to it. Have we ever seen a ship preparing to sail with its load of pauper emigrants to a distant colony? If we have, we know what that desolation is which comes from feeling unfriended on a new and untried excursion. All beyond the seas, to the ignorant poor man, is a strange land. They are going away from the helps, and the friendships, and the companionships of life, scarcely knowing what is before them. And it is in such a moment, when a man stands upon a deck, taking his last look of his fatherland, that there comes upon him a sensation new, strange, and inexpressibly miserable—the feeling of being alone in the world.

Brethren, with all the bitterness of such a moment, it is but a feeble image when placed by the side of the loneliness of death. We die alone. We go on our dark mysterious journey for the first time in all existence, without one to accompany us. Friends are beside our bed, they must stay behind. Grant that a Christian has something like familiarity with the Most High, that breaks this solitary feeling; but what is it with the mass of men? It is a question full of loneliness to them. What is it they are to see? What are they to meet? Is it not true, that, to the larger number of this congregation, there is no one point in all eternity on which the eye can fix distinctly, and rest gladly—nothing beyond the grave, except a dark space into which they must plunge?

—F. W. Robertson, 1816-1853.

10. Its influence.

(1550.) The darkness of death is like the evening twilight: it makes all objects appear more lovely to the dying.

—Richter.

11. Its disclosures of character.

(1551.) Every man and woman who lives by Christian principle (that is, by faith), who sustains the life of his immortal spirit by prayer, and sacraments, and the Word of God, and resists evil watchfully and steadfastly, is a saint. He may have his infirmities, his backslidings, his periods of lukewarmness, his failings of temper, his moral cowardice, so had the Scriptural saints. And our close commerce with him in life, forcing upon us, as it does, his weakness and prejudices, while his communion with God, transacted in the depths of his own spirit, is of course screened from us, hinders for the present our fully appreciating him. We see very clearly that he is "a man subject to like passions as we are;" but we fail to see that he is Elijah. Perchance we shall see this too by and by, when he is taken from us. Sanctity in our friends and neighbours is like a star. We take no notice of the star while the sun is pouring his rays over the firmament, and the full stir of life is around us. But let the night draw her curtain over the sky, and the star in all its beauty steals out to view. So while our friends are mixed up with us in the hurry and commerce of life, we seem unable to disentangle from their infirmities the saintliness which is in them. But they die; and something comes to light about their inward life which hitherto had escaped every eye but God's, and we begin to discover that the commonest things they did were governed by Christian principle, and referred to God in prayer, and perhaps that we have been for years walking side by side with angels unawares. Death has now thrown his pall over them; they are no longer in the hubbub of life, or the strife of tongues; and the star of their sanctity begins to twinkle brightly to our eyes.

—Goulburn.

(1552.) Leaves fade differently. The autumnal foliage is very varied. It is this rich variety that gives a witching charm to the calm landscapes of October, and makes the progress of the month like the stately march of an Orient army, with the splendour of blazing banners and the wealth and pageantry of olden story. No two species of trees exhibit the same appearance. They all present a uniform greenness in the summer; but decay brings out their individual character, and shows us each of them in its true colours. One tree, draped in dull and sombre foliage, looks like a funeral pall. Its leaves are covered with brown unsightly blotches; and its whole aspect is melancholy and dreary in the extreme. Another tree looks as though the glories of the sunset had been distilled into it. Decked with glowing hues of crimson, and scarlet, and gold, it lights up the forest like a pillar of fire. It is a picture of beauty, far more exquisite than any it presented in its fresh, green, summer prime. The eye loves to dwell upon it; and the mind forgets, in the enjoyment of its loveliness, that the gorgeous display is but the prelude of death, the last brilliant flash of the candle in its socket ere it goes out in utter darkness. And are there not similar differences in the way in which men fade and die? In the hey-day of life and happiness they may seem all alike, uniformly fair and attractive, but when death comes, it shows the true character of each. Its approach makes some men gloomy and sombre. It invests them with a dark and repulsive aspect. It clothes them with despair. It discovers and displays to them, in its red, all-revealing light, the errors and follies of their life in all their hard reality, without one softening shadow. There is nothing to save them from the sting with which it is armed by sin. They are under the law, and under the curse. The righteousness of Christ is not theirs to justify them; His Spirit is not theirs to sanctify them. They have no title to heaven and meetness for it. Oh, there is nothing bright and attractive, nothing hopeful and desirable, in the dying of the impenitent and unsaved sinner! All is dark and despairing—a fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation. It is like the sun on a stormy evening, going down in gloomy thunder clouds, leaving no ray of light behind. It is like a green tree changing in autumn into the most sombre and repulsive aspect of decay. But how widely different is the dying of the Christian! Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints; precious and also beautiful. It is to them the most blessed of experiences. They are never so well situated to glorify God as in their dying hours. Then they can display the tenderness of His care, the truth of His promises, the supports of His everlasting love, as they can in no other circumstances. While the eye of the body is closing to the beauties of earth, the eye of the soul is opening to the glories that are to be revealed in them; while their hold of all that life holds dear is relaxing, they cling with a firmer grasp of faith, and a closer embrace of love, to the things that are unseen and eternal in the heavens; while the outward man perishes, the inward man is renewed more and more. The day of their death is indeed better than the day of their birth, for, rich with all their treasures of spiritual knowledge and experience—the growth and accumulation of a whole lifetime of discipline—they come to their last hour like the mellow fruit that gathers into itself all the life of the tree, and all the dew and sunshine of summer, and at last bends and breaks the branch from which it hangs.

—Macmillan.

12. Men die as they live.

(1553.) Leaves fade characteristically. The foliage that is gloomiest in its unfolding is most unsightly in its decay; and the leaves that have the richest and tenderest shade of green in April have the most brilliant rainbow hues in October. The leaf of the sad and sullen ash is the last to kindle its bud, and the first to wither and fall; and its colour, always sombre, becomes blackened and disfigured in decay. The leaf of the linden tree, on the contrary, is beautiful from first to last, softly green in spring, fragrant in summer with delicate frankincense, and musical with the hum of bees revelling in the honey-dew bloom; and gorgeous as a sunset cloud in autumn. And so is it with man. He dies as he lives. A life of godliness ends in a saintly death; and a career of worldliness and sin terminates in impenitence and despair. The law of life is, that the fruit shall be as the seed, and the end as the beginning: unless, indeed, the higher law of Divine Mercy interposes on a timely repentance.

—Macmillan.

13. How easily the fear of it is overmastered.

(1554.) There is no passion in the mind of man so weak but it mates and masters the fear of death.

—Bacon.

(1555.) Of all the instances that can be given of recklessness of life, there is none that comes near that of the workmen employed in what is called dry-pointing; the grinding of needles and of table forks. The fine steel-dust which they breathe brings on a painful disease of which they are almost sure to die before forty.

And yet not only are men tempted by high wages to engage in this employment, but they resist to the utmost all the contrivances devised for diminishing the danger; through fear that this would cause more workmen to offer themselves, and thus lower wages!

The case of sailors, soldiers, miners, and others who engage in hazardous employments, is nothing in comparison of this; because people of a sanguine temper hope to escape the dangers. But the dry-pointers have to encounter, not the risk, but the certainty, of an early and painful death. The thing would seem incredible, if it were not so fully attested. All this proves that avarice overcomes the fear of death. And so may vanity: witness the many women who wear light dresses, and will even employ washes for the complexion which they know to be highly dangerous and even destructive to their health.

—Whately, 1777-1863.

(1556.) The dread of death is universal and instinctive; and yet how many rush into its arms! Suicide is a most impressive fact in this connection. The disappointed lover, the discouraged adventurer, the suspected clerk, the child wounded in its self-love, or fearful of punishment, faces the great enemy and invites his blow. Every now and then the community is shocked by suicides so unprovoked, and so frequent as almost to persuade us that the natural fear of death is passing away. The inconsistency is easily explained. Lord Bacon says there is no passion that will not overmaster the terror of death. For passion is thoughtless; occupied wholly with an immediate suffering, it makes no estimate of any other kind of pain; absorbed in an instantaneous sorrow, it takes no other sorrow into account. The mind entertains but one passion at a time, whether it be joy or fear. But men are not always or generally under the influence of passion. Ordinary life is calm, calculating, considerate, and it is to ordinary life that death is terrible. It is the thought of death that is terrible, not death. Death is gentle, peaceful, painless; instead of bringing suffering it brings an end of suffering. It is misery's cure. Where death is, agony is not. The processes of death are all friendly. The near aspect of death is gracious. There is a picture somewhat of a frightful face, livid and ghastly, which the beholder gazes on with horror, and would turn away from, but for a hideous fascination that not only rivets his attention, but draws him closer to it. On approaching the picture the hideousness disappears, and when directly confronted with it is not any more seen; the face is the face of an angel. It is a picture of death, and the object of the artist was to impress the idea that the terror of death is an apprehension. Theodore Parker, whose observation of death was very large, has said that he never saw a person of any belief, condition, or experience, unwilling to die when the time came; and my own more limited observation confirms the truth of the remark. Death is an ordinance of nature, and like every ordinance of nature is directed by beneficent laws to beneficent ends. What must be is made welcome. Necessity is beautiful.

—O. B. Frothingham.

14. Is seldom realised.

(1557.) There is a difference between knowing a thing and realising it. When a poor man becomes suddenly the possessor of a fortune or of dignity, it is some time before the thing becomes so natural to him that he can act in his new sphere like his proper self; it is all strangeness at first. When the criminal hears the death-sentence "a the dock, his cheeks are tearless. He hears the words, but scarcely understands that they have anything to do with him. He has not realised that it is he himself that has to die. When bereavement comes, it is not at the moment when the breath leaves the body that we feel what has been lost: we know, but yet we must have it in detail: see the empty chair, and the clothes that will never be worn again, and perceive day after day pass, and he comes not; then we realise.

Job knew that God was the vindicator of wrongs; that he said. But why did he go on repeating in every possible form the same thing: "I shall see God, see Him for myself, mine eyes shall behold Him; yes, mine and not another's"? It would seem as if he were doing what a man does when he repeats over and over to himself a thing which he cannot picture out in its reality. It was true : but it was strange, and shadowy, and unfamiliar.

It is no matter of uncertainty to any one of us whether he himself shall die. He knows it. Every time the funeral bell tolls, the thought in some shape suggests itself. I am a mortal, dying man. That is knowing it. Which of us has realised it? Who can shut his eyes, and bring it before him as a reality, that the day will come when the hearse will stand at the door for him, and that all this bright world will be going on without him; and that the very flesh which now walks about so complacently, will have the coffin-lid shut down upon it, and be left to darkness, and loneliness, and silence, and the worm?

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

15. Is usually disregarded.

(1558.) Living in a country village where a burial was a rarity, I never thought of death, it was so seldom presented to me. Coming to London, where there is plenty of funerals (so that coffins crowd one another, and corpses in the grave jostle for elbow-room), I slight and neglect death, because grown an object so constant and common.

How foul is my stomach to turn all food into bad humours. Funerals neither few nor frequent work effectually upon me. London is a library of mortality. Volumes of all sorts and sizes; rich, poor, infants, children, youth, men, old men, daily die. I see there is more required to make a good scholar than only the having of many books. Lord, be Thou my schoolmaster, and "teach me to number my days, that I may apply my heart unto wisdom."

—Fuller, 1609-1661.

(1559.) Meditations of death are usually very unprofitable. It is with most men as it is with a flock of sheep, which graze till the shepherd rushes in amongst them, and lays hold of one of them for the slaughter, and this presently frightens them, making them leave their food and run scattering about the fields; but no sooner is the terror over, but they flock together again, and feed as securely without thought of death or danger as before, until the slaughterer again selects his prey. So truly is it with most men, when death suddenly lays his hand upon some friend or relative, and arrests him amidst the crowd of thoughtless mortals. Some extraordinary circumstance in the death of others will turn their attention from their usual occupations, and call up frightful images of the grave and eternity. But these thoughts soon wear off, and they return to the same round of worldly vanity and wretched security as before, until the thunders of the Almighty are again heard, and death, this appalling monster, is again seen in pursuit, and hurrying his victim to the slaughter, when the same scene is acted over again—they tremble—the dead is interred, and the grave filled up, and the irrevocable sentence is forgotten—"Tis appointed unto all men once to die," &c., until the pit of destruction again yawns and swallows them up.

—Salter.

16. We should remember that we are to die.

(1560.) Two ships meeting on the sea, the men in either ship think themselves standing still, and the other to be swift of sail, whereas they both sail onwards towards the port intended, but the one faster than the other. Even so men are as ships.

See we an old man, with a staff in his hand, stooping downward: "Alas! poor old man," say we, "he cannot live long." Hear we a passing bell toll, there is one going out of the world. Visit we a sick friend, we think he can hardly live till morning. Thus, we think all other men are a-dying, and we only standing at rest; whereas, God knows it, they may go a little before, and we are sure to follow after. John outruns Peter to the sepulchre, but Peter is not far behind him. Let every man, then, be thus persuaded of himself, that he shall and must die. None can be so sottish as to be persuaded that they shall never die, yet (which is a sad thing) there is none so old but thinks he may live one year longer; and though, in the general, he say, "All must die," yet, in the false numbering of his own particular days, he thinks to live for ever.

—Rogers, 1594-1660.

17. Reminders of death.

(1561.) Every ache and pain, every wrinkle you see stamping itself on a parent's brow, every accident which reveals the uncertain tenure of life and possessions, every funeral bell that tolls, are only God's reminders that we are tenants at will and not by right; pensioners on the bounty of an hour. He is closing up the right of way, warning fairly that what we have is lent, not given; His, not ours. His mercies are so much gain.

—Robertson, 1816-1853.

18. Should be prepared for.

—Wernullerus, 1551.

(1563.) Death is half disarmed when the pleasures and interests of the flesh are first denied; for the leaving of fleshly contents and pleasures is much of the reason of men's unwillingness to die; and therefore when these are denied beforehand the reasons of your unwillingness are taken away. If you pull down the nest, the birds will be gone. Men that are loath to leave their country would willingly be gone if their houses were fired, or they were turned out of doors and their friends and goods were all sent away. This is it that makes men so unwilling to die, because they practise not mortification in their health, but, contrarily, make it the work of their lives to feather their nests, and make provision for the flesh, and then complain that they are loath to leave those nests! Men load themselves with the lumber and baggage of the world, and then complain that they cannot travel on their journey, but had rather sit down. They fall a-building them habitations in their way, when they should have none but inns or tents; and when they have bestowed all their time, and cost, and charges on them, they complain of their hearts for being loath to leave them. Such mad doings as these are not the way to be willing to die.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1564.) Why should a man defer that which ought to be the occupation of a life, which ought to command all his powers in all their vigour? why should a man defer that to the last few abrupt moments to his departure from time to eternity? When a man is going to any distant part of the globe—say to America—what preparation there is! How much it is talked about! It is a long, a distant, an eventful journey. The man talks about it; his family talk about it; his friends prepare in every conceivable way. Oh, what infatuation, what stupidity, what folly it is for a man to make no preparation for this distant voyage—the voyage to eternity!

—Beaumont.

(1565.) Were any other event of far superior moment ascertained by evidence which made but a distant approach to that which attests the certainty of a life to come,—had we equal assurance that after a very limited though uncertain period we should be called to migrate into a distant land whence we were never to return,—the intelligence would fill every breast with solicitude; it would become the theme of every tongue; and we should avail ourselves with the utmost eagerness of all the means of information respecting the prospects which awaited us in that unknown country. Much of our attention would be occupied in preparing for our departure; we should cease to regard the place we now inhabit as our home, and nothing would be considered of moment but as it bore upon our future destination. How strange is it then that, with the certainty we all possess of shortly entering into another world, we avert our eyes as much as possible from the prospect; that we seldom permit it to penetrate us; and that the moment the recollection recurs we hasten to dismiss it as an unwelcome intrusion! Is it not surprising that the volume we profess to recognise as the record of immortality, and the sole depository of whatever information it is possible to obtain respecting the portion which awaits us, should be consigned to neglect, and rarely if ever consulted with the serious intention of ascertaining our future condition?

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

(1566.) It is when considered as the passage to another world that the contemplation of death becomes holy and religious; that it is calculated to promote a state of preparedness for our setting out on this great voyage,—our departure from this world to enter the other. It is manifest that those who are engrossed with the things that pertain to this life alone, who are devoted to worldly pleasure, to worldly gain, honour, or power, are certainly not preparing themselves for the passage into another; while it is equally manifest that the change of heart, of desires, wishes, tastes, thoughts, dispositions, which constitute a meetness for entrance into a happy, holy, heavenly state,—the hope of which can indeed “mate and master the fear of death,”—must take place here on earth; for, if not, it will not take place after death.

—Whately, 1787-1863.

II. IN RELATION TO THE IMPENITENT.

1. To them it is unwelcome.

(1567.) Who can without horror think of leaving this world, though full of sorrows, that hopes for no ease in the other? The condemned malefactor, as ill as he likes his smoky hole in the prison, had rather be there than accept of deliverance at the hangman's hand; he had rather live still in his stinking dungeon than exchange it for a gibbet. And greater reason hath the hopeless soul (if he understand himself) to wish he may spend his eternity on earth, though in the poorest hole or cave in it, and that under the most exquisite torment of stone or gout, than to be eased of that pain with hell's torment.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1568.) When once the Christian hath got his piece of armour on, his soul is prepared for death and danger; he sits at the feast, which God in His present providence allows him, and fears no messenger with ill news to knock at his door; yea, he can talk of his dying hour and not spoil the mirth of his present condition; as carnal men think it does, to whom a discourse of dying in the midst of their junkets is like the coming in of the officer to attack a company of thieves that are making merry together with their stolen goods about them; or like the wet cloth that Hazeel clapped on the king, his master's face. It makes all the joy which flushed out before squat in on a sudden, that the poor creatures sit dispirited and all amort (as we say) till they get out of this affrighting subject by some diversion or other; which only relieves them for the present, and puts them out of that particular fit this brought upon them, but leaves them deeper in slavery to such amazement of heart, whenever the same ghost shall appear for the future. Whereas the Christian, that hath this preparation of heart, never tastes more sweetness in the enjoyments of this life, than when he dips these morsels in the meditation of death and eternity. It is no more grief to his heart to think of the removal of these, which makes way for those far sweeter enjoyments, than it would be to one at a feast, to have the first course taken off, when he hath fed well on it, that the second course of all rare sweetmeats and banqueting stuff may come on, which it cannot till the other be gone.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

2. To them it is ruin.

(1569.) God is under an oath to procure thy destruction, if thou diest in this mind, which God forbid. Death is the trap-door which will let thee down to hell's dungeon, and when once thou art there, thou art where thou wilt have space enough to weep over thy past folly; though here thou hast neither time nor leisure to make God thy friend.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

III. IN RELATION TO THE PEOPLE OF GOD.

1. Even the good recoil from it.

(1570.) One remarked to me the other day that very few of the people who magnify the joys and glories of heaven have any desire to depart thither—preferring, for the greater part, to stay here as long as possible. The remark is doubtless true; but the suggestion of inconsistency implied in it is not a fair one. People love to think, talk, and sing of heaven. The Apocalypse is a favourite book. Its openings of the heavenly life are exceeding sweet. But still we say, with Charles Lamb: "I would set up my tabernacle here. . . . A new state of being staggers me." When good Christians are cast down into bad sicknesses, and are brought to the brink of the world, they do not commonly exult overmuch, nor stretch forth eager hands; but cling to life, and struggle to regain a sure footing on these shores of time. In some cases there is a very ardent and constant desire to go to heaven. But with the overwhelming majority of Christians it is not so. What is the significance of this fact? Are they who thus shrink back from entering upon the "life to come" necessarily less spiritual than they who would gladly welcome at any time the summons to go home? Probably not. Some cultivated person, who has long dreamed of journeying in foreign lands, is suddenly pressed with the opportunity of realising his dream. As he wakes to meet the opportunity, there throng in upon him doubts, anxieties, and most unaccountable shrinkings. A strange aversion to going arises within him. The ocean voyage! The separation from beloved ones! The strangeness of the yonder countries! The forebodings of a timid nature! How many things combine to make it necessary that his friends shall fairly push him off and set him adrift!

A great many people pass through just this experience, and it may be somewhat thus with multitudes about going to heaven. Doubtless everything will be delightful over there, and one will find most of his solicitudes imaginary, and all his apprehensions as unreal as vague; and yet he holds back as long as possible.

In order to get to heaven one must die. Between you and Europe rolls the dreadful ocean. Some make nothing of crossing it; others cannot pluck up heart to encounter it. Between the Christian pilgrim and the Land of Promise "Jordan rolls between." The natural fear of death is much more lively in some persons than in others. They are by no means the saintlier who have little of that fear. The inimical nature of death is felt through every fibre of our frame. There is a curse mixing with it. There is a sin ever standing behind it, in its gloom. It is idle to condemn the constitutional and often quite unconquerable apprehension with which men encounter it, and which is commonly strong enough to account for the absence of a ruling desire to leave this world for one which is surely believed to be, in all respects, infinitely better.

This instinctive recoiling from death is not weak or ignoble, except as it becomes uncontrollable. Courage does not consist in having no fear, but in triumphing over fear. Our Lord experienced this fear of death, and it is abundantly proven that the finest and noblest man is not he who meets death unconcernedly.

—L. P. Parker.

2. Yet by them it is to be desired rather than feared.

(1571.) It becometh all Christians not only to suffer, but also to commend and praise, the will of the heavenly Lord and King. Now is it His will that we die. For if the sparrows, whereof two are bought for a farthing, fall not on the ground without God the Father, much less we men, whom God Himself esteemeth to be of more value than many sparrows, yea, for whose sakes other things were created, do fall to the ground through death without the will of God. The soldier tarrieth in the place wherein he is appointed of the chief captain to fight against the enemies, and if he call him from thence, he willingly obeyeth; even so hath the heavenly Captain set us upon earth, where we have to fight, not with flesh and blood, but with wicked spirits. Therefore if He give us leave, and call us from hence, we ought by reason to obey Him. Like as one should not withdraw himself from paying what he oweth, but gently to restore the money; so hath God lent us this life, and not promised that we may alway enjoy it. Therefore is death described to be the payment of natural debt.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(1572.) If a poor man should be commanded by a prince to put off his torn and beggarly garments, and, instead thereof, to put on royal and costly robes, it would be a great rejoicing in his heart: even so much more joyful news must this be unto all repentant sinners, when the King of heaven and earth comes unto them by death, and bids them lay down their bodies as ragged and patched garments, and prepare themselves to put on the princely robe of immortality. No tongue can be able to express the excellency of this most blessed estate.

—Cawdray, 1609.

—Felltham, 1668.

(1574.) Ah, foolish soul! doth every prisoner groan for freedom, and every slave desire his jubilee, and every sick man long for health, and every hungry man for food: and dost thou alone abhor deliverance? Doth the seaman long to see the land? Doth the husbandman desire the harvest, and the labouring man to receive his pay? Doth the traveller long to be at home, and the runner long to win the prize, and the soldier long to win the field? And art thou loath to see thy labours finished, and to receive the end of thy faith and sufferings, and to obtain the thing for which thou livest?

—Baxter, 1615-1651.

(1575.) When the hen hath sat to hatch her young ones, they must leave the shell as good for nothing, and must come into a world which they never saw before. And what of that? Should they murmur at the breaking of their former habitation? or fear the passage into so light, so wide, so strange a place, in comparison of that in which they were in before? No more should we murmur at the breaking of these bodies and casting the shell of flesh, and passing under the conduct of angels, into the presence of the Lord. God is but hatching us here by His Spirit, that He may bring us out into the light of glory.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1576.) Doth not the seed thou sowest die before it springs? and what cause have we to be tender to this body? Oh, what care, what labour, what grief and sorrow hath it cost us; how many a weary, painful, tedious hour! O my soul, grudge not that God should disburden thee of all this! Fear not, lest He should free thee from thy fetters: be not so loath that He should break down thy prison, and let thee go. What though some terrible earthquake go before? it is but that the foundations of the prison may be shaken, and so the doors fly open; the terror will be to thy jailer, but to thee deliverance. Oh, therefore, at what hour of the night soever thy Lord come, let Him find thee, though with thy feet in these stocks, yet singing praises to Him, and not fearing the time of thy deliverance. If unclothing be the thing thou fearest, why it is that thou mayest have better clothing put on. If to be turned out of doors be the thing thou fearest, why remember, then, when this earthly house of thy tabernacle is dissolved, thou hast "a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." How willingly do our soldiers burn their huts when the siege is ended, being glad their work is done, that they may go home and dwell in houses.
—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1577.) The reflection that we must ere long take a final farewell of what is most capable of pleasing us upon earth, is not only tolerable, but pleasant. For we know we cannot fully possess our best friend, our chief treasure, till we have done with all below; nay, we cannot till then properly see each other. We are cased up in vehicles of clay, and converse together as if we were in different coaches, with the blinds close drawn round. We see the carriage, and the voice tells us that we have a friend within; but we shall know each other better when death shall open the coach doors, and hand out the company successively, and lead them into the glorious apartments which the Lord has appointed to be the common residence of them that love Him. What an assembly will there be! What a constellation of glory, when each individual shall shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father! No sins, sorrows, temptations; no veils, clouds, or prejudices shall interrupt us then. All names of idle distinction (the fruits of present remaining darkness, the channels of bigotry, and the stumblingblock of the world) will be at an end.
—Newton, 1721-1807.

(1578.) Ah! brethren, we are not Christians about dying. We are taught that we go to heaven through the prison of death. Everybody feels that to sicken and die is to go into Egypt and into the wilderness. We are apt to think of sickness and dying as so many horrible, gloomy stages in our progress towards the future. But dying is a process as simple as the parting of the stem from the bough, or as the swinging of the door that lets one in from the wintry blast outside to the pleasant home inside. It is not hard to die. It is harder a thousand times to live. To die is to be a man.

To live is only to try to be one. To live is to see God through a glass darkly. To die is to see Him face to face. To live is to be in the ore. To die is to be smelted and come out pure gold. To live is to be in March and November. To die is to find midsummer, where there is perfect harmony and perfect beauty.
—Booker.

2. Notwithstanding that even to them the hour of death is frequently a season of sore temptation.

(1579.) If one that is about to shoot a gun be unsteady at the letting of it go, he misseth altogether, and all that he prepared for it before is in vain; even so, at the end of this life, are devils most busy to turn us from the right mark, that our former travail and labour may be lost, forasmuch as they know that there remaineth but a very small time of life; so that if the soul escape them now, they shall afterward go without it for evermore.

Even as mighty enemies do besiege and lay assault to a city, so the devils compass the soul of man with violence and subtlety, to take possession of the poor soul and bring it to hell. When we are yet in prosperity, the devils would have us to make but a small matter of it, as though we were in no danger to God-ward, albeit we blaspheme, be drunken, &c. But in the danger of death they bring forth those wicked sins in most terrible wise, putting us in mind of the wrath of God—how He in times past here and there did punish and destroy wicked doers—to the intent that our souls might be hindered from repentance and faith, and never perceive any way to be delivered; and by reason thereof wholly to despair, and to become the devil's portion.
—Wermullerus, 1551.

(1580.) We think of an aged Christian as of one seated on the bank of Jordan, enjoying the calm evening of a busy, holy, useful life—looking back on the past without any other regret than what springs from the recollection of his sins, and looking forward on the future without the shadow of a fear; as a servant with his task done, waiting to receive his wages, and the welcome summons that calls him home. We fancy him by the eye of faith piercing the mists that hang over death's dark flood; and as he descries the shining ones on the other shore, stretching out his aged arms, and crying, as he longs to be gone and be with them, Oh that I had the wings of a dove, that I might fly away and be at rest.

Our fancy's picture may be beautiful. It is more beautiful than true; such cases are rare. The Christian commonly dies in harness, in the battlefield, in the thick of the battle, fighting on to the last gasp. The death-bed of the saint has been indeed the scene of his hardest work, his deepest grief, his bitterest tears, and the most terrible assaults of the evil one. "Stern all" is the cry when the monster of the deep begins his dying struggles; and then every man bends to his oar, pulling out of the sweep of that tremendous tail which, as she pours out her heart's blood, beats the billows and churns them into crimsoned foam. Not less formidable sometimes are the last, the dying struggles of sin. What says our Lord? "The kingdom of heaven suffers violence, and the violent take it by force;" and it happens there as with a beleaguered city at the storming—the hardest fighting is in the breach; the battle rages fiercest just before it ceases, and with a few more strokes, the city is entered, and the prize is won.

—Guthrie.

4. Unwillingness to die is an evidence of defective faith and love.

(1581.) Is it possible that we can truly believe that death will remove us from misery to such glory, and yet be loath to die? If it were the doubts of our interest which made us afraid, yet a true belief of the certainty and excellency of this rest would make us restless till our interest be cleared. If a man that is desperately sick to-day, did believe he should arise sound the next morning; or a man to-day, in despicable poverty, had assurance that he should to-morrow arise a prince; would they be afraid to go to bed, or rather think it the longest day of their lives, till that desired night and morning came? The truth is, though there is much faith and Christianity in our mouths, yet there is much infidelity and paganism in our hearts which is the main cause that we are so loath to die.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1582.) As the weakness of our faith, so also the coldness of our love, is exceedingly discovered by our unwillingness to die. Love doth desire the nearest conjunction, the fullest fruition, and closest communion. Where these desires are absent, there is only a naked pretence of love. He that ever felt such a thing as love working in his breast, hath also felt these desires attending it. If we love our friend, we love his company; his presence is comfortable, his absence is troublesome. When he goes from us, we desire his return; when he comes to us, we entertain him with welcome and gladness; when he dies, we mourn, and usually overmourn. To be separated from a faithful friend, is to us as the rending of a member from our bodies; and would not our desires after God be such, if we really loved Him?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1583.) Is it not a far likelier sign of hatred than of love, when the thoughts of our appearing before God are our most grievous thoughts? and when we take ourselves as undone because we must die and come unto Him? Surely, I should scarcely take him for an unfeigned friend, who were as well contented to be absent from me, as we ordinarily are to be absent from God. Was it such a joy to Jacob to see the face of Joseph in Egypt, and shall we so dread the sight of Christ in glory, and yet say we love Him? I dare not conclude that we have no love at all when we are so loath to die; but I daresay, were our love more, we should die more willingly. Yea, I daresay, did we love God but as strongly as a worldling loves his wealth, or as an ambitious man his honour, or a voluptuous man his pleasure, yea, as a drunkard loves his swinish delight, or an unclean person his brutish lust; we should not then be so exceeding loath to leave the world, and go to God. Oh! if this holy flame of love were thoroughly kindled in our breasts, instead of our pressing fears, our dolorous complaints, and earnest prayers against death, we should join in David's wilderness lamentations:—"As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God: my soul thirsteth for God, for the living God; when shall I come and appear before God?"

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

5. How the fear of it is to be overcome.

(1584.) Like as he that is to pass over some great and deep river must not look downward to the stream of the water, but if he would prevent fear he must set his foot sure and cast his eye to the bank on the further side: even so he that draws near death must, as it were, look over the waves of death, and directly fix the eye of his faith upon eternal life.

—Candrey, 1609.

(1585.) Familiarise the thoughts of the evil day to thy soul; handle this serpent often, walk daily in the serious meditations of it, do not run from them because they are unpleasant to flesh, that is the way to increase the terror of it. Do with your souls, when shy of, and scared with the thoughts of affliction or death, as you use to do with your beast that is given to boggle and start as you ride on him; when he flies back and starts at a thing, you do not yield to his fear and go back, that will make him worse another time, but you ride him up close to that which he is afraid of, and in time you break him of that quality. The evil day is not such a fearful thing to thee that art a Christian, as thou shouldst start for it. Bring up thy heart close to it, show thy soul what Christ hath done to take the sting out of it; what the sweet promises are that are given on purpose to overcome the fear of it, and what thy hopes are thou shalt get by it. These will satisfy and compose thy spirit, whereas the shunning the thoughts of it will but increase thy fear, and bring thee more into bondage to it.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

(1586.) "When you are afraid of death or would find more willingness to die, look up to the blessed souls with Christ, and think that you are but to pass that way, which all those souls have gone before you, and to go from a world of enmity and vanity, to the company of all those blessed spirits." And is not their blessed state more desirable than such a vain, vexatious life as this? There is no malice, nor slander, nor cruel persecuting; no uncharitable censures, contentions, or divisions; no ignorance, nor unbelief, nor strangeness unto God, nothing but what is holy, amiable, and delightful. Join yourselves daily to that celestial society: suppose yourselves spectators of their order, purity, and glory, and auditors of their harmonious praises of Jehovah. Live by faith in a daily familiarity with them: say not that you want company or are alone, when you may walk in the streets of the heavenly Jerusalem, and there converse with the prophets and apostles, and all the glorious hosts of heaven. Converse thus with them in your life, and it will overcome the fear of death, and make you long to be there with them: like one that stands by the river side, and seeth his friends on the further side, in a place of pleasure, while his enemies are pursuing him at his back, how gladly would he be over with them! And it will embolden him to venture on the passage, which all they have safely passed before him. Thus death will be to us as the Red Sea, to pass us safe to the land of promise, while our pursuers are there overthrown and perish. We should not be so strange to the world above, if we thus by faith conversed with the blessed ones.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1587.) 1. When fear cometh from natural averseness to die, and strangeness to the state of separated souls, and to some unrevealed things of the unseen world, it is wisdom to cast those dark and unknown frightful things quite out of our thoughts, and quietly to shut our eyes against them. When I was young, I was wont to go up the Wrekin Hill with great pleasure (being near my dwelling), and to look down on the country below me, and see the villages as little things; but when I was weak with age and sickness, the last time I went up, if I did but cast my eye downwards, my spirits failed, and I was ready to fall down in sudden death. Were I chained fast to the top of a high spire steeple, I am sure that I could not fall, and yet I am confident that one look down would suddenly kill me. What then should I do? As on the hill I fixed my eyes on the earth at my feet till I came down; so I would in such a height either look only upwards, or shut my eyes, and take heed of looking down to the earth: so do here. If faith and reason tell you that death is not to be so feared, and that all your hope and comfort must be beyond it, and that you are safe in God's promise, and in the hand of Christ; but yet the thoughts of a grave and the separation from the body, and of all that is unknown to us in the next world, is frightful to you, shut your eyes, and think not on those things; wink, and say, they belong not to my thoughts.

But then join the other remedies. (2.) Look upwards, and dwell on the delightful thoughts of all that revealed joy and glory, which is ready to receive us, and of the company that is there, that hope and desire may conquer fear.

(3.) And especially trust Jesus Christ with your departing souls, and trust Him quietly and boldly.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1588.) Let us live like those who expect to die, and then we shall find that we feared death only because we were unacquainted with it.

—Wake, 1657-1757.

(1589.) If you think of death as a slave, looking upon it as going into servitude under a hard master, then it may weaken you, and take away the comfort that you have; but if you think of it, as every child of God has a right to think of it, as going to your Father's house, where a rich banquet is prepared for you, and where you shall enjoy the companionship of saints and angels, it will be a source of comfort and strength to you. We can afford to take trouble here for the sake of gaining such an inheritance. What would I care for being poor, if I knew that at the end of one year I should have ten millions of dollars? Men would toil hard, and unremittingly, and without complaint, if they could be assured that the boundary of their toil was within their computation, and that all beyond was to be enjoyment and the amplest wealth. Men do endure everything in the hope of securing wealth and enjoyment. How will they pursue laborious industry in the chilling regions of the North, or how will they plunge into the heat of the tropics, encountering sickness, and the malaria of every delta that has commerce in it, in the hope that they may return to their father's house, or the village or neighbourhood of their birth, and spend the few closing days of their life in pleasure and comfort. And if such is the strength of the hope of a short period of earthly peace and rest, how much greater must be the strength of that man's hope who expects, after a few years (he cares not how few, so that God's will be done) he shall rise out of this world of trouble, and care, and vicissitudes, into the land of glory,—God's land of freedom, of nobility, of purity, of truth? —Becker.

6. The secret of peace in death.

(1590.) Of the great number to whom it has been my painful professional duty to have administered in the last hour of their lives, I have sometimes felt surprised that so few have appeared reluctant to go to "the undiscovered country, from whose bourn no traveller returns." Many, we may easily suppose, have manifested this willingness to die from an impatience of suffering, or from that passive indifference which is sometimes the result of debility and bodily exhaustion. But I have seen those who have arrived at a fearless contemplation of the future, from faith in the doctrine which our religion teaches. Such men were not only calm and supported, but cheerful, in the hour of death; and I never quitted such a sick-chamber without a hope that my last end might be like theirs. —Sir Henry Hallford.

(1591.) "Can I do anything for you?" said an officer in one of our gory battles in America, during that awful conflict, to one of the lads in blue, whose life was trickling away upon the green sward. "Nothing," said the dying soldier, "nothing!" "Shall I get you a little water?" "No, thank you, I am dying." "Is there nothing I can do?" said the officer; "shall I write a letter to your friends?" "No, I have no friends that you can write to. But there is one thing I should be much obliged to you for. In my knapsack you will find a Testament; open it at the 14th chapter of St. John, and near the end you will find a passage that begins with the word 'Peace;' please read it." The officer took up the blood-stained haversack, took out the Testament, and turned to that chapter that your pastor and myself have read so often, or held up so often as a lamp in the valley of the shadow of death, the matchless 14th chapter of John; and he read: "Peace I leave with you; My peace I give unto you. Not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." "Thank you, sir," said the dying man; "I have got that peace; I am going to that Saviour." And winging its way from the poor bleeding body, the spirit ascended; and, as Noah stretched out his hand to the dove, the infinite Love grasped him and drew him in. For him to die was Christ; for him to die was gain—gain everlasting! —Cuyler.

(1592.) A hope that is built on acceptance of the truth, on degrees of knowledge and obedience, on sincerity of purpose or effort, and not on the merit and intercessions of a personal Redeemer, is, and must be, a timid and inconstant feeling. There is a reason why ignorant Christians are always hopeful. It is not because they have less knowledge, but because, having less, their faith is less diverted from its proper and sublime object. They literally know nothing but "Jesus, and Him crucified;" and on Him they rely with an unquestioning faith. He is their all-in-all: He, and He alone, is their hope of glory. And what a hope theirs is! I have seen such die. They were poor, unlettered, destitute of ideas; they had had no traffic in the great commerce of the world's thought; it were easy for wit to mock them, and for culture to pity their ignorance: but they died as the sun comes out of an eclipse, their natures revealing great glory as they moved from behind the shadow of their mortality. No crying out, no shrinking back as from an untried fate, no knitting up of courage as for a mighty effort, no grasping of mortal hands as if for help, no swift and anxious dialogue with the onlooking pastor, no doubt and trembling when they came to die; but with hands folded for rest, with eyes uplifted to heaven and full of joy, with countenances lighted as is the face when it answereth to the face of a friend, with a sigh like the last long breath of weariness passing into sleep, they gently breathed their lives out in the arms of Jesus. He was no myth to them. They saw Him, not through form and ceremony, through type and symbol, through theologic treatise and verbal memorising of the catechism: they saw Him as the patient sees the physician; as the lamb sees the Eastern shepherd when it lies in the folds of his vestment; they saw Him as the uplifted eye of love sees the face of answering love above it; and, seeing this, doubt being unknown in the perfection of their faith, fear being cast out by the perfectness of their love, they closed their eyes as flowers close at the setting of the sun, and gently "fell on sleep." —Murray.

(1593.) On his way to Sweden, the celebrated Grotius was overtaken by mortal sickness, and when the clergyman, Quinstorp, reminded him of his sins on the one hand, and on the other, not of his services and world-wide reputation, but the grace of God in Christ Jesus, with a reference to the publican, "I am that publican," replied Grotius, and then expired. Rowland Hill remarked, "People talk about looking back on a well-spent life. I look up to Him who spent His life gloriously to redeem the life of my precious soul; and there alone I dare to look. I thank God who has kept me from grosser sins of the world; but there is not a prayer more suitable to my dying lips than that of the publican: 'God be merciful to me a sinner!'" Archbishop Usher often said he hoped to die with this language of the publican in his mouth. His wish was fulfilled, for his last words were: "God be merciful to me a sinner!" Dr. Woods, of Andover, the night before his death, replied to a friend who asked if he should pray with him: "There is no prayer that meets my case but that of the publican: 'God be merciful to me a sinner!'"

7. Grandeur of the Christian's death.

(1594.) "Death swallowed up in victory." Earth presents not a spectacle of equal grandeur to that of a Christian who has power to wrest the dart of the king of terrors from his hand on the very confines of an eternal world. His calm but lofty tone is the language of the conqueror, though in the midst of infirmity, death and judgment. It is like the half hour before sunset—in the midst of nature's grandest and most majestic scenery—when there is not a breath to agitate the frailest leaf, or ripple the glassy smoothness of the water's surface—it is the sublime of tranquillity. —Salter.

8. In death the saints are perfected.

(1595.) Fear not death, then; let it do its worst. It can give thee but one deadly gripe that shall kill itself, and prove thy life; as the wasp that leaves its sting behind, and can sting no more. It shall but snuff the candle of thy life, and make it shine brighter when it seems to be put out; it is but an undressing, and a gentle sleep. That which thou couldst not here attain by all our preaching, and all thy prayers, and cares, and pains, thou shalt speedily attain by the help of death. It is but the messenger of thy gracious Lord, and calleth thee to Him, to the place that He hath prepared.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1596.) Death is the time when sin shall gasp its last, and so far our physician will perfect the cure; and our greatest enemy shall follow us no further. It is the door by which the soul must pass to Christ in paradise.

If any papist shall hence plead that therefore all men must be perfect without sin before death, or else go to purgatory to be cleansed, because as we die, so Christ will find us; or if they ask how death can perfect us? I answer them, "It is Christ our physician that finisheth the cure, and death is the time in which He doeth it." And if He undertake then to do it, it concerns not us to be too inquisitive how He doeth it. What if the patient understand not how blood-letting cureth the infected blood that is left behind? Must he therefore plead against his physician, and say, "It will not be done," because he knoweth not how it is done? We feel that here we have our sinful imperfections. We have for all that a promise that we shall be with Christ when death hath made its separation; and we are assured that no sin doth enter there. And is not this enough for us to know?

But yet I see not why the difficulty of the objection should trouble us at all. Death doth remove us from this sinful flesh, and admits the soul into the sight of God. And in the very instant of its removal it must needs be perfected, even by that removal, and by the first appearance of His blessed face. If you bring a candle into a dark room, the access of the light expelleth the darkness at the same instant; and you cannot say that they exist together one moment of time. So cold is expelled by the approach of heat. And thus when death hath opened the door, and let us into the immortal light, neither before nor after, but in that instant, all the darkness and sinful imperfections of our souls are dissipated. Throw an empty bottle into the sea, and the emptiness ceaseth by the filling of the water, neither before nor after, but in that instant.

If this should not satisfy any, let it satisfy them, that the Holy Ghost in the instant of death can perfect His work.

So that we need not assert a perfection on earth (which on their grounds must be the case of all that escape hell and purgatory), nor yet any purgatory torments after death, for the deliverance of the soul from the relics of sin; seeing, at the instant of death, by the Spirit, or by the deposition of the flesh, or by the sight of God, or by the sight of our glorified Redeemer, or by all, this work will be easily and infallibly accomplished. —Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1597.) So many impurities and imperfections cleave to the best of us, that it seems to me a change must take place at death only second to what took place at conversion. The holiness of the holiest man, how far short it is of the holiness of heaven! A great deal of sin is in every case left behind with the body, to be, thank God, for ever buried in its grave; and could we see the spirit at its departure, as Elisha saw his ascending master, we should see a mantle of impurity and imperfection dropped from the chariot that bears it to the skies. In the very hour of death, therefore, the Spirit of God must crown all His other labours with a rapid and extraordinary work of sanctifying. How that is done is a mystery which we cannot fathom ; but it would seem as if grace, like that species of cereus which opens its gorgeous flower only at midnight, bursts out into fullest beauty amid the darkness of a dying hour. It is enough for us to know that God will perfect that which concerneth us ; that He will bring us safely home ; and that no vessel, chartered for glory, shall be lost at the harbour's mouth. It takes one whole summer, with its showers and sunshine to ripen the fields of corn ; it takes five hundred summers to bring the oak to full maturity ; but He at whose word the earth sprang into being, bearing on its bosom loaded orchards, and golden harvests, and clustering vines, the tall palm, and the gigantic cedar, woman in full blown charms, and man in his perfect manhood, He with whom one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day, is able in the twinkling of an eye to complete and crown the work of His grace. He will do it. He that began a good work in you will carry it on to the day of the Lord Jesus ; and thus appraised in the righteousness of His Son, and wholly sanctified by the power of His Spirit, His saints shall appear before Him—"not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing."

—Guthrie.

(1598.) "This day thou shalt be with Me in paradise." He leaves his cross, and direct, as on a summer evening I have seen a lark with outspread wings drop singing into her nest, he goes up singing to his crown.

—Guthrie.

(1599.) "What a poor grovelling thing I am !" said a caterpillar to itself one day, as it toiled along over the rough road of the path-field. "Oh, how close to the earth I keep and creep !

"How I seem to envy those fluttering creatures which with spread wings rise in the air, course over the meadow, and fly or alight according to will. It must be a glorious life to live, of which a poor worm like me can form no just conception.

"Stay, though ; I ought not to indulge in thoughts that might lead unto melancholy repining, and worse rebellion, and I am not the only little being whose 'habitation is in the dust.'"

And so the caterpillar lived its little history, which admitted of various changes ; till enveloped in a hard shell provided by nature, it remained in a chrysalis state a while till it seemed to awake into a new existence ; threw off its load, and was a beautiful butterfly.

And now, it no longer crept into the earth and was confined unto the dust. Wings of brilliant hues enabled it to rise on high, to skim over fields and gardens, to luxuriate amongst fragrant flowers, and to sip honey out of their dewy cups.

"Oh, what a wondrous change, and happy life this is !" it exclaimed ; "how unlike to my original condition, when I only crept about the earth ; and how strange, that from that inactive, unconscious state when I was rolled up in my hard shell, I am transformed into the light, bright-winged creature I am, never more to be what I was !"

And so, too, the Christian feels himself being by nature of the earth, earthly. How often he mourns saying, "My soul cleaveth unto the dust" (Ps. cxix. 25). How he longs to cast off the ties that bind him down to corruption, as the Apostle, "O wretched man that I am : who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" And how ardently he craves after "the wings of a dove, to fly away, and to be at rest." Then he sleeps in his grave, till the morning of the resurrection ; and clothed with a new body, ascends to enjoy for ever the life of glory in the Paradise of heaven ; of which the poet sings,

"There shall I see, and hear, and know,
All I desired, or wished below ;
And every power find sweet employ,
In that eternal world of joy."

—Bowden.

(1600.) It does not seem to me, as I look at men in the whole round of their condition and stage of development, that on dying they can be expected to enter upon a perfected state. There is in them so much that is not developed at all, so much that is deaf and dumb, so much that is comparatively paralysed, so much that is shrunk ; there is in them so low an average of development on every side, that it seems to me impossible that anything short of a miraculous touch of re-creation can bring them in a moment, though they are set free from the body, to the attitude of perfect beings.

We enter the kingdom of heaven, in more senses than one, as little children. I take it that we leave this world to go on with our stages of discipline—not the same which we have here, but what will, in our changed conditions and circumstances, be equivalent to what discipline is in our earthly relations. But it does not seem to me rational that we shall be trudging, trudging, trudging, clear up to the moment of death, and that then we shall start up absolutely different. There will be another climate, another soil, and a nobler growth ; but there will be growth. That which you have not learned here, you must learn there. That which you have left undone in this world, you must do in the world to come.

In Labrador, the missionary, at the beginning of a short summer, sows the seed of the vine. It comes up, and gets a little start, and is taken out of the soil and husbanded during the winter, to be put out again when the next brief summer sets in. But in the course of the ten years of this missionary's life in that cold region, the vine does not get more than three or four feet high, and never shows any symptoms of bud or blossom, or cluster. The soil is too cold, and the summer is too short. At length, the missionary is recalled to his native land, and he takes this vine, the pet of his leisure, and brings it down to our southern latitudes, and plants it. It is now the same vine ; it has the same root ; but it is not the same sky that is over it. Look long, O Summer ! Look warm, O Sun ! Search and find where the hidden things in the vine are. Behold, how it begins to shoot up ! See what a stately growth it is having ! Look at the branch upon branch which it is throwing out ! Observe the smell in the air ! See the blossoms, and after the blossoms, the clusters which the autumn shall see hanging impurpled and ripened ! But it took another soil and another sun to produce it. It never would have reached that state in Labrador.

9. How the early Christians regarded it.

(1601.) There are those who look upon death as a separation from things desirable in this world. The future is hardly thought of. It is what is being left, it is letting go, it is being "unclothed"—to use the apostle's phrase—that is thought of. But there is no evidence that in the primitive Church, and among the early disciples, there were any of these thoughts or feelings. Dying, to the early Christians, was going to see the Lord.

A child that has been penned up in narrow quarters, with few playthings, and in constrained circumstances, has a grandmother and a grandfather living in the country. There is the farmhouse, full of rude abundance; there are the ample grounds; there is the brook, with fish in it; there is the big barn; and there are all manner of things in the barnyard. The child has been out there once; and he had such liberty, and found his grandma such a dear old grandma, and his grandpa such a kind old grandpa, that the days were not long enough. He had so much sport, and was made so much of, and was never scolded, and never sent to school, and had nothing to do or to think of but to play, play, play all the time, that he would have liked to abide there. But he has been taken back to the city, and he lives in a narrow house, and has to go to school, and has to do this thing and that, which are irksome to him, and is put through all the paces which are thought necessary for his education and development; and he longs for his country experience again. When spring comes round once more, the father and mother say to the little fellow, "Now, if you are a good boy, next June we are going to take you out to grandpa's." The idea of going out of the city to grandpa's! The child's mind is filled with all manner of delights. Ah, what perfect ecstasy he feels! He dreams about going, and rejoices in the thought. He does not analyse the intermediate steps, nor thinks much about them. His grandpa's is the place where, to his thought and affection, centres everything that is most heavenly—for a boy on earth, that is.

I suppose that comes nearer to representing the feelings which the primitive disciples, the early Christians, had about dying, than any other illustration that you could well make. It was to go and be with the Lord. It was to be for ever with the Lord. It was the coming of the Son of Man. It was a thought that was never dashed by an uncertainty. You can scarcely find a passage that indicates that the apostles had any doubt. There is but a single allusion in the whole of the Apostle Paul's writings which conveyed any doubt (and that was not really doubtful) on the point of death. That was in reference to his unfaithfulness in his ministerial duty. He feared that he had not fulfilled his whole duty as a preacher of the gospel of Christ, and that he should be cast away. In regard to death, I do not recollect a single instance in which there was expressed, by the early Christians, any uncertainty, or any other feeling than that of exhilaration and ecstasy.

—Becher.

10. Is still longed for by holy men.

(1602.) You will say that child is willing that calls to be put to bed; some of the saints have desired God to lay them at rest in their beds of dust; and that not in a pet and discontent with their present trouble, as Job did; but from a sweet sense of this peace in their bosoms. "Now let Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation," was the swan-like song of old Simeon. He speaks like a merchant, that had got all his goods on ship-board, and now desires the master of the ship to hoist sail, and be gone homewards. Indeed what should a Christian, that is but a foreigner here, desire to stay any longer for in the world, but to get this full lading in for heaven?

—Gurnall.

11. Is not to be impatiently desired.

(1603.) I account this body nothing but a close prison to my soul; and the earth a larger prison to my body. I may not break prison, till I be loosed by death; but I will leave it, not unwillingly, when I am loosed.

—Hall, 1574-1656.

(1604.) A dutiful child is ever looking forward to the holidays, when he shall return to his father; but he does not think of running from school before.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

(1605.) There are times, I suppose, in which the most zealous would, if it were God's will, be glad to die—to retire from the battle of life—because they think it will make no difference whether they live or die. They have such a consciousness of imperfection, of inferiority, of unfitness in themselves, that they feel that it could scarcely be worse, and that it might be much better, if they were out of the world, and their places filled by others.

What is a drop of water of itself? What can be more harmless? What is weaker? What is less potent for any effect? It is mist, invisible. It rises through the imperceptible paths of the air, and hangs unseen in the heavens, till the cold strikes it, and it congeals into clouds, and falls in the form of rain, perhaps on the mountain's top, and is sucked up by the greedy earth. Still sinking through the earth, it reaches the line of the rocks, from whose sides it oozes out and trickles down, when, finding other drops as weak as itself, they unite their forces; and the sum of the weakness of all these drops goes to make the rill; which flows on, making music as it flows, until it meets counter streams. These, combined, form the river; the rivers form the estuaries; and the estuary the ocean itself. And now, when God has marshalled the sum of the weakness of myriad drops together, they lift the mightiest ship as if it were but a feather, and play with the winds as if they were mere instruments of sport. And yet, that very drop, which a man could bear upon the end of his finger, is there, and has its part and lot in the might of the whole vast, unbounded sea.

We in our singleness, in our individuality, in our own selves, are weaker than a drop of water, and more unstable; but as gathered together in the great ocean of life, as kept together by the mighty currents which God's providences make, we attain, working together with Him, under the inspiration of His Spirit, to a might that makes life not ignoble, but sublime. It is most worthy of remark that the things that have called forth the most strength and endeavour of life have been things that we have most utterly failed in doing; while the things that seem to draw about themselves only the endeavours of weakness, have been the things that God has established most.

—Becher.

(1606.) Death is not a thing to be desired: it is not a blessing, but God's curse on account of sin. Sometimes indeed it is ignorantly longed for. Overwhelmed by misery, not a few who are without God and without hope in the world anticipate its period, and prematurely and violently terminate their earthly career. But no one can be so mistaken or so unhappy as the suicide. In their moments of despair, even good men have desired to be in the grave, whereas Job so pathetically says, "the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest ;" where the prisoners rest together, and hear not the voice of the oppressor ; where are the small and great, and where the servant is free from his master. But, like Job himself, when they have returned to calmness and confidence in God, each has said : "All the days of my appointed time will I wait, until my change come." No good man will ever deliberately wish merely to die.

The true servants of God will never dishonour Him by proclaiming that the task He sets them is so intolerable, that it were better to be as the clouds of the valley than engaged in its performance.

The true soldiers of Christ, who have been placed by Him in positions of especial difficulty, danger, and hardship, that they may peculiarly distinguish themselves, and win for Him peculiar glory, will never long merely for the ending of the campaign. They will not be perpetually contrasting the privations of war with the comforts of peace, and moaning and complaining because the conflict is prolonged. Victory, not ease, will be the supreme object of their desire. They will hate the wish to desert their post, just as they would actually to desert. Until the Captain of their salvation summons them to Himself, they will cheerfully endure hardship as His good soldiers.

Even those of Christ's followers, to whom life seems one prolonged furnace of affliction, will never forget that God placed them in it and that His eye is upon them, that He sits as a refiner and purifier of silver watching them with most anxious care, that His only desire is to purge them as gold and silver from all dross and defilement, and that as soon as the perfect reflection in them of His Image proclaims that the work is done, the scorching fire shall be removed, and each of them shall be fashioned into a vessel of honour for the Master's use : and not one of them would wish to have the fire quenched before their heavenly Father Himself sees fit to do so.

But it is not wrong for the servants to wish for the successful accomplishment of their task, nor for the soldiers to desire the victory and triumph of which they are assured, nor for those who are in the furnace to long for the moment when their purification shall be complete. And so as Paul says, "We that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened, not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life :"—not merely that we may be eased of our burden, and like the horse or ass end at once our labours and our life, but that we may attain to that more exalted state of being which God has promised us in His Word. —R. A. Bertram.

12. Sudden death.

(1607.) Lord, be pleased to shake my clay cottage before Thou throwest it down. Make it totter awhile before it doth tumble. Let me be summoned before I am surprised. Deliver me from "sudden death ;" not from sudden death in respect to itself, for I care not how short my passage be, so it be safe. Never any weary traveller complained that he came too soon to his journey's end. But let it not be sudden in respect of me. Make me always ready to receive death. Thus no guest comes unawares to him who keeps a constant table.

—Fuller, 1637-1701.

(1608.) To a man awakened by grace, sudden death will be sudden glory.

—Cecil, 1748-1810.

(1609.) I have always been peculiarly subject to sea-sickness. When I was going abroad, and all the wonders of the Continent were dazzling my imagination, I used to lie in my berth scarcely able to stir, wilted and worthless. I knew there were ten days between New York and Liverpool, and I used to say to myself, "Well, are you willing to take these ten days of nausea and universal disgust for the sake of the three months of exquisite joy which you are going to have on the Continent?" I never was so sea-sick but that I was deliberately willing to pay the price. I said, "This is about as bad as anything can well be in this world ; but for the sake of that which is beyond it I will take even this." Returning, we had a passage of seventeen days. We came with a water-logged steamship. She was loaded down deeper by many feet than she should have been. She had contraband goods to land at Halifax, which I had the pleasure of riding upon all the way across the sea. It was stormy from shore to shore, without a single fair day. But the place to which we were going was my home ; there was my family ; there was my church ; there were my friends who were as dear to me as my own life. And I lay perfectly happy in the midst of sickness and nausea. All that the boat could do to me could not keep down the exultation and joy which rose up in me. For every single hour was carrying me nearer and nearer to the spot where was all that I loved in the world. It was deep, dark midnight when we ran into Halifax. I could see nothing. Yet, the moment we came into still water I rose from my berth, and got up on deck. And as I sat near the smoke-stack while they were unloading the cargo, upon the wharf, I saw the shadow of a person, apparently going backward and forward near me. At last the thought occurred to me, "Am I watched?" Just then the person addressed me, saying, "Is this Mr. Beecher?" "It is," I replied. "I have a telegram for you from your wife." I had not realised that I had struck the continent where my family were. There, in the middle of the night, and in darkness, the intelligence that I had a telegram from home—I cannot tell you what a thrill it sent through me!

Brethren, we are all sailing home ; and by and by, when we are not thinking of it, some shadowy thing (men call it death), at midnight, will pass by, and will call us by name, and will say, "I have a message for you from home ; God wants you ; heaven waits for you."

—Beecher.

13. Its revelations.

(1610.) Alexander of Russia used often to ride in a plain carriage, incognito. A man on the road asked if he might ride with him. He got into the carriage, and after awhile was inquisitive as to the name of the man with whom he was riding. He said, "Are you a lieutenant?" "No," said the king. "Are you a major?" "No," said the king. "Are you a general?" "No," said the king ; "but I am something higher than that." The man said, "Then you must be the emperor," and was overwhelmed with his company. In this world God appears to us in strange ways. He takes us up in the chariot of His providence to ride with Him, and we know Him not. At death the disguise will be gone, and for the first it will be known to us that we have been riding with the King.

—Talmage.

IV. ENCOURAGEMENTS FOR THE FEARFUL.

1. Christ has abolished death.

(1611.) The death of the faithful seemeth indeed to be like unto the death of the unbelievers; but verily this is as great a difference as between heaven and earth. Our death is even as a death-image made of wood, which grineth with the teeth, and feareth, but cannot devour. Our death should be esteemed even as Moses' brazen serpent, which having the form and proportion of a serpent was yet without biting, without moving, without poisoning. Even so, though death be not utterly taken away, yet through the grace of God it is so weakened and made void, that only the bare proportion remaineth.

—Wermullerus, 1557.

(1612.) A pardoned soul needs not fear death. He may look on death with joy, who can look on forgiveness with faith. To a pardoned soul death hath lost his sting. Death to a pardoned sinner, is like the arresting a man after the debt is paid; death may arrest, but Christ will show the debt-book crossed in His blood. A pardoned soul may triumph over death, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

—Watson, 1696.

(1613.) For them that are His, Christ has "abolished death." Death is to them a messenger, inviting them to exchange their tabernacles of clay for palaces not made with hands; a deliverer from the fetters of time; a summons to His soldiers to lay aside their armour, and to put on the chaplet of victory; an escort to conduct home his bride, that the espousals may be consummated; a chariot to convey them from this famine-stricken land to the Goshen of perpetual plenty; a ferry to carry them once for all over the flood that rolls between this wilderness of sighs and the happy valley, whence sorrow and sighing have for ever fled. It is true their earthly stars pale and fade, but it is before the dawning of undying day.

To die is for the Christian "gain," because to him "to live is Christ." Death is the development of his life; the flower drops, and the fruit expands.

—R. A. Bertram.

2. Death is God's angel.

(1614.) The angel of sleep and the angel of death wandered in fraternal unity over the world. It was evening. They rested on a hill not far from the habitations of man. A placid calmness prevailed everywhere; even the sound of the curfew ceased in the distant hamlet.

Calmly and silently, as is their wont, the two beneficent angels of mankind held each other embraced until night approached. Then the angel of sleep arose from his mossy seat, and strewed with noiseless hand the invisible seeds of slumber.

The evening breeze carried them to the quiet dwellings of the tired country people, and sweet sleep descended on the dwellers in their rural huts, from the old man with his crutch to the babe in the cradle. The sick once more forgot their pains, the troubled soul her grief, and poverty her cares; for every eye was closed.

Now, his task being done, the beneficent angel of sleep returned to his graver brother "When the light of morning arises," he exclaimed with innocent joy, "then mankind will praise me as their friend and benefactor. What a blessing to do good in secret! How happy are we, the invisible messengers of the good Spirit! How beautiful our silent calling!" Thus spoke the gentle angel of sleep.

The angel of death gazed at him with a look of soft melancholy, and a fear, such as immortal beings shed, glistened in his large dark eye. "Alas!" said he, "would that I could enjoy cheerful gratitude like thee! The world calls me her enemy and disturber!"

"O my brother," replied the angel of sleep, "will not, at the awakening, the good man acknowledge thee as his friend and benefactor, and gratefully bless thee? Are we not brethren and messengers of one Father?"

When he spoke thus, the eye of the angel of death glistened brightly, and the fraternal spirits embraced with renewed tenderness.

—Krummacker.

3. It touches the body only.

(1615.) The egg-shell, though it be goodly and fair-fashioned, must be opened and broken, that the young chick may slip out of it. None otherwise doth death dissolve and break up our body, but to the intent that we may attain unto the life of heaven.

—Wermullerus, 1551.

(1616.) In proportion as the body falls into ruin, the spirit is disengaged and renewed; like a pure and brilliant flame, which ascends and shines forth with additional splendour in proportion as it disengages itself from the remains of matter which held it down, and as the substance to which it was attached is consumed and dissipated.

—Massillon.

(1617.) If a miserable prisoner were taken out of his dungeon to a palace, in order to receive a kingdom, you would not say that he ceases to be a man; you would not say that he discontinues to abide; you would say—"Nothing has happened to him but an advantageous change in his manner of living." So I say of this man—"Nothing has happened in death to injure him! Nothing has happened but a glorious change in his manner of living!"

—Caril, 1748-1810.

(1618.) We are only "delivered from this body" by the act of dying; and when Christ is with us, this is all that we mean by dying. That part of our nature which believes in Jesus can never die. Sickness cannot dissolve—nor fever waste—nor fracture mutilate—thought, fidelity, and love. "Strike on, strike on; thou canst not touch Anaxarchus!" So said the sage to the executioner, who was commanded to destroy him with the strokes of an iron mace; and so we may challenge death. The ship may be broken on the rocks, but the passenger will live and reach the shore; the tent may be levelled to the dust, but the tenant will survive; the believer, when he drops the burden of the flesh, though "absent from the body," is "present with the Lord."

—Stanford.

(1619.) Not long ago, a group of Alpine villagers were engaged, in early summer, weeding their crops close to their native hamlet. Above them rose mountain piled upon mountain, crested with jagged peaks of everlasting snow. A low, murmuring, crushing sound was heard at eventide, high up among these cliffs; a sound too familiar to be mistaken by experienced ears. It was the awful messenger of wrath and destruction. A fragment of rock loosened in the topmast crags, became the nucleus and feeder of the avalanche. Down came the terrific invader, sweeping all before it, and burying the handful of huts in a common ruin. The villagers escaped themselves unhurt. Disentangling their mutilated furniture from the midst of the broken pine, rafters, and stones, and thankful for their providential escape, they moved to the opposite slope of the valley, and reared their dwellings anew.

Death is that avalanche! "At such a time as we think not!" It may be in smiling spring, or in a radiant summer, or hoary winter—down it comes, destroying all that is fair and lovely and beautiful—rooting up tender flowers, budding blossoms, trellised vines, primeval forests,—overwhelming "the house of the earthly tabernacle," and leaving it a mass of dilapidated walls, and shattered timbers. But what of the inmate? What of the immortal inhabitant? The house is dissolved, but the tenant is safe. A new home is reared for it. The soul quits the wreck bodily frame-work, and seeks the "building of God, eternal in the heavens." The same idea is beautifully expressed by a Christian poet of the land of Luther in one of their funeral hymns—

"Here in an inn a stranger dwelt,
Here joy and grief by turns he felt;
Poor dwelling, now we close thy doors,
The task is o'er,
The sojourner returns no more!
"Now of a lasting home possess,
He goes to seek a deeper rest.
The Lord brought here; He calls away,
Make no delay,
This home was for a passing day."

—Macduff.

4. Even the body shall rise again.

(1620.) If an old silver goblet be melted, and new-fashioned after a beautiful manner, then is it better than before, and neither spilt nor destroyed. Even so have we just cause to complain of death, whereby the body being delivered from all filthiness, shall in his due time be perfectly renewed.

—Wermullerus, 1557.

(1621.) Is it the taking down of thine earthly tabernacle which troubles thee? Why, dost thou not know that death is the workman sent by the Father to pull down this earthly house of mortality and clay, that it may be set up anew, infinitely more lasting, beautiful, and glorious? Didst thou believe how rich and splendid He intends to make it, which cannot be unless taken down, thou wouldst contentedly endure the present toil and trouble, and be thankful to Him for His care and cost. He takes down thy vile body, that He may fashion it like to the glorious body of His own Son, which for brightness and beauty excels the sun in its best attire far more than that doth the meanest star.

Is it the untying of the knot betwixt body and soul which perplexeth thee? It is true they part; but, as friends going two several ways, shake hands till they return from their journey, they are as sure of meeting again as of parting; so thy soul shall return laden with the wealth of heaven and fetch his old companion to the participation of all his joy and happiness.

—Swinnoch, 1673.

(1622.) If in good sadness you believe the resurrection, what cause is there for so much fear of death? You can be content that your roses die, and your sweetest flowers fall and perish, and the green and beautiful complexion of the earth be turned into a bleak and withered hue, because you expect a kind of resurrection in the spring. You can boldly lie down at night to sleep though sleep be a kind of death to the body, and more to the soul, and all because you shall rise again in the morning; and if every night's sleep (or one at least) were a gentle death, if you were sure to rise again the next morning, you would make no great matter of it. Were it as common for men to die every night, and rise again in the morning, as it is to sleep every night and rise in the morning, death would not seem such a dreadful thing.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

5. Death is our deliverance from bondage.

(1623.) If a man lie in a dark miserable prison, with this condition that he should not come forth till the walls of the tower were fallen down, undoubtedly he would be right glad to see the walls begin to fall. Our soul is kept in within the body upon earth as in captivity and bonds: now as soon as the body is at a point that it must needs fall, why should we be sorry? For by this approacheth the deliverance, when we out of the prison of misery shall be brought before the most amiable countenance of God, into the joyful freedom of heaven. According to this did David pray: "Bring my soul out of prison, O Lord, that I may give thanks unto Thy name."

—Wermullerus, 1557.

(1624.) It is well known that when a jailer knocks off a prisoner's fetters, that the constant wearing them hath put him to a great deal less pain than the knocking of them off doth at the present; yet, though every blow go to the very heart of him, he never murmurs at it, but is quiet and well contented, because he knows that the pain will be compensated by the ease that he shall afterwards enjoy. Thus it is that all men here lie fettered with the irons of mortality and sin, in which case it may be, when God comes to knock off those irons by death, that they feel more pain and extremity than before; yet, because this brings to ease and everlasting rest, let them be patient in this the time of their dissolution.

—Rogers, 1636.

(1625.) When death cuts asunder the string of the body, the soul, as a dove, flies away, and is at rest.

—Watson, 1696.

(1626.) There is not in the compass of nature a more lively emblem of the soul, imprisoned in this mortal body, than (homely as the comparison may appear) that of a bird in the egg. The little animal, though thus confined, is in the midst of the scenes of its future life. It is not distance which excludes it from the air, the light, and all the objects with which it will so soon be conversant. It is in the midst of them, though utterly shut out from them; and when the moment for bursting its enclosure comes, will be ushered into a new world, and translated into scenes unknown before, not by the change of place, but by passing into another state of existence. So it is with the soul. It is now, in a certain sense, in eternity, and surrounded with eternal things. Even the body to which it is attached stands out on the surface of this globe in infinite space. Besides, the spiritual world envelopes it on every side! It is encompassed with a cloud of witnesses; innumerable spirits encamp about it; and God is as intimately present to it, as to the highest angel that beholds his face in heaven. Nevertheless to realise to itself the nearness and the presence of these natural objects, at least to know them as it will know them hereafter, is a thing impossible. Why? Not because any tract of space is interposed between the soul and them, but because the spiritual principle, while united to flesh, is by the laws of that union so imprisoned in the body as to be denied all means of intercourse with those scenes which lie around its prison walls. The hand of death alone can unbar the door, and let the spirit out into the free air and open daylight of eternity. There is one important particular more, in which this analogy holds. Unless the embryo is vivified while in the egg, it can receive no vitalising principle after. If the shell is broken, the young bird comes out dead. Thus it is also with the soul. Unless impregnated with spiritual life before it leaves the body, it will come forth still-born into eternity, and continue for ever dead in trespasses and sins.

—Woodward.

(1627.) Death, like the angel in Peter's dungeon, breaks the fetters of mortality, throws open the prison doors; and from the gloom of night and the crash of the earthquake leads the spirit out to gladsome day. Oh, that we would ever view it as such—the exodus of life—the outmarching of the soul from its chains and its bondage to the land of rest and liberty and peace!

—Macduff.

(1628.) There are in many a dungeon to-day men who have been there, unsunned, for years and years, down deeper than the roots could go. There, in their unventilated prison, vermin-covered, chilled, and almost bereft of reason itself, they drag out a miserable existence. But suppose their prison-doors should be thrown wide open, and they should be called, by some liberating army, as the Italians were, to leave their dungeons, would they think it a misfortune? Would they count liberty to be a burden, and the chance to be free again a thing to be wept about? And we, that are of the earth, earthy; we that are of the flesh, fleshly; we that are infants, undeveloped; we that have a thousand germinant points, beginnings, almost none of which are grown; we that are waiting, not for the redemption of the body, but for redemption from the body—for the enfranchisement of the spirit—shall we speak of death gloomily?

—Beecher.

6. Death is the end of all our cares and sorrows.

(1629.) We spend our years with sighing; it is a valley of tears: but death is the funeral of all our sorrows.

—Watson, 1696.

7. Death transforms the future.

(1630.) "To die is gain" to the Christian, because for him "death transforms the future." To all of us now the future is full of fear. We know it will bring with it changes. If we be spared, yet we shall be called to part with those we love, and to lay them in the silent tomb. Old age means solitariness. One by one the companions of youth depart. Grey hairs speak not only of multiplied years, but also of added griefs. The man who by reason of strength attains to fourscore years, finds himself a stranger amongst a strange generation, without any to sympathise with him, with no other solace than this, that soon he too must go the way of all flesh. But for the Christian, death changes all this. To him the future means re-union. Each year will bring home the dear ones. One by one they will come to complete the immortal circle.

You may have seen an emigrant vessel leave our shores. Oh, what tearful partings! What anguished cries! What heart-broken farewells! How those left behind strain their vision, and waive their tokens of love, so long as they can catch one glimpse of the departing sail! And when it has faded from their view, with what heavy hearts do they slowly seek their homes! But did you ever go with such a vessel to its destined port? Was there weeping there? Were there cries of anguish there? As the vessel hauled up to the dock, did you not behold, waiting, with warm welcomes, loved ones who had gone before? Were not eager hands held out to press yours in loving grasp? In the pure joy of that hour, were not all the pains of parting and all the perils of the voyage forgotten?

Ah, so it is with us here. Again and again we go down to the dark verge of eternity to bid farewell to departing friends. But a little way on their voyage can we see them. Sitting in our saddened homes, we behold not the shining ones waiting to receive them on the other shore. But while we weep, they rejoice. Friends for whom they mourned have welcomed them to the better land. For us they mourn not; not because they have forgotten us, but because they know that in a little while we too will join them, to part no more.

—R. A. Bertram.

8. Death induceth us to true joy.

(1631.) Let them fear death, who do not fear sin; but let not God's children be overmuch troubled at the grim face of that messenger, which brings them to the end of their sorrow, and the beginning of their joy. Death is yours (1 Cor. iii. 22), it is a part of the believer's inventory. Is a prince afraid to cross a narrow sea who shall be crowned when he comes to shore? Death to the saints shall be an usher to bring them into the presence of the King of glory; this puts lilies and roses into the ghastly face of death, and makes it look amiable. Death brings us to a crown of glory which fades not away: the day of death is better to a believer than the day of his birth; death is adventus ad gloriam an entrance into a blessed eternity. Fear not death, but rather let your hearts revive when you think these rattling wheels of death's chariot are but to carry you home to an everlasting kingdom.

—Watson, 1696

(1632.) The safest thing that a Christian can do is to die. An Italian made a chime of bells for his native village. So sweet was the chime that he took up his abode near it. After awhile war came. The Italian was taken into exile. The bells were captured and were also taken away. Years passed on. One day the Italian exile, in a row-boat, is being rowed up the river Shannon toward the city of Limerick, Ireland. As he comes near the wharf the cathedral tower strikes the chime; and lo, it was the same old chime of bells that had so, in other days, enchanted him. He recognised them in a moment. His emotions were too great for human endurance. He folded his arms and lay back in the boat. The rowers put down their oars and tried to resuscitate him. His face was toward the tower. But he was gone. His soul had gone out in the raptures of that hour. His life fell under the stroke of the chime of Limerick Cathedral. So may it be with us when going up from this earthly exile into the harbour of our God. May we fold our arms in peace and listen; and, while the rowers are taking us to anchorage, from turret, and dome, and palace-gate, and arch of eternal victory, may there come rippling upon our soul the music of the bells of heaven.

—Talmage.

9. Death is the day of our espousals.

(1633.) Let thy hope of heaven master thy fear of death. Why shouldst thou be afraid to die, who hopest to live by dying! Is the apprentice afraid of the day when his time comes out? He that runs a race, of coming too soon to his goal? The pilot troubled when he sees his harbour? Or the betrothed virgin grieved when the wedding day approacheth? Death is all this to thee; when that comes, thy indenture expires, and thy jubilee is come. Thy race is run, and the crown won, sure to drop on thy head when thy soul goes out of thy body. Thy voyage, how troublesome soever it was in the sailing, is now happily finished, and death doth but this friendly office for thee, to uncover and open the ark of thy body, that it may safely land thy soul on the shore of eternity at thy heavenly Father's door, yea, in His sweet embraces, never to be put to sea more. In a word, thy Husband is come for thee, and knocks with death's hand at thy door, to come forth unto Him, that He may perform His promise which in the day of thy betrothing He made to thee; and thou lovest Him but little, if thou art not willing to be at the trouble of a remove hence, for to enjoy His blissful presence, in His Father's royal palace of heaven, where such preparation is made for thy entertainment, that thou canst not know here, though an angel were sent on purpose to inform thee.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

10. Death brings us into the presence of Christ, and into the best society.

(1634.) Death is like the waggon which was sent for old Jacob, it came rattling with its wheels, but it was to carry Jacob to his son Joseph; so the wheels of death's chariot may rattle, and make a noise, but they are to carry a believer to Christ. While a believer is here, he is absent from the Lord. He lives far from court, and cannot see Him whom his soul loves: but death gives him a sight of the King of glory, "in whose presence is fulness of joy." To a pardoned soul, death is transitus ad regnum; it removes him to the place of bliss, where he shall hear the triumphs and anthems of praise sung in the choir of angels. No cause hath a pardoned soul to fear death; what needs he fear to have his body buried in the earth, who hath his sins buried in Christ's wounds? What hurt can death do to him? It is but his ferryman to ferry him over to the land of promise. The day of death to a pardoned soul is his ascension-day to heaven, his coronation-day, when he shall be crowned with those delights of paradise which are unspeakable and full of glory.

—Watson, 1696.

(1635.) Socrates, upon receiving sentence of death, said, among other things, to his judges, "Is this, do you think, no happy journey? Do you think it nothing to speak with Orpheus, Musæus, Homer, and Hesiod?"

—A. F. Russell.

11. To die is, to sleep in Jesus.

(1636.) You cannot find in the New Testament any of those hateful representations of dying which men have invented, by which death is portrayed as a ghastly skeleton with a scythe, or something equally revolting. The figures by which death is represented in the New Testament are very different. There are two of them which I think to be exquisitely beautiful. One is that of "falling asleep in Jesus." When a little child has played all day long and become tired out, and the twilight has sent it in weariness to its mother's knee, where it thinks it has come for more excitement, then, almost in the midst of its frolicking, and not knowing what influence is creeping over it, it falls back in the mother's arms, and nestles close to the sweetest and softest couch that ever cheek pressed, and, with lengthening breath, sleeps; and she smiles and is glad, and sits humming unheard joy over its head.

So we fall asleep in Jesus. We have played long enough at the games of life, and at last we feel the approach of death. We are tired out, and we lay our head back on the bosom of Christ and quietly fall asleep.

—Beecher.

12. To die is to go home.

(1637.) A child at school, when he seeth one riding past through the streets as if he would run over him or tread upon him, crieth out; but when he perceives that it is his father's man sent to bring him home from school, all the fear is past: then he laugheth and rejoiceth. So, whilst men are in the state of nature, they look upon death as an enemy, as a spoiler, as one that would bereave them of all their worldly delights; but being once the sons and daughters of God by adoption, then they apprehend death as their heavenly Father's man, riding on the pale horse, sent to bring them home from a prison on earth to a place of perfect liberty in heaven.

—Lightfoot, 1602-1675.

(1638.) Death is but a going home. A child is away at school, and the vacation is near at hand; and you may be sure that the father and mother long to see the child more than the child wants to see his father and mother. So, according to the good old custom, the father takes the carriage and wends his way to the school, perhaps with, perhaps without, intimations to the child of his coming. In the midst of his tasks on the last day, the child is suddenly greeted by the voice and presence of his father; and no sooner are the first salutations exchanged than the father says, "Are your things ready? we go to-morrow." Wine is not so sparkling as the joy in the child's heart! He can neither eat, nor sleep, nor play. The thought that his father is come, and that he is going home to see his mother, and brothers, and sisters, has quite intoxicated him.

By such glorious images as this God is pleased to represent our departure from the present life.

The Lord Jesus Christ shall come to our poor old weather-stained schoolhouse in this world, and say to us, "Come home ! you are wanted."

—Becher.

(1639.) "Then Abraham gave up the ghost." "The English word ghost," says an able critic and commentator, "is supposed to be derived from the Anglo-Saxon, 'an inmate—inhabitant—guest'—and also 'spirit.' In popular use it is now restricted to the latter meaning. But the primitive idea seems to be that of dismissing the soul or spirit as the guest of the body." In this etymological sense the reference is peculiarly beautiful. Abraham's spirit—his immortal and nobler part—was "a guest," a lodger or wayfarer in an earthly tent—a perishable dwelling. Its tent-life was not its home-life. It was like an imprisoned bird longing to soar away. And now the appointed time has come—the cage is opened—the winged tenant goes free. The tent is taken down, pin by pin—rope and stakes and canvas—and the "lodger for the night," forsaking the blackened patch in the desert—the smouldering ashes of his bivouac-fire—speeds away to "the better country,"—

"His spirit with a bound
Left its encumbering clay ;
His tent at sunrise on the ground
A dark'nd ruin lay."

—Macduff.

12. The way home is not an untried one.

(1640.) Suppose, dear friend, the thought of departing from this world to the glory-world should ever startle you, let me remind you that you are not the first that ever went that way. Your vessel is in the pool, as it were, or in the dock ; she is going out on her voyage ; oh, but you will not go alone, nor have to track your course through paths un-navigated or unknown before ! When the Portuguese captain first went by the Cape of Storms it was a venturous voyage, and he called it the Cape of Good Hope when he had rounded it. When Columbus first went in search of the New World, his was a brave spirit that dared cross the unnavigated Atlantic. But oh, there are tens of thousands that have gone whither you go. The Atlantic that severs us from Canaan is white with the sails of the vessels that are on voyage thither. Fear not, they have not been wrecked ; we hear good news of their arrival ; there is good hope for you. There are no icebergs on the road, no misis, no counter currents, and no sunken vessels or quicksands ; you have but to cut your moorings, and with Christ on board you shall be at your desired haven at once.

—Spurgeon.

14. Christ will be with us all the way.

(1641.) Where could you wish your lives to be better than in the hand of the most wise and gracious God ? If you may rest content, or have confidence in any, it is in Him. You need not doubt of His goodness, for He is goodness and love itself. And, therefore, though you see not the world to come that you are passing to, yet as long as you know that you are in the hands of love itself, what cause have you of disquiet or distrust ? Moreover you know that He is wise as well as good, and almighty as well as wise ; and, therefore, as He meaneth you no harm (if you are His children), so He will not mistake, nor fail in the performance. You need not fear, lest your happiness should miscarry for want of skill in Him that is omniscient, or for want of will in Him that is your Father, and for want of power in Him that is omnipotent. You may far better trust God with your lives than yourselves, for you have not wisdom enough to know what is best for you, nor skill to accomplish it, nor power to go through with it ; nay, you love not yourselves so well as God doth love you. Did you but believe this, you would better trust Him. You can trust yourself in a narrow ship upon the wide and raging seas, when you never saw the country that you are going to ; and all because you believe that the voyage is for your commodity, and that you have a skilful pilot. And cannot you commend your souls into the hands of God, to convey you through death to the invisible glory, as confidently as you dare commit your lives to the conduct of a man, and to a tottering ship in the hazardous ocean ?

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

15. He who has given grace to live will give grace to die.

(1642.) Such as have had no joy in their life-time, God puts in this sugar in the bottom of the cup, to make their death sweet. Now, at the last hour, when all other comforts are gone, God sends the Comforter ; and when their appetite for meat fails, God feeds them with hidden manna. Sure, as the wicked, before they die, have some apprehensions of hell and wrath in their conscience ; so the godly have some foretastes of God's everlasting favour, though sometimes their diseases may be such, and their animal spirits so oppressed, that they cannot express what they feel. Jacob laid himself to sleep on a stone, where he saw a vision—a ladder, and the angels ascending and descending ; so, when the saints lay themselves down to sleep the sleep of death, they have often a vision : they see the light of God's face, and have the evidences of His love sealed up to them for ever.

—Watson, 1696.

(1643.) Our view of death will not always be alike, but in proportion to the degree in which the Holy Spirit is pleased to communicate His sensible influence. We may anticipate the moment of dissolution with pleasure and desire in the morning, and be ready to shrink from the thought of it before night. But though our frames and perceptions vary, the report of faith concerning it is the same. The Lord usually reserves dying strength for a dying hour. When Israel was to pass Jordan, the ark was in the river ; and though the rear of the host could not see it, yet as they successively came forward and approached the banks, they all beheld the ark, and all went safely over. As you are not weary of living, if it be the Lord's pleasure, so I hope for the sake of your friends and the people whom you love, He will spare you amongst us a little longer ; but when the time shall arrive which He has appointed for your dismissal, I make no doubt but He will overpower all your fears, silence all your enemies, and give you a comfortable, triumphant entrance into His kingdom.

—Newton, 1725-1807.

DESERTION.

1. Its cause.

(1644.) In common conversation, we frequently speak of solar eclipses. But what is called an eclipse of the sun is, in fact, an eclipse of the earth, occasioned by the moon's interference or transit between the sun and us. This circumstance makes no alteration in the sun itself, but only intercepts our view of it for a time. From whence does darkness of soul, even darkness that may be felt, usually originate? Never from any changeableness in our covenant God, the glory of whose unvarying faithfulness and love shines the same, and can suffer no eclipse. It is when the world, with its fascinating honours, or wealth, or pleasures, gets between our Lord and us, that the light of His countenance is obstructed, and our rejoicing in Him suffers a temporary eclipse. —Salter.

2. Its design.

(1645.) The nurse goeth aside from the child to teach it to find its feet and see how it will go alone; the eagle when her young ones are fledged, turneth them out of the nest, not bearing them on her wings, as at other times she was wont to do, but that she may inure them to fly, flieeth from them and leaveth them to shift for themselves. Thus God seems to withdraw Himself from His children, to exercise those excellent graces of patience and confidence in Him, that, like tapers, burn clearest in the dark; to teach them to swim without bladders, and to go without crutches; as not to trust in themselves, so not to trust in the means, but in Him that worketh by them, and can work as well for them without them when they fail. —Basil Sedulæ, 382.

(1646.) A father solacing himself with his little child, and delighting in its pretty and pleasing behaviour, is wont sometimes to step aside into a corner or behind a door, on purpose to quicken yet more its love and longing after him, and try the impatience and eagerness of its affections. In the meantime he hears it cry, run about, and call upon him, and yet he stirs not, but forbears to appear; not for want of compassion and kindness, which the more it grieves the more abounds; but that it may prize more dearly the father's presence, that they may meet more merrily, and rejoice in the enjoyment of each other more heartily. Conceive, then, and consider to thine own exceeding comfort, that thy Heavenly Father deals just so with thee in a spiritual desertion. He sometimes hides His face from thee, and withdraws His quickening and refreshing presence for a time, not for want of love, for He loves thee freely; He loves thee with an everlasting love; He loves thee with the very same love with which He loves Jesus Christ; and that dear Son of His loves thee with the same love His Father loves Him; but to put more heat and life in thine affections towards Him and heavenly things; to cause thee to relish communion with Jesus Christ, when thou enjoyest it, more sweetly; to preserve it more carefully, to joy in it more thankfully, and to shun more watchfully whatsoever might rob thee of it; to stir up all the powers of thy soul, and all the graces of God in thee, to seek His face and favour again with more extraordinary and universal seriousness and industry. For we find with pleasure, possess with singular contentment, and keep with special care, what we have sought with pain.

Desertions, then, and delays of this nature are fruits of thy Heavenly Father's love, and ought to be no discouragements to thee at all, holding thy integrity. —Bolton, 1572-1631.

(1647.) The gardener digs up his garden, pulls up his fences, takes up his plants, and, to the eye, seems to make a pleasant place as a waste piece of ground; but every intelligent man knows that he is about to mend it, not to mar it—to plant it better, not to destroy it. So God is comfortably present with us, even in our spiritual desertions; and though He seems to annihilate or to reduce His new creation, yet it is to repair its ruins and to make it more beautiful and glorious. Or, as in the repairing of a house, we see how they pull down part after part, as if they intended to demolish it quite, but the end is to make it better: so, though God take away our props, it is not that we may fall, but that He may settle us in greater strength. He batters down the life of sense to put us upon a life of grace; and when He darkens our light that we cannot see, it is but to bring in fuller light into our souls; as when a star shines not, the sun appears, repairing our loss of an obscure light with his clear bright shining beams: so, though God do forsake His people, yet it is not totally, not for ever, not ceasing the affection of love, but the acts of love for some time, and when He seems to be turning a man into a desolate and ruinous condition, yet even then He is building and preparing him to be a more excellent structure. —Symonds, 1658.

(1648.) When children begin to go they use to be so well conceited of the strength of their legs that they need not any help of their nurse. To let them see their folly the nurse will leave them to themselves, that so, smarting by a fall, they may better be brought to find what need they have of their nurse. The best of us all are but babes in grace, yet do we think that we can stand of ourselves; yea, and run the ways of God too. Now, God doth refute us by our own experience, and by this mistress of fools makes us better known to ourselves; but though He leaves us for a time, yet doth He not forsake us for ever, no more than a nurse doth the weakling child. She maketh use of one fall to keep the child from many, and God doth make use of our sinning to make us see how prone we are to sin, and so prevent us for the future. —Lightfoot, 1602-1675.

3. Not to be hastily assumed.

(1649.) "Will the Lord absent Himself for ever, and will He show no more favour? is His mercy gone clean for ever? does His promise fail for ever? Has God forgotten to be merciful? Has he shut up His tender mercies wholly in displeasure? And I said this is my death, &c." Thus do the faithful cry out and complain, as if they were both without faith and feeling of any favour of God; and yet in all these distresses God is not absent from them, neither has forgotten them. Some diseases of the body are so forcible and violent, that they seem to have taken away all life and to have brought present death, yet afterwards there is a recovery contrary to the feeling of the person and judgment of the beholders; thus stands the case with many dear servants of God, who in the extremity of affliction and brunt of temptation seem to themselves and to others to have utterly lost the life of faith, and light of grace, which in former times they have felt and enjoyed. The trees in winter seem to be dead; but when spring approaches, they show by lovely effects that they had life in them. The hour of temptation with the faithful is the time of winter, they seem benumbed for a short season ; but as they gather strength, and faith begins to spring up, they shall find and feel a present operation of unspeakable comfort.

—Atterhol, 1618.

(1650.) If we be in such darkness, let us not trust to our own judgment, but let us trust the judgment of others. Oftentimes others know more by us than we by ourselves. We ought to yield much to the discerning of Christians in this kind. It is an easy matter when all things go well with us, to have comfort and to be fruitful ; but when we are in our dumps, and in the hour of temptation, then it is not so easy. When a tree bears a great deal of fruit, and abounds with leaves, it is an easy matter to say, this is a fruitful tree ; but when in winter the sap falls to the root, is covered with snow and frost, the leaves shaken off, and the root that is unseen lies hid, then it requires some judgment and former experience to say, This tree has life, and is fruitful, though now there appears none. So a Christian may be in such an estate, that he requires the judgment of some others to look upon him. When in such a case, he must go to former times, for God's love is constant, always like Himself. And go to the secret working of grace ; when outwardly there appears little, go to the pulses. As if we would know whether a man who is in a swoon has life and breath, we go to feel the pulses to see if there be any breath remaining ; so in a case of desertion, or seeming deadness of spirit, try which way the soul goes in the desires of it. Is there not a desire to please God ? Are there not groans and endeavours with those desires ? Are not these desires restless, and thy soul unsatisfied ? Thou dost not content thyself with a little faith, but thou desirest more and more, and thou art ashamed because thou hast so little. This is the pulse's beating, and the breathing of a living soul. Yield not to Satan who tells thee there is no ground for thee to be assured of thy estate. Where we find these evidences of a living soul, we ought to believe there is true life there ; which I speak to those, who, without cause, are carried to doubt of their estates.

—Sibbes, 1577-1635.

(1651.) When I see my Saviour hanging in so forlorn a fashion upon the cross ; His head drooping down, His temples bleeding with thorns, His hands and feet with the nails, and His side with the spear ; His enemies round about Him, mocking at His shame, and insulting over His impotence : how should I think any otherwise of Him, than, as Himself complaineth forsaken of His Father ? But, when again I turn mine eyes, and see the sun darkened, the earth quaking, the rocks rent, the graves opened, the thief confessing to give witness to His Deity ; and when I see so strong a guard of providence over Him, that all His malicious enemies are not able so much as to break one bone of that body, which seemed carelessly neglected : I cannot but wonder at His glory and safety. God is ever near, though oft unseen ; and, if He wink at our distress, He sleepeth not. The sense of others must not be judges of His presence and care ; but our faith. What care I, if the world give me up for miserable, while I am under His secret protection ? O Lord, since Thou art strong in our weakness, and present in our senselessness, give but as much comfort in my sorrow, as Thou givest me security, and at my worst I shall be well.

—Hall, 1574-1656

(1652.) Did you ever read that Christ did finally forsake a man in whose heart and soul He still did leave His goods, furniture, and spiritual household stuff ? A man sometimes goes from home, and sometimes He does not quite leave his house. There is much difference between those two. If a man leave his house and comes no more, then he carries away all his goods ; and when ye see them carried away, ye say, This man will come no more. But though a man ride a great journey, yet he may come again ; and ye say, "Surely he will come again." Why ? Because still his goods, wife, and children are in his house. So if Christ reject a man and go away finally, He carries away all His goods, spiritual gifts, graces, and principles. But though He be long absent, yet if His household stuff abide in the heart,—if there be the same desires after Him, and delight in Him, and admiring of Him,—ye may say, "Surely, He will come again." Why ? Because His household stuff is here still. When did Christ ever forsake a man in whose heart He left this spiritual furniture ?

—Bridge, 1600-1670.

(1653.) A man's heart is like those two-faced pictures : if you look towards one side of them, you shall see nothing but some horrid shape of a devil, or the like ; but go to the other side, and you shall see the picture of an angel, or of some beautiful woman, &c. So some have looked over their hearts by signs at one time, and have to their thinking found nothing but hypocrisy, unbelief, hardness, self-seeking ; but not long after, examining their hearts again by the same signs, they have espied the image of God drawn fairly upon the table of their hearts.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

(1654.) There is a large class who would confound nature and grace. These are chiefly women. They sit at home, nursing themselves over a fire, and then trace up the natural effects of solitude and want of air and exercise into spiritual desertion. There is more pride in this than they are aware of. They are unwilling to allow so simple and natural a cause of their feelings, and wish to find some thing in the thing more sublime.

—Cecil.

4. Terribleness of the calamity.

(1655.) When the king removes, the court and all the carriages follow after, and when they are gone, the hangings are taken down ; nothing is left behind but bare walls, dust, and rubbish. So, if God removes from a man or a nation, where He kept His court, His graces will not stay behind ; and if they be gone, farewell peace, farewell comfort ; down goes the hangings of all prosperity, nothing is left behind but confusion and disorder.

—Stoughton, 1628.

5. Encouragements for the desponding.

(1656.) God being a Father, if He hide His face from His child, it is in love. Desertion is sad in itself, a short hell (Job vi. 9). When the light is withdrawn, dew falls. Yet we may see a rainbow in the cloud, the love of a Father in all this.

Firstly, God hereby quickens grace. Perhaps grace lay dormant (Cant. v. 2). It was as fire in the members ; and God withdraws comfort, to invigorate and exercise grace : faith is a grace that sometimes shines brightest in the dark night of desertion (Jonah ii. 4).

Secondly, When God hides His face from His child, yet still He is a Father, and His heart is towards His child : as Joseph, when he spake roughly to his brethren, and made them believe he would take them for spies ; still his heart was full of love, and he was fain to go aside and weep : so God's bowels yearn to His children, when He seems to look strange. "In a little wrath I hid My face from thee, but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee." Though God may have the look of an enemy, yet still He hath the heart of a father.

—Watson, 1696.

(1657.) Sometimes God takes away from a Christian His comforting presence, but He never takes from a Christian His sustaining presence. You know the difference between sunshine and daylight. We have often daylight, but little sunlight. A Christian has God's daylight in his soul when he may not have sunlight ; that is, he has enough to light him, but not enough to cheer and comfort him. Never was Jesus so forsaken by God's comforting presence as when He said, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" and yet, never was He so strengthened by God's sustaining presence, for angels were at His service to minister to Him and to take care of Him if He needed their ministry.

—Cumming.

4. The only consolation.

(1658.) All the world does them no good without the favour of God. As all the stars though they shine together, do not dispel the darkness of night ; so no creatures can comfort us sufficiently when God hides His face. "Thou didst hide Thy face and I was troubled." They cannot find God as they were wont. As at funeral feasts, dear friends have little comfort when they miss their old friend that was wont to bid them welcome at the house ; so when God is gone, what comfort can they take in their portion? Many will say, Why are you pensive and sad? you have a great many friends, a great estate. Oh, you do not know the wound of a gracious heart, and how little these things are in comparison of the favour of God.

—Manton, 1620-1667.

(1659.) The wounds of conscience which are in God's people are of the quality that none but God can cure them ; for the chief thing that wounds them is the loss of God's favour, not simply His wrath. For it is the glory of God and His favour, not self-love only, that makes them seek Him ; therefore nothing gives peace but the restoring of His favour and the light of His countenance ; the same dart that wounded must heal again : "I smote him, and I will heal him." And as one that is sick with love, when love is the disease, no physic, no persuasion of friends can cure it, nothing but only the love of the party beloved ; so when a soul is wounded for the loss of God's love, not all the things in the world can cure the heart ; but one word from Him, one good look, one promise from Him that we are His, stills all and only can give peace. Like to a poor child that cries for its mother ; let who will dandle it, and play with it, and use it ever so kindly, yet it will not be stilled till the mother comes ; so it is with a poor soul that cries after God day and night.

—Goodwin, 1600-1679.

DEVIL. THE

1. His existence not incredible.

(1660.) No man acquainted with men need have any philosophical scruple in believing in the existence of evil spirits. If there are any spirits worse than some men, I am sorry for them! No man who watches what men do to each other need have any scruple as to the belief that evil spirits are occupied in tempting men. We can conceive of nothing done by a spirit, in the way of malignant temptation, that is worse than that which we see every day among living men. And those who doubt whether a benevolent God would allow a malign spirit to tempt His creatures, surely must have lived with their eyes shut. The question is settled in every street, that God does allow men to live, whose business seems to be very largely that of pleasing themselves by injuring others. Those who have doubts on this subject cannot have considered the indisputable fact, that God does allow bad spirits in the flesh to tempt men to evil. Nor do I know why there should be any reason to suppose that He does not allow bad spirits out of the flesh to do the same thing.

—Becher.

(1661.) We find upon self-inspection, that our temptations, though manifold and enigmatical, evidently arise from three distinct sources, and are of three distinct kinds. There are temptations from the world : all know what they are, and have experienced them. There are also temptations from the flesh. Between the two classes we can easily distinguish. There is also a third class, which, upon strict analysis, appears to differ entirely from those of the world and the flesh. Who has not been startled at times with those evil suggestions which flash into the soul without apparent cause or connection, let fly against us like burning arrows from an unseen hand? They are "fiery darts," as the Apostle forcibly calls them. Good men have confessed that without the slightest reason, and from no recognised agency, they have felt of a sudden an impulse to commit the most horrid crimes ever perpetrated. They would tempt and ruin some victim, strike some fatal blow, or leap from some precipice upon the rocks, or into the sea. How mortifying, how humiliating, for a pure heart to encounter such experiences! It is some relief to feel that we are not the sole cause of their existence ; that we are not so bad as the instigation would lead us to think we are ; and that, when we drown or quench these darts of fire, no harm will befall us. The question recurs, whence this peculiar form or style of temptation—these depressions that come upon us when we have done the best and have the least occasion for them? The hardness of heart, the restlessness of aim and purpose, these and other evil suggestions, have they no cause? Are these the forms of temptation which ordinarily come to us from the world and the flesh? Every thinking man, in accounting for such personal experiences, feels that it is folly to have recourse to abstraction. It is a pigmy philosophy which does not recognise in them a producing evil force, or which attempts to ignore their existence altogether. The tempest that springs suddenly out of a dead calm, tearing the sea from its foundations, and flinging it against the skies, must have a powerful cause somewhere; seen or unseen, a cause there must be. The frightful heaving of a burning volcano must be produced by an existing force. So also must this spiritual earthquake, this frightful sea of evil passions, which surges about and sometimes threatens to engulf us, be produced by a power not figurative, but literal. Actual force in a living spirit, as the psychological root, becomes an absolute necessity.

—Townsend.

2. "The prince of the power of the air."

(1662.) One thing is perfectly clear from this passage (Eph. ii. 2.), that these extra-terrestrial beings form "a power." Undoubtedly each one of them has his own distinct personality and individuality; but, in their peculiar aspects towards man, they collectively constitute "a power." Fifty thousand men standing on a plain do not necessarily constitute an army. They may be only a crowd, an assemblage of so many separate bodies.

Many things are necessary before they can become an army. Every man among them must be drilled; every man must be taught subordination; every man must be equipped with weapons, and must know not only how to use them, but he must know to fire his musket without shooting his comrades instead of the enemy. When all this is done, the fifty thousand men become an army; but even then they are not a "power."

Before this can be, there must be a head, a controlling mind, to direct all this force, and to combine the separate energies of all in one grand plan.

In this view, Satan is, "the prince of the power of the air." These dark hosts are under his direction. Under him they can act together, they can concentrate their energies in one object. Probably their misery and their ceaseless mutual recriminations would render them powerless for any undertaking except that of tormenting one another, or of blaspheming God, were it not for the superior energy of their prince, who guides their actions, and infuses a pressure of his own energy into their otherwise helpless and despairing ranks. The organisation of the Jesuits, where we see displayed such complete abnegation of self, such deliberate submission of the individual judgment to the orders of their chief, such concentration of information, such profound secrecy and clever deceit, such power of communicating the superior's will to the ends of the earth, as certainly as pulsation is communicated to the extremities of the body, may help us to form some conception of the dominion exercised by "the prince of the power of the air:" only, instead of hundreds of agents, we must conceive of millions instead of sluggish human bodies active spiritual beings; instead of a station here and there, an organisation as widely extended as humanity, not forgetting even the ship's crew on the distant and lonely sea; instead of the infirm and erring judgment of a human chief, the high and acute intelligence of one who was formerly "son of the morning," and a prince among the blessed angels.

—L. H. Wiseman.

3. In what sense he is "the god of this world."

(1663.) Satan obtained the world by conquest; but conquest is a cracked title. A thief is not the more honest because he was able to force the poor traveller to deliver his purse; and a thief on the throne, like Satan, is no better than a private one on the road.

—Gurnall, 1617-1679.

4. Is neither omniscient nor omnipotent.

(1664.) It must have occurred to every thoughtful reader of the Bible, that the passages in which the inferior demons are mentioned are very few in comparison of those in which their chief, Satan, is named. We are not to infer from this that they take an unimportant part in extending the empire of evil; any more than when reading that Cromwell defeated the Royalists at Marston Moor, or that Nelson routed the combined fleet at Trafalgar, we infer that the soldiers of the one, or the ships of the other, took an unimportant part in the battle.

It is needful to be aware of this, lest we unconsciously attribute to the devil powers approaching very nearly to omniscience or omnipresence. Satan may be able to move as rapidly as the electricity along the telegraphic wire, but he cannot be in more than one place at the same instant. Neither can he know everything, or do everything.

—L. H. Wiseman.

5. His discernment of our thoughts.

(1665.) An angler, having baited his hook, throws it into the water: the fish, having espied the bait, after two or three vagaries about it, nibbles at it, and after awhile swallows down the bait, hook, and all. The fisher sees none of all this; but, by the sinking of the cork, he knows that the fish is taken. Thus, the devil, though a most cunning angler, knows not the thoughts of men, such as are mere pure thoughts: that is God's peculiar; it is He that searcheth the heart and trieth the reins: but if we write or speak, if the cork do but stir, if our countenance do but change, he is of such perspicuity, and so well experienced withal, that he will soon know what our thoughts are, and suit his temptations accordingly.

—Holdsworth, 1680.

6. Our adversary.

(1666.) Let us watch Satan, for he watcheth us. There is no corporeal enemy, but a man naturally fears; the spiritual foe appears less terrible, because we are less sensible of him. Great conquerors have been chronicled for victories and extension of their kingdoms; Satan is beyond them all. Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands; but Satan his millions. He that fights with an enemy, whom nothing but his blood can pacify, will give him no advantage.

—Adams, 1653.

7. Our accuser.

(1667.) If we know that we have an adversary at the next door, that pries into all our courses, and upon the least error will sue us on an action of trespass, we will be circumspect to disable him of advantage. Satan no sooner spies our wanderings, but he presently runs with a complaint to God, bills against us in the star-chamber of heaven; where the matter would go hard with us, but for the great Lord Chancellor of peace, our Advocate Jesus Christ.

—Adams, 1653.

8. His craft.

(1668.) Even as the fisher, when he taketh some great fish, doth not by and by violently strike and twitch it, but letteth his fishing line go at the length, until the fish do swallow down the hook and so work its own destruction; lest if, at the first, he should twitch it too hard, the fishing line should break, and his bait and hook lost, the fish should escape: even so Satan, when he hath gotten a poor sinner fast upon his hook, and hath entangled him in the chains of some deadly sin, and hath bewitched him with the sorceries of the flesh and the world, doth not suddenly oppress and exasperate him, lest, at the first dash, playing the devil openly and roughly, the sinner should break his bands and escape his snares; but he doth cherish him and make much of him, and doth suffer him now and then both to speak and to do some things that savour of virtue, that by little and little, he being made fast and dead sure upon the hook of sin, he may by degrees work his own woe and utter destruction; so that the devil doth stretch out his angling rod, thread, and all, not that he may let the sinner escape, but that he may make him the surer and hold him the faster.

—Cawdray, 1609.

(1669.) Meditate concerning the wicked one, his cunning and policy. As the eagle, when he seizes upon a carcass, will first pick out the eyes, and then feed on its flesh; so Satan first blinds the mind, and then leads them hood-winked to hell. As the eagle carries the shell-fish into the air, only that he may break them by their fall, and devour them; so the devil by his costly courtesy advances many to their destruction. As birds are caught with several baits by the fowler, some with chaff, some with corn, some with day-nets, some with a low-bell, so the arch-fowler has various ways to seduce and catch poor souls. "Ye are not ignorant of his devices."

—Swinnock, 1673.

(1670.) It is observable that a forester goeth usually in green, suitable to the leaves of the trees and the grass of the forest, so that by this means the most observant in all the herd never so much as distrusteth him till the arrow sticks in his side. And thus the devil shapes himself to the fashions of all men. If he meet with a proud man, or a prodigal man, then he makes himself a flatterer; if a covetous man, then he comes with a reward in his hand. He hath an apple for Eve, a grape for Noah, a change of raiment for Gehazi, a bag for Judas. He can dish out his meat for all palates; he hath a last to fit every shoe; he hath something to please all conditions, to suit with all dispositions whatsoever.

—Jenkyne, 1612-1685.

(1671.) Satan chooseth the fittest season to tempt in. As a cunning angler casts in his angle when the fish will bite best; the devil can hit the very joint of time when a temptation is likeliest to prevail.

—Watson, 1696.

(1672.) As the husbandman knows what seed is proper to sow in such a soil; so Satan finding out the temper, knows what temptation is proper to sow in such a heart. That way the tide of a man's constitution runs, that way the wind of temptation blows; Satan tempts the ambitious man with a crown, the sanguine man with beauty, the covetous man with a wedge of gold. He provides savoury meat, such as the sinner loves.

—Watson, 1696.

9. His diligence.

(1673.) Some there are that will go from Rome to England to make proselytes; but the devil will go from one end of the world to the other, and walk from pole to pole, till he hath put a girdle about the loins of the earth, to make a man the "child of hell like himself."

—Adams, 1653.

(1674.) It was Hannibal's saying of Marcellus, that he had to do with him who could never be quiet, neither conqueror nor conquered; but conqueror, he would pursue his victories, and conquered, labour to recover his loss. But much rather may a man say the like of Satan, that most wrathful and most watchful enemy; who is never idle, but ever employed in sowing cockles amongst the Lord's good corn; who, though we stoutly resist him and overcome him for a while, yet will he never rest, but will be tempting again—yea, will not cease to tempt us again and again, with the same temptations, hoping at length to win our consent and so give us the foil in the conclusion.

—Woodmoth, 1658.

10. How he exercises his sway.

(1675.) Satan exercises his sway, in part, by direct suggestion to our minds. Some persons doubt the possibility of this. "We communicate with one another by means of the bodily organs. The eye, the ear, the touch, &c., are the only avenues to the soul. We can receive no ideas except through the medium of sensation."

Such assertions are contrary to experience. That the eye is not the only medium of sight, those of us who have seen patients in certain abnormal physical conditions must be fully convinced; and so must every one who has seen his little daughter in a dream, and heard her talk. But not to insist on this, have you never received from other persons, impulses, emotions, thoughts, without any intervention of the physical organs? What is the mysterious power in an assembly, which, in our ignorance, we vaguely call "sympathy"? By what power is one heart attracted to another heart, or repelled from it, without any word, or look, or gesture which could consciously account for it? How is it that you sometimes know the wishes or the sorrows of your friend, not from his words, not from his looks, not from mental induction, but in some way independent of all these? We can, to some extent, where there is mutual susceptibility, communicate with each other, without the intervention of the bodily organs.

But these objections are still more distinctly refuted by experience. Who is there that has not felt conscious, at some period or other, and perhaps often, that some spirit was speaking to his spirit?

An instantaneous inward warning which saves from an unperceived danger, a moral precept or a Scripture threatening spoken to the soul in the moment of temptation, an unaccountable impulse to go and see some whom, on our arrival, we found to be dying, or otherwise requiring our presence, these are familiar instances in common life.

—L. H. Wiseman.

11. Why his suggestions are undetected.

(1676.) There are two reasons why the suggestions of Satan may be expected to be often undetected by us: one reason exists in ourselves, the other in him.

One reason why we often fail to detect the suggestions of Satan lies in ourselves. It is that they are so conformable to our natural inclinations, that we do not easily imagine they come from without.

You can at once distinguish an Englishman from a negro; but you cannot so easily distinguish between a negro of one race, and a negro of another, they are so nearly alike. So the pure suggestions of the Holy Spirit can be traced to their celestial organ at once; we know that our sinful hearts could not have originated them: but the dark promptings of the evil one are so much like our own dark and ungodly desires, that we do not readily discern the difference. In a painting, bright figures upon a dark ground show vividly; but dark figures upon a dark ground are more obscurely seen. In leading us to carelessness and transgression, Satan has often only to quicken and keep alive desires which we should have felt without his influence, and to obscure our vision of better things. His counsels are agreeable; he swims with the stream of corrupt nature: no wonder, then, that men are often slow to perceive his influence over them.

Another reason lies with the wicked one himself. He knows that he can often work most effectually where his presence is least expected. As a perfect orator wholly forgets himself, being absorbed in his subject, so Satan, as a consummate tempter, is willing to be himself forgotten, if his desire be accomplished. Nay, he is aware that the accomplishment of those ends often requires that he should keep himself out of sight. A thief never wishes to make himself conspicuous. Accordingly, the most subtle and dangerous temptations are precisely those which we least imagine come from the devil; and Satan never has so great mastery over a man as when he denies his existence.

It is thus the prince of this world rules in the hearts of the children of disobedience; not ostentatiously, but not the less effectually. His great strength lies in secrecy, especially when intellectualism has made men despise superstition and superstitious terrors. The nineteenth century man of science laughs at the poor Irish grandmother who is in bodily fear of being bewitched, or at the heathen Sioux who lives in terror of the evil eye; for he can demonstrate the absurdity of witchcraft, and the fixity and universality of physical laws; and in his heart he laughs at the idea of the devil having anything to do with this world, and particularly with those whose minds have been trained in scientific habits. But what if we could lift the veil, and see how the devil laughs at him as he laughs at the Irish grandmother! The one believes too much, the other too little. In the one, ignorance begets terror; in the other, the conceit of knowledge leads to false security.

—L. H. Wiseman.

12. Is a hard master.

(1677.) The devil is, after all, a hard master. Under the guise of great liberality, he extorts severe conditions; he demands a great price for everything he has to offer. Although he pretended to make over to the Lord Jesus all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, it was at no less a price than that of falling down to worship him. He ever acts thus with those who enter his service; only that the hard part of the condition is not usually named at first, but discovered by bitter experience afterwards—as the fish at first tastes only the bait, but afterwards feels the barbed hook.

—L. H. Wiseman.

13. Is not to be overcome by mere words.

(1678.) Satan is not such a babe, to be out faced with a word of defiance. He can bear a few invectives, so he may be sure of the soul; like a usurer, that can endure to be railed on, so his money comes trolling in.

—Adams, 1653.

14. Has no power to force us to sin.

(1679.) No man can justly charge his sins upon the devil as the cause of them; for God has not put it into the power of our mortal enemy to ruin us without ourselves; which yet He had done, had it been in the devil's power to force us to sin. The devil can only tempt and allure, but compel he cannot; he may inveigle, but he cannot command our choice; and no man yet ever suffered death who did not choose death: the fisher may propose, and play the bait before the fish, but he cannot force it to swallow it. And so whatsoever the devil does, he does by insinuation, and not by compulsion.

The Spirit of God assures us that he may be resisted, and that upon a vigorous resistance he will fly. He never conquers any but those who yield; a spiritual fort is never taken by force, but by surrender. And when a man is as willing to be ruined as he is to ruin him, it is that that makes the devil triumphant and victorious. How silly and creepingly did he address himself to our first parents! which surely his pride would never have let him do could he have effected their downfall by force, without temptation.

It is confessed, indeed, that the guilt of those sins that the devil tempts us to will rest upon him, but not so as to discharge us. He that persuades a man to rob a house is guilty of the sin he persuades him to, but not in the same manner that he is who committed the robbery; for it was in his power, after all the other's persuasions, to have forborne the fact, and to have maintained his innocence; for no man is a thief or a villain against his will.

In vain therefore do men shift off their sins upon the devil, whose greatest arts they may frustrate, whose strongest solicitations they may make ineffectual: for it is in their power (as I may so say) in some respects to make the devil himself innocent. But still the load of all must lie upon him; and it is not he that commits, but he that tempts to sin, that must be the sinner. It seems to be with the devil, in respect of the disorders of the soul, as it is with the spleen in respect of the distempers of the body; whatsoever is amiss, or indisposed, the charge is sure to lie there.

But howsoever men may mock themselves with such evasions, yet God will not be mocked, who knows that He left the soul in its own keeping, and made the will free, and not to be forced: and therefore these fig-leaves will fall off when He shall come to scrutiny and examination. Every man shall bear his own burden, and the devil himself shall have but what is his due.

—South, 1633-1716.

DISCONTENT.

L. ITS FREQUENCY.

(1680.) Many may sit down silently, forbearing discontented expressions, yet are inwardly swollen with discontentment. Now this manifests a perplexed distemper, and a great frowardness in their hearts; and God, notwithstanding their outward silence, hears the peevish fretting language of their souls. The shoe may be smooth and neat without, whilst the flesh is pinched within. There may be much calmness outwardly, and yet wonderful confusion and vexation within.

—Burroughs, 1599–1646.

II. ITS CAUSES.

1. The perversion of our nature.

(1681.) Oh, sirs, men fall out with their outward conditions, and are discontented at their rank and place in the world ; but the fault lies more inward. The shoe is straight and good enough, but the foot is crooked that wears it. All would do well, if thou wert well ; and thou wilt never be well, till thou art righteous and holy.

—Gurnall, 1617–1679.

(1682.) A bad mind lives in things and for things, or we might rather say, under things. Condition, pleasure, show, are its god. And then it follows that the worship is only another name for distemper, unreason, hallucination. It is not positively insane, but what is very nearly the same thing, unsane—a nature out of joint, poisoned, racked with pains, a cloudy, wild, ungoverned, misconceiving power. It knows nothing but things, and if things do not bless it, what can it do but fall to cursing? Being a distempered organ, it sees its distempers only in things and conditions around it. Thus when a diseased ear keeps up a nervous drumming in the brain, all sweetest music will have drumming in it. So if the taste is bittered by some dyspeptic woe, it will find that bitter savour in all most delicate things, and even in the pure waters of the spring. So also, I suppose, if the humours of the eye were jaundiced, the pure light of heaven would be yellowed also. Even the sun is smoky seen through a smoked glass. Just so we are meeting all sorts of bitter, painful, and bad things in our life, just because we are bitter, painful, bad ourselves, and cannot see that this is the root of our misery.

—Bushnell.

2. Our lack of grace.

(1683.) As it is with a vessel that is full of liquor, if you strike upon it, it will make no great noise ; but if it be empty, then it makes a great noise : so it is with the heart. A heart that is full of grace and goodness within, will bear a great many strokes and never make any noise ; but an empty heart, if that be struck, will make a noise. Those that are so much complaining, it is a sign that there is an emptiness in their hearts. A man that has his bones filled with marrow, and veins filled with good blood, complains not of cold as others do : so a gracious person having the Spirit of God within him, and his heart filled with grace, has that within him that makes him find contentment.

—Burroughs, 1599–1646.

3. Spiritual sloth.

(1684.) Who are the men that are most discontented, but idle persons? Persons that have nothing to take up their minds, every little thing disquiets and discontents them. A man that has business of great consequence, if all things go well with his great business, he is less sensible of meaner things ; but a man that lies at home and has nothing to do, finds fault with everything. So it is with the heart. When the heart of a man has nothing to do but to be busy about creature comforts, every little thing troubles him ; but when the heart is taken up with the weighty things of eternity, these things that are here below, that did disquiet it before, are things now of no consideration with him, in comparison to the other ; however things fall out here, they are not much regarded by him, if the “one thing” that is “necessary” be provided for.

—Burroughs, 1599–1646.

4. Headlessness of the blessings of our lot.

(1685.) When we enjoy good things, we look at the grievances which are mingled with the good, and forget the good ; which, when it is gone, then we remember. The Israelites could remember their onions and garlic, and forget their slavery (Num. xi. 5). So, because manna was present, they despised manna, and that upon one inconvenience it had, “it was ordinary with them” (Num. xxi. 5).

—Sibbes, 1577–1635.

(1686.) These complaints arise from the corrupt flesh, which is so wholly intent upon the present smart which it feels, that it utterly forgets all God's blessings, which we either have formerly enjoyed in time past, or do enjoy in and after our afflictions ; and through impatience robs us of those comforts God has given us, which if they were duly pondered in the balance of an impartial judgment, would not only counterpoise, but even much outweigh the causes of our griefs. Wherein we are not unfitly compared to flies, who leave all the sound flesh, though of far greater quantity, and seek out only sores to suck in ; or to little children, who if any of their delights be taken from them, in their peevishness cast away all the rest, and fall a crying. For so, in our frowardness, if we have not all we desire, we think that we have nothing ; if God cross us in any one benefit, by taking it from us, we are ready to cross ourselves in all the rest, casting them away by careless neglect, whereas they should serve as comforts to moderate our grief.

—Downname, 1644.

5. Forgetfulness of the greater trials that befall others.

(1687.) “I don't know,” said the turnstile one day in a reflective mood,—“I don't know that I ought to have thought so ill of my lot, and to have fretted over it, as I have done.

“Tis true, a turnstile has plenty of worry, as I have truly proved ; worry and whirl all the day long !

“Nobody will ever pass without giving a turnstile a swing round ; and whoever returns, ten to one but he gives the turnstile a whirling twist the other way !

“Indeed I have said that I wouldn't wish to any one, whether friend or foe, the life of a poor turnstile. No.—But then, as that old wheel of the waggon said yesterday—Mine's a pleasant life and a favoured lot compared with his ! If I have to turn round, he has the same ; and whilst he has the burden of the cart, there is besides the weight of the load it carries pressing on him ; and I have no incumbances.

“So, on the whole, perhaps I'd better try and be satisfied, that is, as satisfied as I can afford to be, with so many turns about as must in my situation naturally come to my lot.”

Not a few of life's troubles are self made ; and some will complain, who, on comparing other people's trials with theirs, will see the lightness of their own; and should thankfully say:—"The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage."

—Bowden.

III. ITS UNREASONABLENESS.

1. This life is a journey.

(1688.) Though we do meet with traveller's fare sometimes, yet it should not be grievous to us. The scripture tells us plainly that we must behave ourselves here but as pilgrims and strangers:—"Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts which war against the soul." Consider what your condition is,—you are pilgrims and strangers; do not think to satisfy yourselves here.

A man when he comes into an inn, if there be a fair cupboard of plate, is not troubled that it is not his own. Why? Because he is going away. So let us not be troubled when we see other men have great estates, but we have not. Why? We are going away into another country. You are lodging here but as it were for a night; if you should live a hundred years, in comparison with eternity it is not so much as a night, it is but as if you were travelling and were come into an inn: and were not this madness, for a man to be discontented because he has not what he sees there, seeing, it may be, he is to go away again within half a quarter of an hour?
—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

2. This life is a voyage.

(1689.) When you are abroad at sea, though you have not those many things that you have at home, you are not troubled at it; you are contented. Why? You are abroad at sea; you are not troubled at storms that arise, and though you have many things otherwise than you would have them at home, still you are quieted with that—you are at sea. Mariners, when they are at sea, care not what clothes they have then, though they be pitched and tarred; but they think when they come home, then they shall have their brave suits and be very fine. They are contented abroad upon that thought, that it shall be otherwise with them when they come home; and though they have nothing but salt meat and a little hard fare, yet when they come to their houses then they shall have anything. Thus it should be with us in this world. We are all in this world but as seafaring men, tossed up and down on the waves of the sea of this world, and our haven is heaven.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

3. This life is a warfare.

(1690.) We are not only travellers, but soldiers: therefore we are to behave ourselves accordingly. The Apostle makes use of this argument in writing to Timothy:—"Thou therefore endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." The very thought of the condition of a man that is a soldier stills his disquiet of heart. When he is abroad, he has not that accommodation in his quarters that he has in his own family; perhaps a man that has his bed warm, and curtains drawn about him, and all his accommodations in his chamber, now sometimes he must be put to lie upon straw; and he thinks with himself, "I am a soldier, and it is suitable to my conditions." He must have his bed warmed at home, but he must lie abroad in the fields when he is a soldier; and the very thought of this condition in which he stands quiets him in all things, and he goes rejoicing to think, "This is but suitable to my condition in which God has put me." So it should be with us in respect of this world. Would it not be an unseemly thing, to see a soldier go whining up and down with his finger in his eye, and complaining that he has not hot meat every meal, and his bed warmed, as he had at home? Now, Christians know that they are in their warfare; they are here in this world combating with the enemies of their souls, and they must be willing to endure hardness here. The right understanding of this, that God has put them into such a condition, is that which will content them, especially when they consider that they are certain of the victory, and that ere long they shall triumph with Jesus Christ, and then all their sorrows shall be done away, and their tears wiped from their eyes.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

4. Our trials bear no proportion to our comforts.

(1691.) Suppose a man has a very fair house to dwell in, and he has fair orchards and gardens, and set about with tall brave trees for ornament; what a most unreasonable thing were it for him to be weeping and wringing his hands because the wind blows off a few leaves off his trees, when he has abundance of all kinds of fruit! Thus it is with many: though they have a great many comforts about them, yet some little matter, the blowing off a few leaves from them is enough to disquiet them.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(1692.) Suppose God gives a woman a child that is very comely, and has excellent parts, wit and memory; but it may be there is a wart that grows upon the finger of the child, and she murmurs at it, and what an affliction is that to her! She is so taken up with that, that she forgets to give any thanks to God for her child, and all the goodness of God to her in her child is swallowed up in that. Would you not say, this were a folly and a very great evil in a woman so to do? Truly our afflictions, if we weighed them aright, are but such kind of things in comparison with our mercies.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

5. Former prosperity is a reason, not for murmuring, but for thankful remembrance.

(1693.) Dost thou murmur because once thou wert better? Know God was beforehand with thee in the ways of mercy. Thou shouldst rather think thus, "I have lived for these many years, forty years perhaps or more, in a comfortable condition; I have lived in health, and peace, and plenty. What though the remaining part of my time has some affliction? The Lord has granted me a comfortable sunshine all the day long till towards evening, and what if at seven or eight o'clock at night it begins to rain? Let me thank God I have had so fair weather all day."

You that are going a voyage, if you have had a comfortable wind, and very fair, for many months together, what if you have a little storm when you are within sight of land? Will you murmur and repine? Oh no, but rather bless God that you have had such a comfortable voyage so long. Oh, this consideration would help us all!

What am I that the sun should always shine upon me, that I must have fair weather all my days? That which God gives to me, He gave it me as a pledge of His love : let me return it to Him as a pledge of my obedience.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

6. We profess to be heirs of God.

(1694.) That man that hath a reward in heaven may be exceeding glad, whatsoever befall him here on earth. Will a prince be troubled for the loss of a farthing or the barking of a dog? That man that hath not clothes to his back, nor a house to put his head in, nor a good word from any about him, and yet hath assurance of living in glory with God and His holy angels, as soon as ever he is gone out of the flesh, I think is a happy man in the eye of reason itself. And he that professeth to have assurance of such a glory, and yet liveth not comfortably in every condition, I will not believe him whatsoever he profess.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1695.) If a poor man that had all his wealth about him should fall into the hands of thieves, and be robbed and rifled by them, he must needs cry out and take on pitifully, for, alas ! he is quite undone, he hath nothing left at home to succour him and his poor family withal ; but a rich man that hath store of money at home, safe locked up in his chest (unless he be some base, miserable wretch), will never complain much or be disquieted when he hath thirty or forty shillings taken from him. Thus for worldlings to rage and take on when they must lose their life, or their peace, or their wealth, it is no marvel ; for, alas ! when these things are gone, they have nothing left, they are at a desperate loss : but a Christian that knows and considers what he is born unto, and what he shall enjoy when he comes home to his Heavenly Father's house, he cares not though he be stripped of all here in this world, and rejoiceth in death that hastens him to a better possession.

—Hildersham, 1631.

IV. ITS FOLLY.

1. It does nothing to remove our troubles.

(1696.) Some of Job's friends said to him, "Shall the earth be forsaken for thee, and shall the rock be removed out of his place?" So I may say to every discontented, impatient heart, "What, shall the providence of God change its course for thee? Dost thou think it such a weak thing that, because it does not please thee, it must alter its course? Be thou content or not content, the providence of God will go on. Canst thou make one hair black or white with all the stir that thou keepest?"

When you are in a ship at sea, that has all her sails spread with a full gale of wind and swiftly sailing, can you make it still by running up and down in the ship? No more can you make the providence of God change its course with your fretting; it will go on with power, do what thou canst.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(1697.) The maunderings of discontent are like the behaviour of a swine, who, when he feels it rain, runs grumbling about, and by that indeed discovers his nature, but does not avoid the storm.

—South, 1633-1716.

2. It does much to aggravate them.

(1698.) By discontent and repining the weight of our afflictions is exceedingly aggravated. For whereas in their own nature, they did only press us, now also they vex and gall us ; like the yoke carried by the refractory ox, which by his struggling frets off the skin, whereas it might be carried with ease and without hurt if he would go quietly.

—Downe, 1644.

(1699.) There is a great deal of folly in discontentedness, for it makes our afflictions a great deal worse than otherwise they would be. If a mariner when a storm comes should be froward, and would not pull down his sails, is his condition the better because he is discontented and will not pull down his sails? Just so is it with a discontented heart. A discontented heart is a proud heart, and he out of his pride is troubled with his affliction, and is not contented with God's disposal, and so he will not pull down his spirit and make it bow to God in this condition in which God has brought him. Now, is his condition the better? No, certainly, abundantly worse ; a thousand to one but the tempest overwhelms his soul. And thus, you see what a great deal of folly there is in the sin of discontentment.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(1700.) By impatience there is no good to be gotten. It will be but a means to make God lay heavier and harder things on us, as a discreet father, when his son shall take pet at some smaller matter that his father has crossed him in, may therefore take occasion, yea, and many times does, to give him some greater cause of discontent, to bring him hereby to know himself and his duty, and to teach him to rest content with that which his father will have. By impatience our affliction will but grow more grievous to us, as the snare is to the fowl that by fluttering and straining makes the string straighter, as the yoke is to the beast that by struggling with it has galled her neck, and yet is compelled to draw still in it. And we shall but thereby procure to ourselves the more evil ; as the sick man in a burning fever, while by tossing to and fro he seeks to find ease, does but exasperate the disease and increase his own grief.

—Galuker, 1574-1654.

(1701.) Discontent puts an edge on troubles : to kick against the pricks exasperates the pain.

—Bates, 1625-1699.

V. ITS HURTFULNESS.

(1702.) The discontented man is like a watch overwound, wrested out of time, and goes false ; grief is like ink poured into water, that fills the whole fountain full of blackness. Like mist, it spoils the burnish of the silver mind.

—Felltham, 1668.

(1703.) Why dost thou complain of thy troubles? It is not trouble that troubles but discontent. It is not the water without the ship, but the water that gets within the leak, which drowns it. It is not outward affliction that can make the life of a Christian sad : a contented mind would sail above these waters ; but when there is a leak of discontent open, and trouble gets into the heart, then it is disquieted and sinks. Do therefore as the mariners, pump the water out and stop this spiritual leak in thy soul, and no trouble can hurt thee.

—Watson, 1696.

VI. ITS MISERY.

(1704.) There are those that want impatiently ; repining at God's dealing with them, and making their own impotent anger guilty of a further addition to their misery, as the distressed king of Israel, in a desperate sense of that grievous dearth : " Behold, this evil is of the Lord, what should I wait on the Lord any longer ? " and those wretched ones, who when the fourth angel had poured his phial upon the sun, being scorched with the extremity of the heat, blasphemed the God of Heaven. In this kind, was that sinful techiness of Jonah. When I see a poor worm that hath put itself out of the cool cell of the earth wherein it was lodged ; and now, being beaten upon by the sunbeams, lies wriggling upon the bare path, turning itself every way in vain, and not finding so much as the shade of a leaf to cover it ; I cannot but think of that fretting prophet when, wanting the protection of his gourd, he found himself scalded with that strong reflection ; looking up wrathfully towards the sun, from whom he smarted, could say to the God that made it, " I do well to be angry, even to the death. "

—Hall, 1574-1656.

VII. ITS SHAMEFULNESS.

(1705.) When thou hast been a long time in the school of afflictions, thou art a very dullard in Christ's school if thou hast not learned contentment. " I have learned, " says St. Paul, " in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. " The eye is as tender a part as any in a man's body, but yet the eye is able to bear a great deal of cold, because it is more used to it. So those that God exercises much with afflictions, though they have tender spirits otherwise, yet they should have learned contentedness by this time. A new cart may creak, but after the use of it a while it will not do so. So when thou wert newly come into the work of Christ, perhaps thou makest a noise and canst not bear afflictions ; but art thou an old Christian, and yet wilt thou be a murmuring Christian ? Oh, it is a shame for any that have been a long time in the school of Jesus Christ, to have murmuring and discontented spirits.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(1706.) Our base hearts are more discontented at one loss than thankful for a hundred mercies. God hath plucked one bunch of grapes from you ; but how many precious clusters are left behind ?

—Watson, 1696.

VIII. ITS SINFULNESS.

(1707.) God counts it rebellion (Comp. Num. xvi. 14, with xvii. 10). Murmuring is but as the smoke of a fire ; there is first a smoke and smother before the flame breaks forth : and so before open rebellion in a kingdom there is first a smoke of murmuring, and then it breaks forth into open rebellion. Because it has rebellion in the seeds of it, it is counted before the Lord to be rebellion. When thou feelest thy heart discontented and murmuring against the dispensation of God towards thee, thou shouldst check thy heart thus, " Oh, thou wretched heart, what I wilt thou be a rebel against God ? "

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(1708.) Suppose a man were in a family entertained by a friend, and he did not pay for his board ; it is expected that such a one should not be ready to find fault with everything in the house. If such a one should be discontented if a cup should not be filled for him as he would have it, or if he should stay a minute longer for a thing than he would, this we would account a great evil. So it is with us ; we are at God's table every day, and it is upon free cost whatever we may have. Now when we are at the table of God (for so all God's administrations to us are His table) and at free cost, for us to be finding fault and be discontented is a very great aggravation of our sin.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(1709.) We would think that beggar intolerably impudent that coming to our doors to ask an alms, when we have bestowed on him some broken bread and meat or some sorry cast coat, yet like those importunate persons the psalmist speaks of, that grudge and grumble if they have not their own fill and their own will, should not be quiet and hold himself content therewith, unless he might have one of the best dishes of meat from our board, or one of our ordinary wearing suits given him. And yet this is the case of the greatest number of us. We come all as beggars to God's mercy-gate, and God gives us out abundance of many good things—life, liberty, health of body, strength and ability of limbs, food and raiment, &c., a courtesy and competency of each, as He sees to be fit for us : and yet forsooth we cannot be quiet, nor think ourselves well, unless we may fare as deliciously as Dives did, or go in silks and satins as such and such do.

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

(1710.) Discontent is a secret boasting of some excellency in ourselves, as if God did not govern well, or we could govern better ? Shall a silly passenger, that understands not the use of the compass, be angry that the skillful pilot will not steer the vessel according to his pleasure ? Must we give out our orders to God, as though the counsels of infinite wisdom must roll about according to the conceits of our fancy ?

IX. ITS CURE.

1. Is not to be wrought by changes in our circumstances.

(1711.) I cannot compare the folly of men that think to get contentment with their musings about others' conditions better than to the way of children : perhaps they are gotten upon a hill, and they look a good way off and see another hill, and they think that if they were on the top of that, then they were able to touch the clouds with their fingers ; but when they are on the top of that hill, alas ! then they are as far from the clouds as they were before. So it is with many that think, if they were in such a condition then they should have contentment ; and perhaps they get into that condition, and then they are as far from contentment as before.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

2. Nor by additions to our possessions.

(1712.) The reason why you have not contentment in the things of the world is not because you have not enough of them ; but the reason is, because they are not proportionable to that immortal soul of yours that is capable of God Himself. Many think when they are troubled and have not contentment, that it is because they have but a little in the world, and if they had more then they should be content. That were just thus. Suppose a man is hungry, and to satisfy his craving stomach he should open his mouth to take in the wind, and then should think that the reason why he is not satisfied is because he has not enough of the wind ; no, the reason is, because the thing is not suitable to a craving stomach. Truly there is the same madness in the world. The wind that a man takes in by gaping will as soon satisfy a craving stomach, as all the comforts in the world can satisfy a soul that knows what true happiness means (Isa. lv. 1-3).

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(1713.) The covetous person that is so greedy of the world and so insatiable in his desires, has not need of more to be heaped upon him, but has need rather of something to be taken away from him. He must have that discontented humour of his purged out of his head, that covetous affection of his wrought out of his heart, that is the cause of this his insatiable desire. Till then, all this world's wealth will be but as strong drink to the drunkard, that further inflames him, and increases his drought; as oil to the fire, that does not quench it, but makes it burn fiercer than at first.

—Gataker, 1574-1654.

(1714.) When once men transgress the bounds of contentment prescribed by God, there is no stop nor stay. As the channel wears wider and deeper the more water falls into it; so the more outward things increase upon us, the more are our desires increased. Be content with such things as you have now, or you will not be content hereafter; the lust will increase with the possession.

—Manion, 1620-1667.

3. But by the grace of God in the heart, cleansing it from inordinate desires.

(1715.) All the rules and helps in the world will do us little good, except we get a good temper in our hearts. You can never make a ship go steady with propping of it without; you know there must be ballast within the ship, that must make it go steady. And so there is nothing without us that can keep our hearts in a steady constant way, but that which is within us; grace within the soul, that will do it.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(1716.) The men of the world, when they would have contentment, and want anything, Oh, they must have something from without to content them. But, says a godly man, let me get out that which is in already, and then I shall come to contentment. As suppose a man has an aquish humour that makes his drink taste bitter: "Now," says he, "you must put some sugar into my drink," and his wife puts in some, and yet the drink tastes bitter. Why? Because the bitterness comes from a bitter choleric humour within. But let the physician come and give him a potion to purge out the bitterness that is within, and then he can taste his drink well enough. Just thus it is with the men of the world. "Oh, such a condition is bitter, and if I could have such and such a mercy added to this misery, then it would be sweet." Now, if God should put a spoonful or two of sugar in, it would be bitter still. But the way to contentment is to purge out thy lusts and bitter humours. "From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not from hence, even of the lusts that war in your members?"

Burroughs, 1599-1646.

(1717.) As contentment argues much grace, so discontent argues much corruption. If a man's body be of that temper that every scratch of a pin makes his flesh to rankle and to be a sore, you will say, "Surely this man's body is very corrupt," so it is in thy spirit, if every little trouble and affliction shall make thee discontented. Or, as it is in a wound of a man's body; the evil of a wound is not so much in the largeness of the wound, and in the abundance of blood that comes out of the wound, but in the inflammation that there is in it, or in a fretting and corroding humour that is in the wound. An unskilful man when he comes and sees a large wound in the flesh, looks upon it as dangerous, and when he sees a great deal of blood gush out, he thinks these are the evils of it; but when a surgeon comes and sees a great gash, says he, "This will be healed within a few days." But there is a less wound, and there is an inflammation or a fretting humour that is in it; "and this will cost time," says he, "to cure." So that he does not lay balsam and healing salves upon it, but his great care is to get out the fretting humour or inflammation. So it is in the souls of men. It may be that there is some affliction upon them that I compare to the wound; now they think that the greatness of the affliction is that which makes their condition most miserable. Oh no; there is a fretting humour and inflammation in the heart, a murmuring spirit that is within thee, and that is the misery of thy condition, and that must be purged out of thee before thou canst be healed.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

4. By the increase of self-knowledge.

(1718.) You will never come to get any skill in this mystery, except you study the book of your own heart; and this will help you to contentment these three ways:—

1. By the studying of thy heart thou wilt come presently to discover wherein thy discontent lies. Many are discontented, and know not wherefore; they think that and the other thing is the cause; but a man that knows his own heart will find out presently where the root of the discontent lies, that it lies in such a corruption or distemper of the heart.

It is in this case as it is with a little child that is very froward in the house. If a stranger comes in, he does not know what the matter is: perhaps the stranger will give the child a rattle, or a nut, or such thing to quiet it. But when the nurse comes, she knows the disposition of the child, and therefore knows best how to quiet it. So it is here. When we are strangers with our own hearts, we are mightily discontented, and know not how to quiet ourselves, because we know not wherein the discontent lies.

So a man that has a watch, and understands the use of every wheel and pin; if it goes amiss, he will presently find out the cause of it: but one that has no skill in a watch, when it goes amiss, he knows not what the matter is, and therefore cannot mend it. So indeed our hearts are as a watch, and there are many wheels and windings and turnings there, and we should labour to know our hearts well, that when they are out of tune we may know what the matter is.

2. This knowledge of our hearts will help us to contentment, because by this we shall come to know what is most suitable to our condition. A man that knows not his heart thinks not what need he has of affliction, and upon that he is disquieted.

3. By knowing their own hearts, they know what they are able to manage, and by this means they come to be content. Countrymen do observe, that if they overstock their lands, it will quickly spoil them. And so a wise husbandman, that knows how much his ground will bear, is not troubled that he has not so much stock as others. Why? Because he knows that he has not ground enough for so great a stock, and that quiets him. So many men and women, that know not their own hearts, would fain have a prosperous estate as others have; but if they knew their own hearts, they would know they were not able to manage it.

If one of your little children of three or four years old should be crying for the coat of her that is twelve or fourteen years old, and say, "Why may I not have a coat as long as my sister's?" If she had, she would soon trip up her heels, and break her face; but when the child comes to understanding, she is not discontented because her coat is not so long as her sister's, but says, "My coat is fit for me," and therein takes content. So if we come to understanding in the school of Christ, we will not cry, "Why have not I such an estate as others have?" The Lord sees that I am not able to manage it, and I see it myself by the knowing of my own heart.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

5. By meditation upon what is consonant with our condition in this life.

(1719.) While I live in the world my condition is to be but a pilgrim, a stranger, a traveller, and a soldier. Now the right understanding of this; and being taught this, not only by rote, that I can speak the words over, but when I come to have my soul possessed with the consideration of this truth, that God has set me in this world, not as in my home, but as a mere stranger and a pilgrim, that I am travelling here to another home, and that I am here a soldier in my warfare; it is a mighty help to contentment, in whatsoever befalls one. As now to instance one of these conditions—

When a man is at home, if he has not things according to his desire he will be finding fault. But if a man travels abroad, perhaps he meets not with convenience as he desires; yet this very thought may moderate a man's spirit, "I am a traveller, and I must not be finding fault, though things be not so as in my own family."

If a man meets with ill weather, he must be content. "It is traveller's fare," we use to say, both fair weather and foul weather; and we must be content with it. If a man were at home and it should begin to drop in his house, he cannot bear it; but when he is travelling abroad, though he meet with rains and storms, he is not so much troubled.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

6. By a discovery of the interdependency of Divine providences.

(1720.) There is an infinite variety of the works of God in an ordinary providence, and yet all work in an orderly way. We put these two together, for God in the way of His providence causes a thousand thousand things one to depend upon another; there are infinite several wheels, as I may say, in the works of providence; all the works that ever God did from all eternity, or ever will do, put them all together, and all make up but one work, and they have been as several wheels that have had their orderly motion to attain the end that God from all eternity has appointed. We, indeed, look at things by pieces, we look at one particular and do not consider the reference that that one thing has to another; but God looks at all things at once, and sees the reference that one thing has to another: as a child that looks upon a clock, looks first upon one wheel, and then upon any other wheel; he looks not at all together, or the dependence that one has upon another; but the workman has his eyes upon all together, and sees the dependence of all upon one another, and the art that there is in the dependence of one upon another. So it is in God's providence.

Now observe how this works to contentment. When there is such a passage of providence befalls me, that is one wheel, and it may be if this one wheel should be stopped, there might a thousand other wheels come to be stopped by this: as in a clock, stop but one wheel, and you stop every wheel, because they have dependence one upon another. So when God has ordered a thing for the present to be thus and thus, how dost thou know how many things depend upon this one thing? God may have some work that He has to do twenty years hence that may depend upon this passage of providence that falls out this day or this week.

And here we may see a great deal of evil that there is in discontent. For thou wouldst have God's providence altered in such and such a particular? Indeed, if it were only in that particular, and that had reference to nothing else, it were not so much: but by thy desire to have thy will in such a particular, it may be that thou wouldst cross God in a thousand things that He has to bring about; because it is possible there may be a thousand things depending upon that one thing that thou wouldst fain have to be otherwise than it is. Just as if a child should cry out and say, "Let but that one wheel stop:" though he says but one wheel, yet if that stop, it is as much as if he should say, they must all stop. So in providence: let but this one passage of providence stop, and it is as much as if a thousand stopped. Let me therefore be quiet and content: for though I be crossed in some one particular, God attains His end, at least His end may be furthered in a thousand things by this one thing that I am crossed in. Therefore let a man consider, this is an act of providence, and how do I know what God is about to do, and how many things depend upon this providence? If thou hast a love and friendship to God, be willing to be crossed in some few things, that the Lord may have His work to go on in the universal in a thousand other things.

—Burroughs, 1599-1646.

DOING GOOD.

I. THE DUTY OF EVERY CHRISTIAN.

(1721.) As burning candles give light until they be consumed, so godly Christians must be occupied in doing good as long as they live.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

(1722.) As Apelles the painter much lamented if he should escape but one day without drawing some picture or line: so ought a Christian to be sorry if any day should pass without some good work or exercise.

—Cawdrey, 1609.

II. POSSIBLE TO EVERY ONE.

(1723.) What is a bud in a forest? yet is it beautiful as if alone. What is one snowflake of the mantle that wraps the mountain top? yet is it perfect as if alone, and reflects part of the early golden light of the advancing sun. Each man is a man, and may have his individuality of work and worth. A good man among the good is as one of the drops on which God paints the rainbow; for good men are to the world its rainbow of Divine promise and hope; and the goodness of no man is lost. Every raindrop does its part in dissolving light into colour; and though we may seem to ourselves like those drops which, falling near our window, make to us no part of the bow, yet we too have our brightness and place, forming part of the arch as seen by some—that arch which “the hands of the Most High have bended.” And not only has the individual good man ever due place among the many—at times his individual goodness may have a worth quite special. One man of pure, and merciful, and patient life, shall at times better represent God to us than shall the Church, or what by us is so named; even as on a drop of morning dew, lying calm and still, a more perfect image of the sun appears than on the vast sea distracted by tumultuous winds. On the sea there is a wide diffused lustre; but on the dewdrop a serene, clear brightness. We, and our work and our history, all have worth, and may have special worth.

—Lynch, 1818-1871.

(1724.) I know a man [Thomas Wright] who at the close of each day's work turned his steps to the prison, and with his Bible, or on his knees on the floor, spent the evening hours in its gloomy cells, seeking to instruct the ignorant and reclaim the criminal and raise the fallen. The judgment day shall show how many he restored, penitent and pardoned, to the bosom of God; but it is certain that, alone and single-handed, he rescued and reformed four hundred criminals, restoring them, honest and well-doing men, to the bosom of society.

—Guthrie.

(1725.) You say, “What can I do? I have no power, nor influence, nor name, nor talents, nor money!” Look at the coral-reef yonder, where it encircles the fair isles that lie, like bright gems, on the bosom of the Pacific, or, by Australian shores, stretches its unbroken wall for a thousand leagues along the sea. How contemptible the architects; yet the aggregate of their labours, mocking our greatest breakwaters, how colossal! So it ought to be, and would be, in our congregations, were every man and every woman to feel their own individual responsibilities; would each go to Christ, saying, Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?—would they but rise to the height of their calling. I know that all cannot be bright and burning lights; that honour is reserved for John Baptist and a few such men. But see how that candle in a cottage window sends out its rays streaming far through the depths of night. Why should not we shine, though but like that?—shine, though it should be to illumine only the narrow walls of our country's humblest home.

Consider how the greatest things ever done on earth have been done by little and little—little agents, little persons, and little things. How was the wall restored around Jerusalem? By each man, whether his house was an old palace or the rudest cabin, building the breach before his own door. How was the soil of the New World redeemed from gloomy forests? By each sturdy emigrant cultivating the patch round his own log hut. How have the greatest battles been won? Not by the generals who got their breasts blazoned with stars, and their brows crowned with honours, but by the rank and file—every man holding his own post, and ready to die on the battle-field. They won the victory! It was achieved by the blood and courage of the many; and I say, if the world is ever to be conquered for our Lord, it is not by ministers, nor by office-bearers, nor by the great, and noble, and mighty, but by every member of Christ's body being a working member; doing their own work; filling their own sphere; holding their own post; and saying to Jesus, “Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?”

—Guthrie.

(1726.) Many persons high in station, who would not permit an equal or a superior to speak to them on the subject of religion, will take very kindly the preaching of a person who makes no pretensions, and whose position and carriage indicate that he comes to them deferentially.

If you go to the door of a man who has great official influence or power, you will see crowds thronging thither to get access to him; and one can get in because he is the governor of a state; another because he is a senator; another, because he controls such and such pecuniary or political influences. But there is a whole swarm who cannot get in. They are not known, and are shuffled to one side. But while the door is open, and the governor and senator and influential men are going in, a little dog slips in, because he is a dog. A man would not be allowed to go in, but a dog is.

I would rather go into a great man's heart as a dog, than to be shut out because I was a man. A little man who does not put too much on himself, and is willing to go in anyhow, oftentimes gets the liberty of slipping in at the door of a man's disposition, when, if he were a great man, he would not be permitted to go in. The trouble is not that you are so humble, but that you are not humble enough. It is because, being little, you are not willing to do the work that a little man can do. If you could only forget yourself; if the thought never came up whether you were big or little; if you had a grateful sense of what Christ has done for you, and a realisation of the peril which hangs over a man's head all the time; if you carried the man in your heart night and day, and could not get rid of him, if you prayed for him, and yearned after him, and desired his good,—with that state of mind you might safely venture to go to him. Under such circumstances, do not stop to ask, “Am I fitted to undertake this work?” You will find that out when you have tried. What if you get a rebuff? It will not do you any hurt, and it may do you much good. At any rate, Christ took buffets for our sake; and we ought to be willing to take buffets, not only for His sake, but for others' sakes.

The persons that bring the most souls to Christ are not those who have the greatest overt power in the world, but those who are the most gentle, unassuming, earnest, and sincere.

—Becher.

(1727.) Nellie Trafton had been a sufferer almost all her life from a bad disease of the lungs. One desire little Nell had above all others; and that was, to become a missionary when she should be old enough. One day she suddenly exclaimed, “What is the use in my waiting until I am grown up before I do any good? I mean to try now!”

So Nellie planned and worked, and got up a little sewing-society, with a young lady to help the children and direct it. At the end they had some tableaux, and sold the little things they had made. And how much do you think they earned? About one hundred dollars! Was not that something for a sick girl to do? And what do you think they did with the money? They sent it to help to support a teacher for a school of coloured children down South.

If a little girl who was sick nearly all the time could do so much, what cannot the well ones do if they try? Ah! that last word is the key to it all; only TRY!

III. THE POWER FOR GOOD THAT LIES LATENT IN EVERY CHURCH.

(1728.) In looking over some vast assembly, with its sea of human faces, one reflection naturally suggests itself—in a few years they shall be all mouldering in the dust. There is another and yet more solemn thought;—our minds are carried forward to that day, when the graves of a thousand generations having given up their dead, all eyes, instead of being turned on a poor mortal man, shall, some beaming with joy and others black with despair, be fixed on the great white throne and Him that sits crowned thereon. But there is a third thought that presses on me whenever I cast my eyes over some such great assembly, and see all these human faces; it is this,—What power is here! what an immense moral power!

You may smile at him who, standing by the cataract of Niagara, as gathering her waters from a hundred lakes she rolled them over with the roar of a hundred thunders, instead of being filled with sublime admiration of the scene, began to calculate how much machinery that water-power would turn. You may smile at that utilitarianism. But it is a serious, solemn, stirring thought to think how much moral machinery all this power now before me could turn for good, were every scheming brain, and busy hand, and willing heart, engaged in the service of God. I hope many of you are active, zealous Christians. But were all of us so,—were all Christian men and women so, what honour would accrue to God! what a revenue of glory to Jesus Christ, and what invaluable service to religion! Thousands on thousands might be saved!

It is impossible to overestimate, or rather to estimate, the power that lies latent in our churches. We talk of the power latent in steam—latent till Watt evoked its spirit from the waters, and set the giant to turn the iron arms of machinery. We talk of the power that was latent in the skies till science climbed their heights, and seizing the spirit of the thunder, chained it to our service—abolishing distance; outstripping the wings of time; and flashing our thoughts across rolling seas to distant continents. Yet what are these to the moral power that lies asleep in the congregations of our country, and of the Christian world? And why latent? Because men and women neither appreciate their individual influence, nor estimate aright their own individual responsibilities. They cannot do everything; therefore they do nothing. They cannot blaze like a star; and therefore they won't shine like a glow-worm; and so they are content that the few work, and that the many look on. Not thus are the woods clothed in green; but by every little leaf expanding its own form. Not thus are fields covered with golden corn; but by every stalk of grain ripening its own head. Not thus does the coral reef rise from the depths of ocean; but by every little insect building its own rocky cell.

—Guthrie.

IV. DEMANDS SELF-DENIAL.

(1729.) Christ did not redeem and save poor souls by sitting in majesty on His heavenly throne but by hanging on the shameful cross.

V. DIFFICULTIES ARE NOT TO DETER US.

(1730.) It is poor water that will not run down hill. The person who will not do good when it is easier to do good than not to do it I call a very poor Christian indeed. Doing good under such circumstances does not amount to much either. That is a poor engine that can only drive water through hose or pipes down hill. A good engine is one that can lift large quantities of water up steep acclivities. Those vast giants of iron at the Ridgewood Water-works, which supply this city, day and night, easily lifting a ton of water at every gush, so that all the many thirsty faucet-mouths throughout our streets cannot exhaust their fullness,—those are the engines that I admire.

There are many Christians that can pump down hill; and they are very conceited frequently, and say, "See what I am doing. See the pulsations of my heart. Stand out of the way!" But anybody can do all that they are doing.

—Becker.

VI. OPPORTUNITIES FOR DOING GOOD SHOULD BE EAGERLY SEIZED.

(1731.) If cruelty has its expiations and its remorse, generosity has its chances and its turns of good fortune; as if Providence reserved them for fitting occasions, that noble hearts may not be discouraged.

—Lamartine.

VII. MODES OF DOING GOOD.

(1732.) In one of the boxes sent to us by the American Sanitary Commission was a Patch-work quilt of unusual softness and lightness. When we opened it, we found a note pinned to it. I read as follows:—

'I have made this Scripture quilt for one of the Hospital beds, for I thought that whilst it would be a comfort to the poor body, it might speak a word of good to the precious soul; the words are so beautiful and blessed, and full of balm and healing! May it be blessed to the dear boys in the army, amongst whom I have a son.' It was made of square blocks of calico and white cotton intermingled, and on every white block was written a verse from the Bible or a couplet from one of our best hymns. On the central block, in letters so large as to catch the careless eye, was that faithful saying, in which is our hope and strength—'Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.' And below it, the prayer of all prayers, "God be merciful to me a sinner." The head border which would be nearest the sick man's eye, and oftenest read, had the sweetest texts of promise, and love, and comfort. Amongst them I read, "God so loved the world, that He gave His only-begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish." 'Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest.' 'Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters !' 'I sought the Lord, and He heard me, and delivered me from all my fears.' 'Oh,' we said, 'that all our beds had such quilts ! God will surely speak through these texts to the sick and wounded men ! They will read them when they will read nothing else. Who knows how much good they will do !'. To sufferer after sufferer who lay under it, this quilt was a source of interest, and to some the means of life and peace. At last came the boy who had best right to the comfort of our Scripture quilt—the 'son' of whom the good woman who made it spoke in the note attached. It was a strange circumstance that he should have come to lie beneath it, but so it was. He had lain there nearly senseless for more than a week, when I saw him kiss the patch-work. I thought he might be wandering, or if not, had found a text of hope or consolation that seemed to suit his need, and marked with my eye the place he had kissed, to see what it was. It was no text, but a calico block, the pattern a little crimson leaf on a dark ground. He kept looking at it, with tears in his eyes, and I was almost sure his mind was wandering. Nay, he was never more in his right mind, and his thoughts were at home with his mother. A bit of the gown he had so often seen her wear had carried him back to her. He kissed it again. I approached him. He looked up and smiled through his tears. 'Do you know where this quilt came from?' he asked. 'Some good woman sent it to us through the Sanitary Commission.' 'You don't know her name, nor where it came from?' 'No, but I saved a note that was pinned to the quilt.' Would you be willing to let me see it some time when it's convenient?' 'Oh yes. I'll get it now.' I got it for him, his hand trembled, and his lips grew white as he opened it and saw the writing. 'Please read it to me quite slowly,' he said, returning it. I read it. 'It is from my mother; shall you keep it?' 'Yes' I answered, 'I value it very much, as also the quilt.' He put his hands over his eyes. I thought he wished to be alone, and left him. As I stood by his bed the next day, I was wondering if he had not seen his mother's texts, as well as the bit of her gown. He had, and pointed out one to me. It was, 'Father, I have sinned against heaven and in Thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called Thy son.' 'I am no more worthy,' he whispered. I put my finger on the next white block, and read aloud, 'When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him and had compassion, and ran and fell on his neck and kissed him.' As I looked up, I saw there were tears upon his cheeks, and his lips were tremulous. He covered his eyes, and I left him. A few days after, when he had grown much stronger, he held up to me the text I had shown him. 'I was a great way off,' he said, 'but He has met me and had compassion on me.' 'You feel the Saviour's love?' 'It fills me with peace.' 'What love ! What a Saviour !' I said, in my thanksgiving. 'Shall I not write to your mother and tell her that her son, who was dead, is alive again; was lost, and is found?' 'Will it not be too much trouble?' 'Oh no ! a pleasure instead !' I wrote the blessed tidings, making the mother's heart rejoice. And now our Scripture quilt was even dearer and more sacred than before.

VIII. THE HIGHEST FORM OF DOING GOOD.

(1733.) To do good to men is the great work of life; to make them true Christians is the greatest good we can do them. Every investigation brings us round to this point. Begin here, and you are like one who strikes water from a rock on the summits of the mountains; it flows down all the intervening tracts to the very base. If we could make each man love his neighbour, we should make a happy world. The true method is to begin with ourselves, and so to extend the circle to all around us. It should be perpetually in our minds.

—J. W. Alexander.

IX. THE SUPREME QUALIFICATION FOR DOING GOOD.

(1734.) We can do more good by being good than in any other way.

—Rowland Hill.

(1735.) As for doing good, that is one of the professions which are full. What good I do, in the common sense of that word, must be aside from my main path, and for the most part wholly unintended. Men say, practically, Begin where you are, and such as you are, without aiming mainly to become of more worth, and with kindness aforethought go about doing good. If I were to preach at all in this strain, I should say, rather, Set about being good. As if the sun should stop when he had kindled his fires up to the splendour of a moon or a star of the sixth magnitude, and go about like a Robin Goodfellow, peeping in at every cottage window, inspiring lunatics, and tainting meats, and making darkness visible, instead of steadily increasing his genial heat and beneficence till he is of such brightness that no mortal can look him in the face, and then, and in the meanwhile too, going about the world in his own orbit, doing it good, or rather, as a truer philosophy has discovered, the world going about him getting good.

—Thoreau.

X. ITS REWARDS.

1. Personal invigoration and comfort.

(1736.) Doing good is the best way for receiving good: he that in pity to a poor man that is almost starved, will but fall to rubbing him, shall get himself heat, and both be gainers.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1737.) All the purest ordinances and churches will not afford that solid comfort, as the converting of a few sinners by our unwearied, compassionate exhortations. Two men in a frosty season come where a company of people are ready to starve; the one of them laps himself, and taketh shelter, for fear lest he should perish with them; the other, in pity, falls to rub them that he may recover heat in them, and while he laboureth hard to help them, he getteth far better heat to himself than his unprofitable companion doth.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

2. True and unexpected happiness.

(1738.) As every faithful minister is never so well pleased as when he doth most for the good of souls; so it is with every faithful Christian. A candle if it be not burnt, is lost and good for nothing.

—Baxter, 1615-1691.

(1739.) Alexander, the Emperor, was one day out hunting; and having gone ahead of his suite, he fancied he heard a groan: the groan pierced his heart; he alighted on the spot, looked around him and found a poor man at the point of death. He bent over him, chafed his temples, excited the poor man or tried to do so; he went by a public road, and called the attention of a surgeon to the case of the poor man. "Oh!" said the surgeon, "he is dead; he is dead." "Try what you can do," said Alexander. "He is dead," said the surgeon. "Try what you can do." The surgeon adopted a set of experimental processes at the command of the Emperor; and at last a drop of blood appeared. At the mouth of the opened vein there was suction; respiration was forming in the chest of the man. Alexander's eyes flashed fire, and he said—"Oh! this is the happiest day of my life; I have saved another man's life!"

What says another great man among ourselves—Lord Eldon? In a letter to his sister which he wrote in his old age, after he had retired from the honours of office, he says—"It was my duty, as Lord Chancellor, to listen to the record of the sentences passed by the Recorder of the City of London. It used to be a formal thing, when the sentences of death were read over that the Chancellor should give his assent; but I determined after the first time that I would go into each case, and have each case clearly and distinctly stated. It used to give me a great deal of trouble in addition to all my other duties; but the consequence of this was, that I saved the lives of several persons." I say, do good in the cause of truth and righteousness, and you will promote your own honour and happiness; and when the eye sees you, it will bless you; and when the ear hears you, it will bear witness to you.

—Baumont.

(1740.) It is recorded of a man who had made an ample fortune and had retired to a country seat to enjoy it, that when he had nothing to do he became absolutely wretched; so wretched that he formed the horrible idea of committing suicide. Going to drown himself he met a poor woman who had not tasted bread for four and twenty hours; cold—ragged—wretched—starving—she implored aid, he gave her a shilling; and the grateful smile reflected from the starving woman's face arrested his career, and he returned a wiser and a better man, saying to himself, "If God makes me the instrument of giving happiness by the gift of a shilling, I think He must have more work for me to do in the world." If any do not know what to do, and therefore cannot find happiness in the world, let them apply at the nearest Sunday-school for work as teachers. Visit the first day-school and take an interest in it. Follow a city missionary in his laborious, and arduous, and excellent toil; and you will reap blessings in that poor man's footsteps. If you want to be happy, do good, if you wish to rejoice, begin to be beneficent. This is the law that God has made. In every age, in every circumstance, in every sphere, it has been proved to be practically true; make the experiment, and you will find it is so still.

—Cumming.

(1741.) In seeking others' good, we achieve good ourselves. I know of no way to get rid of a great deal of the prevalent dullness, and drowsiness, and spiritual ennui with which many of God's children are afflicted, than by shaking it off like cobwebs, and going to work. Work is the necessary prerequisite of growth; and exercise, of health and development. When good Christian people tell me about being in a saddened condition, when they confess to a state of spiritual stagnation, and say, 'I am making but little progress in this heavenly way,' it does not seem wonderful at all. The man who does not work has no right to expect anything but distrust and dissatisfaction, and deprivation, and ultimate degradation, and he will get it sooner or later. For any Christian man to suppose that he is simply a piece of sanctified sponge, to continuously absorb the light and life of others and grow, is sheer nonsense. He will by and by rot! He will not be able to keep, even with salt. If you would be healthily developed, work. If there is a single organ of the body that is weak, use it well and use it long, and strength will come to it. So with regard to your spiritual life. There is no such beneficent arrangement for spiritual growth like the effort to prove a blessing to mankind.

—Ormiston.

(1742.) If we view this microcosm, the human body, we shall find that the heart does not receive the blood to store it up, but while it pumps it in at one valve, it sends it forth at another. The blood is always circulating everywhere, and is stagnant nowhere; the same is true of all the fluids in a healthy body, they are in a constant state of expenditure. If one cell stores for a few moments its peculiar secretion, it only retains it till it is perfectly fitted for its appointed use in the body; for if any cell in the body should begin to store up its secretion, its store would soon become the cause of inveterate disease; nay, the organ would soon lose the power to secrete at all, if it did not give forth its products. The whole of the human system lives by giving. The eye cannot say to the foot, I have no need of thee, and will not guide thee; for if it does not perform its watchful office, the whole man will be in the ditch, and the eye will be covered with mire. If the members refuse to contribute to the general stock, the whole body will become poverty-stricken, and be given up to the bankruptcy of death. Let us learn, then, from the analogy of nature, the great lesson, that to get, we must give; that to accumulate, we must scatter; that to make ourselves happy, we must make others happy; and that to get good and become spiritually vigorous, we must do good, and seek the spiritual good of others.

—Spurgeon.

(1743.) A physician was once returning to his home, when he saw a little child in great peril in the street. Another instant she would have been crushed under the iron hoofs which were almost upon her. At great peril to himself, he rushed forward, and seizing the little one, bore her in safety to the sidewalk. Curiosity impelled him to look into the child's face that he might see if he knew whom he had rescued. Pushing back the little bonnet, what were his feelings to see that it was his own little daughter whose life he had saved. So he who hastes to save the perishing often finds rewards he little dreamed of. "Whatever thy hands find to do, do it with all your might."

3. True glory.

(1744.) If there be nothing so glorious as doing good, if there is nothing that makes us so like God, then nothing can be so glorious in the use of our money as to use it all in works of love and goodness.

—Law.

(1745.) Some men live in their good deeds, and like a beautiful insect, or a delicate moss preserved in a mass of golden, aromatic amber, seem to lie embalmed in the memory of their worth.

—Guthrie.

4. The approval of Christ.

(1746.) A Russian soldier, one very cold, piercing night, kept duty between one sentry-box and another. A poor working man, moved with pity, took off his coat and lent it to the soldier to keep him warm; adding that he should soon reach home, while the soldier would be exposed out of doors for the night. The cold was so intense that the soldier was found dead in the morning. Some time afterwards the poor man was laid on his death-bed, and in a dream saw Jesus. "You have got my coat on," said the man. "Yes, it is the coat you lent to me that cold night when I was on duty, and you passed by. 'I was naked, and you clothed Me.'"

EDUCATION.

1. Its nature.

(1747.) Real knowledge, like everything else of the highest value, is not to be obtained easily. It must be worked for,—studied for,—thought for,—and more than all, it must be prayed for. And that is education which lays the foundation of such habits,—and gives them, so far a boy's early age will allow, their proper exercise.

—Arnold, 1795–1842.

(1748.) Because education is a dynamical, not a mechanical process, the more powerful and vigorous the mind of the teacher, the more clearly and readily he can grasp things, the better fitted he is to cultivate the mind of another. And to this I find myself coming more and more; I care less and less for information, more and more for the true exercise of the mind; for answering questions concisely and comprehensively, for showing a command of language, a delicacy of taste, a comprehensiveness of thought, and a power of combination.

—Arnold, 1795–1842.

(1749.) A girl may be shown how to darn and how to patch, how to bake and how to brew, how to scrub and how to rub, how to buy pennyworths with pennies, and yet be sent out to the rich man a defective servant, and to the poor man an unthrifty uncomfortable wife. On the other hand, she may have received formal instruction in no one of these things, and yet be able to overcome every difficulty as it arises, by help of the spirit that has been put into her, and will not only soon do well, but will perpetually advance towards perfection in whatever ministry may be demanded of her by the circumstances of her future life. If she has been trained to live by How and Why,—always pouring down through these conductors the whole energy of the mind upon the matter actually in hand,—she will surely make a wise wife or a clever servant.

—Household Words.

2. Its object.

(1750.) I call a complete and generous education that which fits a man to perform justly, skillfully, and magnanimously all the offices, both private and public, of peace and war But here the main skill and groundwork will be, to temper them [the learners] with lectures and explanations upon every opportunity, as may lead and draw them in willing obedience, inflamed with a study of learning, and the admiration of virtue; stirred up with high hopes of living to be brave men and worthy patriots, dear to God, and famous to all ages.

—Hilton, 1608–1674.

(1751.) I hesitate not to assert, as a Christian, that religion is the first rational object of education. Whatever may be the fate of my children in this transitory world, about which, I hope, I am as solicitous as I ought to be, I would, if possible, secure a happy meeting with them in a future and everlasting life. I can well enough bear their reproaches for not enabling them to attain to worldly honours and distinctions; but to have been in any measure accessory, by my neglect, to their final perdition, would be the occasion of such reproach and blame, as would be absolutely insupportable.

—Priestley.

(1752.) The object of a liberal education is to develop the whole mental system of man;—to make his speculative inferences coincide with his practical convictions;—to enable him to render a reason for the belief that is in him, and not to leave him in the condition of Solomon's sluggard, who is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason.

—Whewell.

3. Its necessity.

(1753.) Like as a field, although it be fertile, can bring forth no fruit except it be first tilled and seed cast in: so the mind, although it be apt of itself, cannot without learning bring forth any goodness.

—Cawdrey, 1598–1664.

(1754.) The fruits of the earth do not more obviously require labour and cultivation to prepare them for our use and subsistence, than our faculties demand instruction and regulation in order to qualify us to become upright and valuable members of society, useful to others, or happy in ourselves.

—Barrow, 1631–1713.

(1755.) I consider a human soul without education like marble in the quarry, which shows none of its inherent beauties until the skill of the polisher fetches out the colours, makes the surface shine, and discovers every ornamental cloud, spot, and vein that runs through the body of it. Education, after the same manner, when it works upon a noble mind draws out to view every latent virtue and perfection, which without such helps are never able to make their appearance.

If my reader will give me leave to change the allusion so soon upon him, I shall make use of the same instance to illustrate the force of education which Aristotle has brought to explain his doctrine of substantial forms, when he tells us that a statue lies hid in a block of marble, and that the art of the statuary only clears away the superfluous matter and removes the rubbish. The figure is in the stone, the sculptor only finds it. What sculpture is to a block of marble, education is to a human soul. The philosopher, the saint, or the hero, the wise, the good, or the great man, very often lie hid and concealed in a plebeian, which a proper education might have disinterred, and have brought to light.

—Addison, 1672–1719.

(1756.) Education, in the most extensive sense of the word, may comprehend every preparation that is made in our youth for the sequel of our lives; and in this sense I use it. Some such preparation is necessary for all conditions, because without it they must be miserable, and probably will be vicious, when they grow up, either from the want of the means of subsistence, or from want of rational and inoffensive occupation. In civilised life, everything is effected by art and skill. Whence, a person who is provided with neither (and neither can be acquired without exercise and instruction) will be useless; and he that is useless, will generally be at the same time mischievous to the community. So that to send an uneducated child into the world is injurious to the rest of mankind; it is little better than to turn out a mad dog or a wild beast into the streets.

—Paley, 1743-1805.

(1757.) Despotism is the only form of government which may with safety to itself neglect the education of its infant poor.

—Horsley, 1733-1806.

(1758.) I am persuaded that the extreme profiggacy, improvidence, and misery which are so prevalent among the labouring classes in many countries are chiefly to be ascribed to the want of education. In proof of this, we need only cast our eyes on the condition of the Irish compared with that of the peasantry of Scotland.

—Robert Hall, 1764-1831.

(1759.) Culture's hand

Has scatter'd verdure o'er the land;
And smiles and fragrance rule serene,
Where barren wild usurp'd the scene.
And such is man—a soil which breeds
Or sweetest flowers or vilest weeds;
Flowers lovely as the morning light,
Weeds deadly as an aconite;
Just as his heart is trained to bear
The poisonous weed, or flow'ret fair.

—Bowring.

4. Should begin early.

(1760.) Education may be compared to the grafting of a tree. Every gardener knows that the younger the wilding-stock is that is to be grafted, the easier and the more effectual is the operation, because, then, one scion put on just above the root, will become the main stem of the tree, and all the branches it puts forth will be of the right sort. When, on the other hand, a tree is to be grafted at a considerable age (which may be very successfully done), you have to put on twenty or thirty grafts on the several branches; and afterwards you will have to be watching from time to time for the wilding-shoots which the stock will be putting forth, and pruning them off. And even so one whose character is to be reformed at mature age will find it necessary not merely to implant a right principle once for all, but also to bestow a distinct attention on the correction of this, that, and the other bad habit.

—Whately, 1787-1863.

(1761.) Youth is that period in which, if you would educate men, they must be educated. If they are not educated then, they will not be educated, and no repentance can change the fact. When the plates are prepared for steel engravings, the steel is made soft; and then the graver works out the picture; and then the plate is put into a furnace and brought to great hardness, so that impressions can be taken off by the hundreds without wearing it. Now the time to engrave men is youth, when the plate is soft and ductile. Manhood is hard, and cannot be cut easily, any more than tempered steel.

—Becher.

5. Cannot be imposed on any one.

(1762.) Every man who rises above the common level receives two educations: the first from his instructors; the second, the most personal and important, from himself.

—Gibbon, 1737-1794.

(1763.) Costly apparatus and splendid cabinets have no magical power to make scholars. As a man is in all circumstances, under God, the master of his own fortune, so he is the maker of his own mind. The Creator has so constituted the human intellect that it can only grow by its own action: it will certainly and necessarily grow. Every man must therefore educate himself. His books and teachers are but helps; the work is his. A man is not educated until he has the ability to summon, in an emergency, his mental powers in vigorous exercise to effect its proposed object. It is not the man who has seen the most, or read the most, who can do this; such a one is in danger of being borne down, like a beast of burden, by an overloaded mass of other men's thoughts. Nor is it the man who can boast merely of native vigour and capacity. The greatest of all warriors who went to the siege of Troy had not the pre-eminence because nature had given him strength and he carried the largest bow; but because self-discipline had taught him how to bend it.

—Daniel Webster.

6. Some minds are incapable of it.

(1764.) Professions of universal education are as ludicrous as professions of universal cure; the obliquity and inaptitude of some minds being absolutely incurable.

—W. B. Cluett.

7. Mistakes in education.

(1765.) The general mistake among us in the educating our children is, that in our daughters we take care of their persons and neglect their minds; in our sons we are so intent upon adorning their minds that we wholly neglect their bodies. It is from this that you shall see a young lady celebrated and admired in all the assemblies about town, when her elder brother is afraid to come into a room. From this ill-management it arises that we frequently observe a man's life is half spent before he is taken notice of; and a woman in the prime of her years is out of fashion and neglected.

—Hughes, 1677-1720.

(1766.) With respect to the education of boys, I think they are generally made to draw in Latin and Greek trammels too soon. It is pleasing, no doubt, to a parent, to see his child already in some sort a proficient in those languages at an age when most others are entirely ignorant of them; but hence it often happens that a boy who could construe a fable of Æsop at six or seven years of age, having exhausted his little stock of attention and diligence in making that notable acquisition, grows weary of his task, conceives a dislike for study, and perhaps makes but a very indifferent progress afterwards.

—Crosper.

(1767.) It is an ill-judged thrift, in some rich parents, to bring up their sons to mean employments, for the sake of saving the charge of a more expensive education; for these sons, when they become masters of their liberty and fortune, will hardly continue in occupations by which they think themselves degraded; and are seldom qualified for anything better.

—Paley, 1743-1805.

8. Uniformity is impossible.

(1768.) Men hope, by systems and rules, to shape different minds according to one fixed model; but nature and the accidents of life intervene to thwart the design, and thus keep up the infinite diversity of intellect and attainments, corresponding to the equally varied tempers and fortunes of mankind.

—W. B. Chulow.

(1769.) It must not be forgotten that education resembles the grafting of a tree in this point also, that there must be some affinity between the stock and the graft, though a very important practical difference may exist; for example, between a worthless crab and a fine apple. Even so, the new nature, as it may be called, superinduced by education, must always retain some relation to the original one, though differing in most important points. You cannot, by any kind of artificial training, make any thing of any one, and obliterate all trace of the natural character. Those who hold that this is possible, and attempt to effect it, resemble Virgil, who (whether in ignorance or, as some think, by way of "poetical licence") talks of grafting an oak on an elm: "glandemque sues fringere sub ulmis."

—Whately, 1787-1863.

9. Public schools.

(1770.) A boy will learn more true wisdom in a public school in a year, than by a private education in five. It is not from masters, but from their equals, youth learn a knowledge of the world: the little tricks they play each other, the punishment that frequently attends the commission, is a just picture of the great world; and all the ways of men are practised in a public school in miniature. It is true, a child is early made acquainted with some vices in a school; but it is better to know these when a boy, than be first taught them when a man; for their novelty then may have irresistible charms.

—Goldsmith, 1728-1774.

10. Its Results.
